MR. J. MORLEY: I am informed that there is no foundation for the suggestion in the first paragraph of the question, that the Law Officers of the Crown consented to the acquisition of the foreshore by the Dublin, Wicklow, and Wexford Railway, nor does there seem to be any ground for saying that that railway ever acquired such a right. It has been decided both in England and Ireland that the inhabitants of a district cannot acquire by user any right to remove the sand or gravel from the foreshore. The Irish Chancery Division restrained the public from removing gravel from the Killiney foreshore on the ground that such removal endangered the safety of the railway.

IMPORTED PICTORIAL ADVERTISEMENTS.

MR. FARQUHARSON (Dorset, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that a large proportion of the pictorial advertisements which now appear on the hoardings of the Metropolis are printed and lithographed in America; and if he will cause a separate record of the quantity of such imports to be kept?

MR. BRYCE: No, Sir; I am not aware that the suggestion made in the question is well founded. It would cause much inconvenience to have a separate record of the quantity of these articles imported, and I have no reason for thinking that the quantity is sufficient to make such a record valuable.

MR. TOMLINSON: Could they not be brought under the Merchandise Marks Act?

MR. BRYCE: I do not see what there is to bring them within the Merchandise Marks Act, as they bear no stamp of origin.

THE PLAGUE AT HONG KONG.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether a detachment of the Shropshire Regiment quartered at Hong Kong was ordered on the 23rd of May to assist the Sanitary Authorities in cleansing the town; that an officer has since died, and several men have gone sick of the plague; and if such work is a part of the duty of British soldiers serving in tropical climates?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The troops referred to volunteered for the duty, and, though it involved risk to them of infection, the medical officer in charge agreed with the General in command that the case of the colony was so urgent that their employment was justified. Under the circumstances, the course taken has been approved, and the men of the Shropshire Regiment deserve all praise for their courage and public spirit. I am informed from the Colonial Office that it is not clear that the soldiers who have suffered from the plague were among those engaged in this work.

THE BRENTWOOD SCHOOL SCANDAL.

MAJOR RASCH: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware that the late master of the Hackney Schools at Brentwood, Essex, suspended on account of the cases of cruelty to children, is still drawing rations and living at the schools; and whether he would accelerate the investigation, in order that he might be either cleared or otherwise dealt with?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. SHAW-LEFEVRE, Bradford, Central): I am aware that the Superintendent of the Hackney Schools at Brentwood has been suspended from the performance of his duties by the Guardians, and that pending the decision with regard to his case he continues to reside at the school, and receives rations as an officer. The necessary arrangements for the inquiry are being proceeded with, and the inquiry will be held at an early date.

GERMAN SPIRIT AND IRISH WHISKY.

MR. FIELD: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the Excise Authorities have any available means of detecting, or exercise any supervision regarding the blending of German spirit with Irish whisky after duty is paid; whether any account is kept of the use to which patent still spirits is put after its manufacture in England, Ireland, and Scotland; whether he is aware that, allowing for the differential duty, it can be produced almost as cheaply as the German stuff, and utilised for blending purposes; whether the authorities will prohibit the blending of spirits in bond; and whether he has yet definitely found out what particular kind of spirit is put into the empty Irish whisky barrels that are filled in Bristol, where, it is stated, 60,000 gallons of German spirit is annually received?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT (who replied) said: The Excise have no control over the blending of whisky after it has paid duty. No such account as that referred to is kept. I cannot answer the third question. I cannot give directions for the prohibition of blending of spirits in bond. The matter was fully gone into by a Select Committee in 1880. The empty casks which have been traced to Bristol from Glasgow have gone either to a distillery, where the marks have been removed, and they have been filled by spirits produced at the distillery, or they have gone to a cooper. The points raised by the hon. Member in this and former questions on the same subject have been thoroughly investigated at my request by the Inland Revenue, and I have forwarded to him the result of that inquiry.

OVERPAID INCOME TAX.

MR. BIDDULPH (Herefordshire, Ross): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he can inform the House as to what steps he is taking to instruct the authorities of the Inland Revenue Department to give reasonable assistance to persons who are seeking to obtain the remission of Income Tax that has been overpaid? I may explain that some 10 days ago I put a similar question to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and that in consequence I have received letters from various parts of the country and from persons in every condition of life complaining of the difficulty and obstruction placed in their way in recovering the Income Tax overpaid by them. The Chancellor of the Exchequer asked me to give him an instance of the state of things of which I complained, and I have done so, but I have not yet received any reply from him; and therefore I put my question again.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: The Chancellor of the Exchequer has requested me to give the following answer to the question:—"I think that the Inland Revenue authorities do now give reasonable assistance to persons who are seeking to obtain the remission of Income Tax which has been overpaid. I am afraid that the process cannot ever be otherwise than troublesome, especially to persons of limited education and business knowledge. I have brought the matter prominently to the notice of the Inland Revenue, but the hon. Member will readily see that an officer of that Department would fail in his duty if he were to repay tax before he had thoroughly satisfied himself that such repayment should be made. It is inevitable that, in a certain proportion of cases, this duty must involve delay in the settlement of claims." Of course, I am not myself able to reply to my hon. Friend's supplementary question.

MR. BIDDULPH: I beg to give notice that, whenever the Chancellor of the Exchequer returns to the House, I shall put another question on the subject, and, if necessary, move the adjournment of the House.

A DEFENDANT'S TRAVELLING EXPENSES.

MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he will state why Donald Macrae, crofter and carter, of Plockton, Ross-shire, recently summoned for keeping a dog without a licence, was required to appear before the Justices at Dingwall, a distance of 120 miles to and from his home, instead of at Plockton or Balmacarra, where there are Justices; and whether, having regard to the fact that the Inland Revenue Department in this case exceeded its duty and acted in contravention of the law, the case being dismissed, will the travelling and maintenance expenses of Donald Macrae be allowed?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: I am informed that no Justices' Court has been held at Balmacarra for five or six years. The cause assigned is the difficulty which has existed in securing the attendance of Justices. It does not appear that a Court was ever held at Plockton. This statement seems to receive corroboration from the fact that other cases (not Excise hearings) from Plockton and the neighbourhood are decided at Dingwall. It certainly seems most undesirable that defendants should be summoned to places so far from their homes. Every effort will, in future, be made by the supervisor to obtain hearings locally, and to avoid carrying cases from the neighbourhood in question to Dingwall. I cannot admit that the Inland Revenue Department have in this case exceeded their duty, or contravened the law, and I do not, therefore, see my way to direct that the travelling and maintenance expenses incurred by Mr. Macrae shall be allowed.

ADHESIVE STAMPS ON PRIVATE POST-CARDS.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the Treasury Committee has yet reported upon the question of allowing the public to use halfpenny adhesive stamps upon private cards sent through the post; and whether the Report of the Committee is favourable to that project; and, if so, will he state when the arrangement is likely to come into operation?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: The Committee referred to has made its Report, but the matter has not reached a stage at which I can make any statement as to the nature of its recommendations or the date at which, if approved, they could be carried into effect.

DEFENDANTS' TRAVELLING EXPENSES.

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether his attention has been called to the fact that three lads, Farquhar, Chisholm, Duncan Macrae, and Donald Macrae, of Letterfearn, Ross-shire, were summoned to appear at Dingwall (140 miles to and from their homes) on the 21st instant, at the instance of Sir Kenneth J. Matheson, baronet, of Lochalsh, and Mr. Harry Hall, sporting tenant, of Inverinate Lodge, Kintail, on a charge of contravening the Salmon Fisheries Act at Loch Beg on the 30th of May last; and whether, seeing they were acquitted of the charge, their travelling and maintenance expenses will be paid?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR, Clackmannan, &c.): The proceedings in the case referred to were, as stated in the question, taken at the instance of Sir Kenneth Matheson and his shooting tenant. The Crown takes no part in such prosecutions, and I have no power to interfere; but I may say that it is in the discretion of the Sheriff to find a private prosecutor liable in expenses if a motion to that effect is made at the trial, and he considers that the circumstances warrant an award of costs.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. J. MORLEY: I wish to announce a very small modification in the order of Business. We propose very shortly after 11 o'clock to-night to move to report Progress on the Army Votes, in order to proceed with the Committee on the Parochial Electors (Registration Acceleration) Bill. I believe that this proposal will meet with the approval of gentlemen on the other side of the House.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—COMMITTEE.

SUPPLY,—considered in Committee.

ARMY ESTIMATES, 1894-5.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) said, he wished to raise a point of Order. On the last occasion when the Army Estimates were before the Committee Vote 10 was actually put from the Chair, but progress was reported before it was disposed of. It was now intended to interpose Vote 2 and other Votes before proceeding with Vote 10. When Vote 10 was last before the Committee he was appealed to let it go through on the ground of its extreme urgency. It was said it was absolutely necessary, or, at all events, almost necessary that the Vote should be obtained that day or otherwise large public works of great urgency would be delayed. It was now proposed, however, to postpone the Vote until other Votes had been taken. He wished to know whether it was possible to take this course, inasmuch as Vote 10 had already been entered upon.

THE CHAIRMAN: Yes; it has been done over and over again.

1. £290,000, Medical Establishment, Pay, &c.

MR. JEFFREYS (Hants, Basingstoke) said, he desired to draw attention to the way in which candidates for the Army were medically examined. He referred to the matter last year, and he was then told to bring it up in the present year on the Medical Vote. Having waited for nine months for his opportunity, he now proposed to lay the matter before the Committee. He believed that great injustice had been done to one young candidate for the Army in consequence of the system of medical examination pursued, and he believed that the instance was not a solitary one. The candidate he referred to went up for examination some 18 months ago. He was passed "sound" by the medical officer and went in for the literary examination, but unfortunately failed to pass it. He then again passed the medical examination, but again failed in the literary examination. Having passed the medical examination twice, he was encouraged to continue his studies at great expense to his father, and he again went up for examination. The third time he passed the literary examination very successfully, being at the head of the list of candidates for the Cavalry, but he was certified to be unsound by one of the chief medical officers. This gentleman said that he had a slight defect in one eye. It was called a congenital defect, so that it had been born with him and must have been there on both occasions when he was previously examined by the medical officers. Under these circumstances, he thought that great injustice had been done to this candidate, and that there ought to be some more consistent and uniform method of examining candidates. He (Mr. Jeffreys) had heard of cases in which men wishing to become privates in the Army had been subjected to a very slight and cursory examination because they happened to be acceptable to the authorities. In his opinion, a medical examination ought not to be carried out according to the mere caprice of medical officers; there ought to be some hard-and-fast line laid down by which medical men should pass those who were examined as sound or unsound. The candidate to whom he referred was a member of the Militia Artillery. He could train a gun and use it in the field, and he had never known, until he was informed by the medical officer, that he had the slightest defect in his eyesight. Surely some appeal might be allowed from such a decision. He hoped the Secretary for War would tell the Committee distinctly whether he was willing to provide that there should be some uniform and consistent method of examining young men for the Army.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN, Stirling, &c.): The hon. Member has called attention to a case—that of young Mr. Nicholson—which I remember perfectly. What the hon. Member suggests is that, after a candidate for a commission has been examined by a responsible medical officer of the Department over which I preside, I, on being appealed to in the House of Commons to let the young man into the Service, should override and set aside the opinion expressed by the responsible medical officers who examined him, that opinion being confirmed and approved in all respects by the highest medical officers of the Army. I am asked to do this on my own responsibility alone. I was very much pressed in the case of young Mr. Nicholson, having long had the acquaintance of his father, who was for a long time a Member of this House, and I looked into the case. I found that he had a serious defect in his sight—serious not in the sense of immediately impairing the sight, but in the consequences which might follow from it, as it argued a weakness. So far from our Regulations with regard to eyesight as applied to candidates for commissions in the Army being too severe, if there is any fault to be found with them they are not severe enough. In the case of the Navy a boy is rejected if his sight is at all short of perfect. We in the Army do not go so far as that. We admit a certain amount of weakness of sight; but the Inspector General, the head of the Army Medical Department, told me in the most positive terms that he could not recommend any change or relaxation whatever in the Regulations, and that if any change was to be adopted it should be in the other direction. I am very sorry for Mr. Nicholson, as no doubt this decision cuts him off from a career for which otherwise he was well fitted. It is, however, impossible for me to interfere in the way desired by the hon. Member.

COLONEL LOCKWOOD (Essex, Epping) said, he saw the difficulty in which the right hon. Gentleman was placed, and he could hardly expect the right hon. Gentleman to override the opinion of the medical officer. What, however, he understood his hon. Friend (Mr. Jeffreys) to complain of was, that this young gentleman had been twice passed "sound" by other medical officers, and had consequently been encouraged to complete his study at the expense of his father, and that on the third examination he had been rejected. If Mr. Nicholson had been told at the first examination that his eyesight was defective there would have been no ground to complain; but when he had been twice passed, it seemed to be a case of considerable hardship that he should at the third examination be rejected.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) said, there was a great deal in what the hon. Member for Hants had said, because it did seem hard that a man who had passed twice already the examination of the Army doctors should on a third occasion by another Army doctor be rejected. It was a hard case; but, on the other hand, it was, he thought, an exceptional case. The grievance was mostly the other way—that was to say, that when an Army doctor or Medical Board had declared a man unfit appeals were made to the authorities, and influence was brought to bear on them to get the decision upset. The decision of one Army Medical Board should be final, and he protested against a second being called. He hoped the Secretary for War would put a stop to the objectionable practice of allowing a second Board to be called. There was another point he desired to mention in connection with the medical examinations. He thought the preliminary examinations should be abolished. It was hard on a lad that he should prepare himself for the Army, go through a number of examinations, and then, when he was about to enter, be suddenly told that he was utterly unfit. He now wished to call attention to one or two complaints which had been brought before him by medical officers as to their treatment at the present moment. In the first place, he would ask why they always got the Army Medical Report late? The information as to the state of the Army in 1892 they did not get until 1894. He did not know any Report relating to any Department which was issued to Members so long after the time at which it ought to be presented as the Army Medical Report. Then there was great complaint made—and he thought very properly—as to the constant change of principal medical officers at different stations. He was told that at some of the large stations even within a period of two years there were no less than four changes of principal medical officers. He thought that even at stations like Woolwich there were three; and there was one place, the name of which had slipped his memory, where there had been four. They were told that this was due to retirement and to the medical officers being ordered abroad, but principally to retirement. That raised another and a much larger question, which was this: He could not help thinking that in this Army Medical Service there ought to be a little more promotion by selection and merit than there was. Men only held their appointments by seniority and length of service. After a man had passed an examination to be surgeon-major he simply went up by degrees without any test whatever as to his merits. In these days—whether rightly or wrongly—they were submitting combatant officers to examinations at a much higher stage than that, and he did think that, looking at the importance of having as principal medical officers the best men they could get, there ought to be a little more selection, and mere longevity ought to be tempered with selection. Another complaint the Army medical men made was that they were treated differently to combatant officers in respect to the leave they got. In the case of a combatant officer if he had to go and qualify himself in any special way, the time so occupied was not deducted from his leave, but in the case of the medical officer it was deducted. When the medical officer had to go through what was called "a course of operation in surgery" for instance—which took about a fortnight, and sometimes three weeks—the whole of that time was deducted from his leave. He thought the combatant officers and the medical officers really ought to be put on the same footing. If the medical officers were doing this work in the interests of the Army, he thought it hardly fair that that fortnight should be deducted from their leave. On one particular point he could not speak with definite information himself, therefore he only threw this out as a suggestion. But he had had, bearing on the same subject, a great number of complaints from medical officers, and that was with regard to what was called the Professional Assistant of the Director General at Headquarters, connected with the Medical Department at the War Office. This official drew close on £1,350 a year for pay and allowances, and he had no duty laid down for him in the War Office List and Directory. He sat as President of the Standing Medical Board twice a week, and at other times had to sign requisitions for trusses, and order the examination of medicine bottles, and do similar clerical work. On the other hand, there was a civilian clerk called the Principal Assistant at Headquarters who had a host of details not connected with clerical work which he would be naturally well able to do, but his work was connected with the movement and promotion of medical officers and the Medical Staff Corps, and the arrangement of the roster, &c. As his (Mr. Hanbury's) informant suggested, surely the duties of these two gentlemen ought to be reversed. The clerical work might well go to the civilian clerk, and the work which was more truly medical, connected with the professional assistance of the Director General, dealing with promotions and things of that kind, ought to go to the more highly-paid officer; it was more within the ordinary sphere of his duties. This system, he was told, led to unnecessary expense, although he did not quite see that it did.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN asked if the hon. Member could give the name of his informant?

MR. HANBURY said, he should be glad to do that privately. He could not do it publicly, as unpleasant consequences might follow. He might say, however, that his informant was not a medical officer. The information given, however, was backed up by letters of complaint from at least 20 different officers, whose names he did not recollect. They complained, in the first place, that at Malta there were two administrative medical officers of high rank at once at the station, whereas there ought only to be one. They were both drawing high salaries, and one had practically nothing to do. Then he was told that a surgeon major general was now principal medical officer at the district headquarters at Colchester, which appointment had been always hitherto held by a surgeon colonel. Why, he asked, should they have a surgeon major general at a salary of £1,350 a year to do the work which had always been done by a surgeon colonel at a salary of £950? His informant said there were two surgeon colonels at the home district where only one should be employed, the second one having nothing to do. These were technical points on which he confessed his information was meagre. Still, they were points raised by people who understood the subject, and therefore were worth mentioning in the House. Another point was that the Director General of the Medical Department was so much tied down by correspondence, and so on, that he could not go round once a year and inspect the medical stations as he ought to do. The Commander-in-Chief went round once a year, but there were grievous complaints on the part of the principal medical officers and others that they never saw their chief, who was wrapped up in red tape and ministerial details in the War Office, though he might visit a station in the course of the year; yet they maintained that, being Director General, it would be a great advantage to the Service if he could make a point of inspecting the ordinary departments and the men under him more often than he did. This was a point that any civilian could appreciate, and he should think the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War would agree that it would be well if arrangements could be made by which the Director General would give less attention to correspondence and clerical details, and more to visiting the medical stations to see that all necessary arrangements were properly carried out.

GENERAL GOLDSWORTHY (Hammersmith) said, he agreed that it would be desirable to have some re-organisation of the Army Medical Department in the way the hon. Member for Preston suggested. As to the strict medical examinations, he thought they were desirable, owing to the fact that the necessities of the Service required that men should go abroad and submit themselves to unhealthy climates, and relieve those who could not bear the strain upon them. Attention had been drawn to a case of hardship where a man had passed two medical examinations, and on the third was rejected. He hoped the Secretary for War would give instructions that mistakes of this sort should not occur again, for it was hard on young men that they should practically lose a great portion of their lives in preparing for a profession which they could not enter. He did not mind how strict they made the medical examination, especially with regard to eyesight, but at the same time he thought that this was a case of hardship. But there were cases in which candidates who had suffered from temporary indisposition should be examined a second time to see if they were experiencing any bad effects. He thought the Army medical stations should be inspected by the principal medical officer just as other departments were inspected by their chiefs.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : As to the question of examinations, let me say this—that naturally it has always seemed to me to be very hard that a parent should incur the expense of preparing a boy for examination, and that a boy should go through the torture of a preliminary examination, and that after all it should be found that he is subject to some medical incapacity. But although it is rather hard, I am afraid that it is inevitable. If the boy is to be examined before the preparation begins and before the medical examination takes place, it will be necessary to hold these examinations all over the country, and it would be almost impossible to keep them uniform. I do not see how a thoroughly effective examination could be conducted in this way, and I do not know how the difficulty could be avoided. It would involve 700 or 800 candidates being examined on the same day, whereas under the present system the examination is only held with reference to those candidates who have been successful in the literary examination. Taking these changes into consideration, I do not see how we can avoid the unfortunate necessity of making the important medical examination come last. But let me say this for myself and those with whom I am associated: the hon. Member for Preston has a way of saying most awful things of the officials at the War Office. He speaks in the widest terms. He says on the slightest grounds, "Oh, these Medical Boards are subject to influence being brought to bear on them." Well, I beg to assure him that he will not find that this "influence" is exerted to any extent. There are cases in which it is used no doubt, but a candidate—or an officer if it is a question of promotion—is examined by a Medical Board which, say, pronounces against him. The man and his friends are not aware that he has a particular ailment or bad health. He goes to some distinguished specialist outside and is examined by him. He produces a certificate from the specialist to say that there is nothing the matter with him. From what the hon. Gentleman said one would suppose that the War Office immediately sponged out the decision of the Medical Board. The War Office is entitled, if they think there may be some ground for supposing that certain elements in the case have been disregarded, to send the opinion of the specialist to the Board and say, "Does that certificate modify your opinion?" Unless the Medical Board modify their Report, that Report remains in vital force against the candidate or the officer, as the case may be. Personally, I have always supported the opinion of the Medical Board, and besides that I find that the medical officers of the Department are of opinion that the decision of the Board should be acted upon, unless there is some special circumstances to modify it. But it is not the pressure of friends or the influence of distracted relatives which lead to the decision being modified. It is the well-supported opinion of some high authority outside, and that itself is not acted upon, but is merely referred to the Board to see whether it alters their view. Of course, I am in favour of there being uniformity in the action of these Boards as far as it is possible. In any experience I have had I have no reason to distrust the Boards in any way, or to believe that they are not otherwise than competent for the duties they have to discharge. The hon. Member for Preston complains of the Medical Report being issued so late, but that is because it is necessary to gather statistics in all quarters of the world, and they have to be tabulated and analysed before any conclusion can be arrived at. I do not know whether the delay is longer than these facts justify, but, at all events, this is enough to account for very considerable delay in producing the Report. Then the hon. Member apparently takes up certain complaints against the management and control of the Medical Department. Now I have seen all the complaints he has made to-day in what are called the Service newspapers, and in certain other newspapers which appear to gather up all the gossip, good or bad, of the men in the Service. I, however, find nothing definite in the complaints. Very often I find a strong animus in the criticisms, very much suggesting the frame of mind which some disappointed officer would be likely to display. At all events, I will take the hon. Member's points one by one. There is the question of promotion by merit. I am all in favour of promotion by merit when it can be done with fairness, and I believe that the present Director General is very anxious that that mode of promotion should be as much employed as possible. But there are great difficulties at present with regard to the higher ranks of the Medical Service. Those difficulties we are endeavouring to overcome by some little arrangement as to the necessity for compulsory retirement at certain ages, but that involves a reference to the Treasury, and is still under discussion. Then the hon. Gentleman suggested that medical officers should have leave with pay for the purpose of study. That complaint has often been made, and I should like to see the change made, but the difficulty is as to the expense. As soon as money can be afforded from other charges I shall be glad to do it. Then the hon. Member brought forward a complaint against the Headquarters Department. With reference to the Medical Headquarters of the Army, the criticisms which I have seen in the newspapers seem to have something in them of a personal feeling against the persons at the head of that Department. I am anxious to say that there can be no more efficient and more fair controller of a great Department than Sir William Alexander Mackinnon. His professional assistant at the headquarters, Dr. Jamieson, is also, as far as my opportunities enable me to judge, a most competent man, and is of the greatest assistance to Sir W. Mackinnon. But there is apparently some sort of a movement going on with a view to alter the relations of the high officers of the Department.

MR. HANBURY : So far as I understand, the complaint is not in any way personal. The complaint of the medical officers is that clerical work is given to a medical officer, and medical work is given to a civilian clerk.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : I was not satisfied that that was the case at all, but I will inquire further. The distinguished gentleman of whom I spoke in such high terms would not continue the system if it was so notorious and absurdly inefficient as that which my hon. Friend described. They have neither of them protested against it, but, as I have said, I am willing to inquire into it. I am satisfied that an arrangement which satisfies them cannot be so utterly unjustifiable as that which my hon. Friend has described. He says also that the Director General ought to move about more and inspect the different branches of the Department himself. Of course, it is very desirable that that should be done if it is neglected to any considerable extent, but I do not believe that it is. However, I will consult Sir W. Mackinnon, and ask him whether he can suggest any re-arrangement of the work which will increase the system of inspection ; but I have so much confidence in him and his assistant that I am sure they will not continue a system which is transparently open to these objections.

COLONEL LOCKWOOD (Essex, Epping), referring to the question of the medical examination of candidates, said that the view which suggested itself to him was that if a candidate was not medically fit to be an officer his literary ability was no use to him for that purpose, and if he suffered from any bodily infirmity he was not fit for Her Majesty's Military Service. The matter of the expense might be met by a small fee to be paid by the candidate himself. What he rose for was in reference to another point. Complaints, which he believed to be well-founded, had reached him to the effect that Woolwich Arsenal had not only defective sanitary arrangements, but that its sanitation was thoroughly bad. He should be glad if the Secretary for War would cause inquiries to be made into this matter.

*MR. PIERPOINT (Warrington) desired to bring forward a grievance, which, though it more particularly referred to one individual, concerned also the other Army medical officers, and the individual in question was one who deserved well of his country, and when grievances were found to exist in any branch of the Service they ought to be remedied by the House of Commons. He desired to refer to the case of Surgeon-Lieutenant-Colonel Briggs. The matter was discussed in March of last year; and in order to show that he was not dealing with an officer who was unworthy the consideration of this House, he would read some of the observations which were used by the hon. and learned Member for York (Mr. Lockwood) on the occasion of the previous discussion. The hon. Member for York described how Surgeon-Colonel Briggs entered the Army in 1875, serving with distinction in several campaigns, receiving the medal and clasp, and being mentioned in the Despatches. After the Soudan Campaign Dr. Briggs was promoted to the rank of surgeon-major, and whilst holding that position began all the difficulty which had since befallen him, and all the evil fate which had since pursued him. He referred to the unfortunate connection of Surgeon-Colonel Briggs with the painful divorce case concerning Lord Connemara. He must of necessity, at this part of what he had to say, refer to what the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War said concerning Dr. Briggs's retirement from the Army on that occasion. The reason that Dr. Briggs retired from the Army was because he was made a co-respondent in this painful case, and the honour of himself and a lady was concerned. The trial was due to come off in a few days when he received an order to embark for foreign service. He had the choice given him of whether he should retire, or by obeying the order he had received of missing being present at the trial, and of giving evidence in regard to his own honour and in defence of the lady. Naturally, as a gentleman, he preferred the former course, and he retired from the Service in order that he might give his evidence. The case afterwards came on for trial; there was no appearance against him, and he was afterwards cleared of all the imputations which had been made upon his honour. At the time this question was discussed before it was said that the Director General had dealt with Dr. Briggs as he would have done with any other officer, and had reason to believe that Dr. Briggs was taking a course by which, in effect, he would escape his proper share of foreign duty, thereby putting more of that duty on his colleagues. The Director General, therefore, ordered that officer to proceed to India, and finally placed before him the alternative of going on foreign service or retiring from the Army. On this very point he would remind the Secretary for War of an answer given to the Member for West Aberdeenshire (Dr. Farquharson) by the right hon. Gentleman's predecessor, Mr. Stanhope. Dr. Farquharson asked about the re-instatement of Dr. Briggs, and Mr. Stanhope gave the following reply:—

"Yes, I have further considered the case, and I am of opinion that Surgeon-Major Briggs should not suffer any loss as regards promotion in consequence of an act which was performed under a pressure which no one would have resisted. Surgeon-Major Briggs will accordingly be restored to the seniority he held before retirement."

He should like to say that it would be eminently satisfactory, both to the individual to whom he had referred, as well as to his professional brethren in the Army, if some sort of an inquiry could be granted into the case, so that Surgeon-Colonel Briggs might have an opportunity of stating fully what he had to say on the subject. He now went to the other part of the question, as to whether or not Surgeon-Colonel Briggs was entitled, as being retired, now to receive a pension, he having only received a gratuity. He confessed that, having looked through the Royal Warrant, it seemed to one unconnected with the Army like himself that it was possible almost to defend any course. These Royal Warrants were so difficult of comprehension that they suggested to one the idea of a Chinese puzzle. Article 1,079 said—

"A Departmental Officer, who on account of distinguished service has been granted under the provisions of Article 417 a higher rate of pay in his rank, or has received a higher rate of pay in consequence of promotion or distinguished service, shall, if in receipt of such higher pay at the time of his retirement, receive a gratuity with retired pay at the rate next higher than that with which his length of service would entitle him."

Of course, the right hon. Gentleman would say that Dr. Briggs was not in receipt of a higher rate of pay at the time of his retirement. That was true, but he ought to have been. When he referred to Article 417, he found it was as follows :—

“An officer so promoted, i.e., for distinguished service at a seat of war, shall be given the advantage specified in Articles 267 A, 267 B, or 268, of the rank above that attached to his service to Articles 268, 338 A, 339, 339 A, 400, or 400 A, as the case may be, when the officer next below him is given such advantages. In a case of distinguished service in the field, for which an officer may merit special reward, although there may not be sufficient grounds for his promotion, our Secretary of State shall have the power, with the concurrence of the Lords Commissioners of our Treasury, to grant him higher ratio of pay, but without alteration of seniority.”

It appeared certainly on the face of that Regulation that the smaller thing was to give a man increase of pay without promotion, and that the larger thing was to give him promotion with the advantages mentioned in these various Articles. Article 267 A, to which 417 referred, said—

“These ranks shall carry precedence and other advantages attaching to the rank indicated by the military portion of the title.”

If Surgeon-Colonel Briggs was not entitled to a higher pay on being promoted, as he was promoted for distinguished service in the field, he should like to know what were the advantages mentioned in these various Articles? because otherwise the promotion was a mere empty honour, giving a man a title without any material advantage whatever. He ventured to say the right hon. Gentleman could not produce any case where any medical officer in the Army had in similar circumstances been promoted and had not received pay. He was aware that the right hon. Gentleman was under the impression some little time ago that there was one case such as he referred to. He should first mention that medical officers of the same rank who were promoted on the same day as Surgeon-Colonel Briggs were in receipt of either larger pay for other offices held or, as in this one case, in receipt of larger pay according to his reading of the Royal Warrant. The one case to which he would more particularly refer was that of Surgeon-Lieutenant-Colonel Allen. He had half-pay as surgeon-lieutenant-colonel under the Indian Government, he was promoted for the same campaign as was Surgeon-Colonel Briggs, and he received a higher rate of pay, although at the time when he commenced to receive sick pay he had actually seen two years' less service than Dr. Briggs. He contended that in a case of this sort any technical or difficult reading of the law should not be applied to a man who had served his Queen and country well, whilst it would be no encouragement to the officers of the Army if they found the War Office was going to defend itself by reference to Regulations remote and almost impossible of interpretation, and technical details.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN was glad his hon. Friend had brought forward this case in so temperate and reasonable a spirit. It was a case in which a great deal of strong language had been employed from first to last. With regard to what he said last year with reference to the possibility of evasion of foreign service, he referred to that in justification of the somewhat strict and severe action which was taken by the Director General of the Medical Staff. At the time the Director General was dealing with Dr. Briggs it was his duty to bear in mind that the line that gentleman was taking was such as would lead to his escaping foreign service, to the detriment of some of his colleagues in his Department. That was what he (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) stated, and it was the true view of the necessity of the duty which lay upon the Director General.

MR. PIERPOINT: As a general principle, but not applying to an individual case.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, if he and the hon. Member were officers in that position, if they were to bring forward a number of reasons for staying in this country and evading foreign service, and if this course was persisted in for some time, that would be a very good reason for the Director General looking very closely into it and testing it as well as he could by every means in his power. The point rather was as to the treatment of Surgeon-Colonel Briggs since last year, and since he was restored to the Army. He need hardly say that the theory of the relations of the War Office to Dr. Briggs being pervaded by the odour of the Connemara case was perfectly absurd. Personally, he had no interest one way or the other. That was to say, he had no interest in the matter, or no sympathy in the least in that case. His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief had at last—after having been provoked to it time after time without taking any notice of the attacks made upon him—stated in the most open way that from first to last, neither directly nor indirectly, had he ever been influenced by anything of the sort. It was a complete delusion to think that that case had influenced the matter in the slightest degree. Putting that aside, therefore, and dealing with Surgeon-Colonel Briggs as they should with any other officer, this gentleman applied to retire at a certain rate of pay, and he claimed a certain rate of pay which, according to the Articles and Warrant which the hon. Gentleman had read, could not be given to him. When he was promoted he was not promoted to a higher rate of pay within his rank, but to another rank altogether, and he had the immediate benefit of that increased rank. But he could not receive any higher pay until he had served 20 years, because pay in the medical staff, whether the officer be a surgeon-major or surgeon-colonel, was governed by length of service, not by any other considerations, and Dr. Briggs would not have been in any circumstances entitled to the higher rate of pay of 25s. per day until he had served 20 years, nor on retirement would he be entitled to anything except a gratuity. The fact of his being promoted specially did not alter that circumstance in the least, because, whether in the case of a surgeon-major or a surgeon-lieutenant-colonel, the pay went by length of service. Surgeon-Colonel Briggs had been treated in exactly the same way as the officers who were promoted with him at the same time. Two of them were out of comparison, because of circumstances peculiar to themselves, one being in the employment of the Egyptian Government. Surgeon-Lieutenant-Colonel Allen was promoted under exactly similar circumstances on the same date, and he was treated equally with him. He applied for promotion at the rate of £1 2s. 6d. per day, which was given alike to surgeon-majors and surgeon-lieutenant-colonels of 15 years' service.

MR. PIERPOINT: Is Dr. Allen not in receipt of a higher rate of pay now?

Mr. Campbell-Bannerman

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN did not know, but Dr. Allen might have longer service than Dr. Briggs. At any rate, he was treated in an exactly similar manner.

MR. PIERPOINT: He could not have had 20 years' service.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, he would make inquiry as to that, but he was informed that the treatment was exactly similar. The individual circumstances might have been different, and he might have had a longer service than Dr. Briggs. At all events, Dr. Briggs had been treated on a principle from which the War Office could not depart, and a principle which was laid down in the Royal Warrants. An officer of this Department could not, until he had served 20 years, receive more than £1 2s. 6d. per day, and could not retire on pension but only on a gratuity. Dr. Briggs had retired on a gratuity, and had received a gratuity, and had received from first to last everything that an officer in his rank and with his length of service could receive. There had been nothing whatever done in his case which would not be done in the case of any other officer similarly situated, and he could assure his hon. Friend that if he doubted it he should be ready to point out to him—because it was too technical a matter to explain to the House—the precise clause in the Warrant, and the precise effect, so that he thought he could easily convince him that the matter was as he had said.

DR. KENNY (Dublin, College Green) said, he desired to bring before the notice of the Committee a matter of the most pressing importance to the community he had the honour to represent, because he thought that on this Vote would come the question of the sanitary condition of the Pigeon-House Fort in Dublin.

THE CHAIRMAN: I think that comes under the Works Vote.

DR. KENNY: On this Vote can I not raise the question of the main drainage and the conduct of the Government in relation to it?

THE CHAIRMAN: Not on this Vote.

DR. KENNY: There was a Departmental Inquiry into the main drainage, and the Committee of Inquiry included the medical men whose acts we are discussing.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : There is a Vote (No. 12) for the Army Sanitary Committee. That is the individual Committee to which this matter was referred, and as I am the culprit who referred it, and acted on the advice of such Committee, perhaps the hon. Member had better bring it on upon the War Office Vote in which I am concerned.

MR. A. C. MORTON (Peterborough) said that, in regard to the case of Dr. Briggs, he, with the hon. Member for York, had given a Notice on the question more than 12 months ago, and they had, as they thought, got the matter settled. It would appear, however, that the matter was not settled, and that the ill-treatment of Dr. Briggs continued. The Secretary for War did not think that Dr. Briggs had been badly treated, but, to his (Mr. Morton's) mind, there did not seem to be any doubt about it. It was all very well for the Director General to excuse his own conduct by saying that there were doctors who tried to escape foreign service. He had no right to make that charge against Dr. Briggs, for if there was one man who had done duty in the Service in foreign parts it was that gentleman. Dr. Briggs had told the authorities why he was required to stay in this country—namely, that it was incumbent on him to defend his own honour in the Law Courts. Notwithstanding that, the Director General made a paltry excuse for harsh treatment, and it was surprising to find the Secretary for War defending that excuse.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, the hon. Gentleman was misstating what had fallen from him. He had not said that Dr. Briggs was illtreated on that ground at all. He did not wish to go back into ancient history, and he would merely say that Dr. Briggs was reinstated on the admission that he had suffered under circumstances which did not leave reproach on him. All he (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) had said, which was made so much of afterwards, was in justification of the strict and almost severe attitude assumed by the Director General, who had to be always on his guard against cases which had a very plausible appearance at the time, and which might have the effect of enabling an officer to escape certain duty.

MR. A. C. MORTON said, he did not say there were not medical officers in the Army who escaped foreign service, though he had never heard of them. It has not been the desire of Dr. Briggs to do that, however. He was bound, as a man of honour, to stay in England, yet the Director General or the Commander-in-Chief tried to get him out of the country against the interests of Lady Connemara. Everyone knew how badly Lord Connemara had treated his wife and Dr. Briggs, and that at the last moment he failed to come before the Court. The statement of the Secretary of State made the case much worse against the Director General and the Commander-in-Chief. If it was said of the Commander-in-Chief himself that he desired to escape foreign service no doubt it would be right, but to bring that charge against Dr. Briggs was altogether out of the question. It was most improper to attempt to interfere with a witness before a Court of Law and with a man in the position of Dr. Briggs. Doubtless Dr. Briggs had shown a warm temper, but anyone else in his position would have showed irritation and temper. It was for the purpose of screening the vile deeds of Lord Connemara that the attempt was made to get Dr. Briggs out of the country—

THE CHAIRMAN : The hon. Member is altogether out of Order in making such statements.

MR. A. C. MORTON said, the salary of the Director General came under this Vote, therefore he had imagined that these observations would be in Order. However, the case was so well-known that he (Mr. Morton) did not desire to go further into it. So far as he was concerned, he should not have brought it up again to-day. He was glad the hon. Member opposite had done so, and he thanked him for his action, for these medical officers ought to be protected. He should not be afraid on this Vote or on any other Vote to do his duty, and defend the humblest doctor in Her Majesty's Service.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.) said, he had taken great interest in this case from the beginning, and had been in communication with Dr. Briggs with regard to it. He must say he regretted the tone the hon. Member for Peterborough had adopted. The hon. Member opposite had brought the case forward most temperately, and he had been fairly met by the Secretary of State for War, and in a calm and dispassionate view of the subject he (Dr. Farquharson) was bound to say he believed Dr. Briggs had been treated with justice. He thought Dr. Briggs's claim had been most adequately met, and he unreservedly accepted the statement of the Secretary of State for War. He did not believe that the Commander-in-Chief had been in the slightest degree actuated by the sinister motives that had been attributed to him. He would confess that at one time he held a different view, but he unreservedly withdrew anything he had said to that effect. He thought the hon. Gentleman opposite would be well advised in accepting the statement of the Secretary for War and allowing the matter to drop.

MR. HANBURY said, the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War had disposed absolutely of all the rumours current as to interference on the part of the Commander-in-Chief, and also of the idea that Dr. Briggs had been unfairly treated in the matter. The whole question resolved itself into this: Had Dr. Briggs been treated in the same way as Dr. Allen? The Secretary for War informed them that the treatment had been the same, and if that were so he did not see that Dr. Briggs had received any ill-treatment at all. The whole thing hinged on that. The right hon. Gentleman said they had both been treated alike; but the hon. Member who had introduced the question said that was not so, on the authority of Dr. Briggs himself.

In reply to Dr. KENNY,

THE CHAIRMAN said, that he had distinctly ruled that the question of main drainage in Dublin and the action of the Military Sanitary Committee could not be dealt with on this Vote.

*MR. PIERPOINT said, if he could show the Secretary for War that he had been misinformed as to Dr. Allen would he be willing to reconsider the case of Surgeon-Colonel Briggs, with the view of putting him in the same category as Surgeon-Colonel Allen, who was in India?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, he knew nothing about the case of Surgeon-Lieutenant-Colonel Allen, except what had been stated to him. He knew, however, that Surgeon-Lieutenant-

Dr. Farquharson

Colonel Briggs had received all the money he was entitled to receive under the Warrant—every penny. However willing he (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) might be to give him, say £1,000, he could not do it. He had no funds with which to do it. He could only give him what he was entitled to—no more and no less.

MR. PIERPOINT said, that if the right hon. Gentleman would give him the opportunity he would interpret the Rules within two hours as to obviously show that his contention was right.

MR. HANBURY said, he wished to put a question to the right hon. Gentleman as to the arrangements made for the treatment of the wounded in war. He was informed that very little preparation was made—that those officers and men, whose duty it would be to attend to the wounded on the field of battle, had little preparation in time of peace to fit them for duty. He understood that at the Autumn Manœuvres at the Curragh and at Aldershot it was intended to employ bearer companies and field hospitals, and he should like to know to what extent this was to be done. It was only to be at two stations, and the Army medical officers complained generally that neither they nor the men under them had an opportunity of practising the kind of work they would have to do on the battlefield. They ought to be instructed in the use of hospital boxes and haversacks. Looking at the enormous number of wounded there would be in future battles, this was one of the most important matters the right hon. Gentleman could have his attention drawn to. It was one in which the public took a great deal of interest. Why should they run the risk of their medical officers and staff being unfit to perform the important duties they were called upon to discharge on the battlefield owing to the want of training in time of peace? But not only did the medical officers complain of want of training, they complained, to some extent also, of the inadequacy of their numbers. It was difficult to obtain accurate information with regard to those matters in foreign Services, but he was told that the German Army Corps had twice as many regimental medical officers, twice as many field hospitals, and twice as many beds in the hospitals as there were in our Service. He was informed also that the number of men set apart in our Service for duty in the field hospitals had been very much reduced in recent years. The system was started in 1878, and the staff for each division then was : 8 medical officers, 2 quartermasters, and 142 non-commissioned officers and men. In 1884 the staff was considerably reduced, so that at present there were in attendance on each division of between 8,000 and 10,000 men only six medical officers and 120 non-commissioned officers and men, the quartermasters having been done away with altogether. There was also a complaint as to the small number of attendants in the field hospitals, there being only one to every seven men. In civil hospitals there was one attendant to every three and a quarter patients; and Lord Wolseley, in an article in one of the magazines, expressed the opinion that the smallest number ought to be—one attendant to every five men. There was another important matter in connection with this subject to which he desired to call attention. So far as he knew, at the present moment there was no branch of the Army Medical Service to look after the transport of the ambulance and water casks in time of war. The work was thrown on the Army Service Corps, and as that corps was not entitled to wear the Geneva Cross, they would not be protected under the Geneva Convention in their work of mercy on the field of battle. He thought that the men who were responsible for such work ought to have the protection of the Geneva Cross, and he trusted the Government would take this most important question into immediate consideration.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : I will refer what the hon. Gentleman has said to those who advise me in these matters. But I wish to say, as a general reply to all those complaints which are made in newspapers, and otherwise, and particularly by private Members in the House, that I hope hon. Members will remember that I am not absolutely without intelligent military advisers. To mention only two names, I have as advisers Sir Redvers Buller and Sir Evelyn Wood, and I cannot conceive two men likely to be more alive to every particular requirement for the benefit of the Army. I would appeal to hon. Members, therefore, when they receive letters pointing to the dreadful state of some department of the Army, and to the gross neglect of certain very obvious duties, to remember that there are at the head of affairs such high authorities as the officers I have mentioned. But still, I will bring before them what the hon. Member for Preston has stated, and see whether they agree with him in the matter of the care and of the transport of the wounded on the field of battle. As regards the question of training, there have been a number of men of the medical staff in training at Aldershot for some time. I saw them myself march past at the Queen's Birthday parade, and I was told by officers on the spot that they were doing splendid work, and that the training was of the most useful kind. There is something of the kind also at the Curragh. This is the first year that anything of this nature has been done. It is, no doubt, on a small scale at present; but we are feeling our way, and probably the work of training will be largely extended in the future. With regard to the numbers in the medical staff, the opinion is that they may with advantage be increased, and accordingly we have made a small addition to the medical staff in this Vote. I may add that I have made such an addition as the funds at our disposal will allow.

MR. HANBURY said, the right hon. Gentleman had complained of him for bringing this matter forward——

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : No; I did not find fault with the hon. Gentleman; but I cautioned the hon. Gentleman and other hon. Gentlemen to remember when they receive letters, or see stories in the newspapers, that at the headquarters of the Army there are men with heads on their shoulders.

MR. HANBURY said, there were also men with heads on their shoulders outside headquarters. There were the medical officers, and they complained that in time of peace there was no kind of training for the duties they would have to discharge in war. The right hon. Gentleman said there was no foundation for those complaints. But there was at least this foundation, that nothing had been done in the matter till this year. The right hon. Gentleman gave away his whole case when he admitted the importance of the subject, and stated that something had been done this year which had not been done in past years. He thought there was nothing more important than the taking of measures in times of peace, which would ensure the adequate care and protection of the wounded on the field of battle.

*SIR F. FITZWYGRAM (South Hants, Fareham) said, he desired to impress on the Secretary for War the absolute necessity of making some provision by which medical officers who returned home after five years of foreign service should have the opportunity of attending for six months, or certainly for three months, in some of the great general hospitals of Edinburgh and London. Medical science did not stand still, and any medical man who was out of the country for any time and away from general medical practice was liable to fall behind, and the opportunity of enabling him to get abreast of medical science again should be taken when he came home after service abroad. If this were not done the medical officers would go abroad for another five years, so that 10 years would elapse before he could get any opportunity for general practice.

COLONEL KENYON-SLANEY (Shropshire, Newport) said, he was glad to hear from the Secretary for War that steps had been taken to ensure, so far as it could be done by training in times of peace, that the wounded would be properly attended to on the battle-field. They should recollect that a great deal of the fighting, especially in our smaller wars, was done by small scattered bodies of men, for all of which it would be impossible to make complete medical arrangements. It would, therefore, be of considerable advantage if the officers, and possibly some of the non-commissioned officers, of each regiment had the opportunity of subjecting themselves to a course of medical instruction such as was known as "First Aid to the Wounded," so that in cases of emergency, when regular medical help was not available, they might be able to attend to the injured. He would also like to know whether any advance had been made in the shape and construction of the carts for carrying water which were sent out for service in dry countries when the Army was in the field. It was some time since he had had experience of those carts; but they were then most cumbersome, old-fashioned, and inconvenient, and that the water could only be obtained from them very slowly. Old officers would recognise how necessary it was in the interest of discipline, that the means of supplying water in the course of an engagement should be as rapid and as convenient as possible, for there was nothing so hard as to maintain discipline in a crowd of men half-mad with thirst, surrounding those carts and longing to get at the water, during a lull in the fighting.

*MR. PIERPOINT hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War would not think him too persistent with regard to the case of Dr. Briggs; but he desired to point out that the right hon. Gentleman had made no reply to the suggestion he had thrown out that the case ought to be referred to some Commission of Inquiry.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, he did not see the need for an inquiry. The question had been settled. Dr. Briggs had been restored to the Army, and now, at his own request, had been retired. With regard to the question about the water-carts, he understood that a new water-cart had been adopted and made in considerable quantities, and was believed to be the very thing that was required. The suggestion of his hon. and gallant Friend that there should be some elementary instruction in the care of the wounded in piping times of peace was a good one, and he would bear it in mind. He also agreed with the hon. and gallant Member for Fareham that medical officers who were on foreign service were liable to get out of touch with the progress of medical science, but the question of finances really stood in the way of carrying out the suggestion of the hon. and gallant Member.

GENERAL GOLDSWORTHY (Hammersmith) desired to say, in reply to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War, that they did not forget that there were good men at the head of affairs at the War Office. But what they complained of was that some of the recommendations of those men were not attended to, but, for financial reasons, were placed on one side. He was not referring to the present Government in particular, for the complaint had to be made in regard to every Government. He would say further, that the observations which were made in the course of this Debate were made in a friendly spirit, and were intended to point out, in the interest of the Army, serious defects in its administration.

MR. A. C. MORTON said, that last Session he had asked five or six questions on the subject of the training of the medical staff, the result of which were that the Secretary for War had promised that the training would be commenced this year. He knew that something had been done in that direction, but he was sure that everything that ought to be done had not been done. He could not understand what the right hon. Gentleman meant by "newspaper stories." If the right hon. Gentleman referred to him, he could tell him that he had got his information, which indeed the right hon. Gentleman had admitted to be correct, from a different source altogether. In any case, sneers at the newspapers were out of place, because the Army was indebted for many of its modern reforms to the exposure of evils by the newspapers. The training of the medical staff was a very important matter indeed, for there was a strong feeling in the country that the rank and file should be treated in the field of battle and elsewhere just as well as the officers. He was not satisfied that everything that ought to be done had been done, and he therefore hoped that the War Office authorities would pay more heed to the complaints and recommendations of the surgeons who went about amongst the men, and best knew their needs and requirements. He noticed in the Votes that the forage allowance of the surgeon-major-general was 7s. 3d. per day; of the surgeon-colonel 4s. 11d. a day, and of the other surgeons 2s. 7d. a day. He could not understand why there should be this difference in the allowances. Did the horse of the surgeon-major-general eat more, or was he fed in a different way from the horses of the other surgeons? His own opinion was that the horses of the ordinary surgeons who did the work ought to be better treated and fed than the horses of the mere figure-heads.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, the explanation of the differences in the allowances was that the surgeon-major-general had more horses and required more horses than the ordinary surgeons.

*SIR G. CHESNEY (Oxford) said, the replies of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War on this Vote confirmed him in the opinion which he had long held, that a change in the system of dealing with the Military Estimates was very much required, both in the interests of the Army and the interests of the country.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. and gallant Gentleman is not in Order in discussing generally the mode of presenting the Estimates. He must confine himself to the Medical Service Vote.

*SIR G. CHESNEY said, he would move to reduce the Vote for the Medical Service by £500, because he felt that the Committee had not sufficient evidence before it to form an opinion of the merits of the Vote. They had a number of medical officers serving at home and abroad, but they had no means of forming an opinion as to the reasonableness or otherwise of their services. The fact was that the business of Supply was practically crowded out by the other business of Parliament, and he submitted that it would be a very great improvement if this particular Vote and certain other Votes—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The hon. Gentleman must confine himself to this particular Vote.

*SIR G. CHESNEY said, he would do so, but he would suggest that it would be a great advantage to the Public Service, if not to the Committee, if the right hon. Gentleman would refer these Votes to a Select Committee for inquiry and extension.

THE CHAIRMAN: Those are questions for the House, and not for the Committee, on this particular Vote; the object of the Committee now is to discuss the items of this Vote.

*SIR G. CHESNEY said, he understood that one of the first duties of all Members of the House was to take part in Supply, and his contention was that they had not the information before them on which to form an opinion on the merits of the question. The House had got into the habit of passing these Votes upon inadequate information, and they owed a duty to their constituents and to the ratepayers to see that the business of granting Supply should be properly performed ; and he therefore ventured to submit to the right hon. Gentleman that this Vote should be referred to a Committee to examine it with a view—

THE CHAIRMAN : I have already told the hon. and gallant Gentleman that that is out of Order.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER (Belfast, W.) said, he should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman to give them some further information about a matter he had already addressed to him once this Session, and that was whether provision had or had not been made for the annual training regarding medical transports. At the present moment there was absolutely no transport at all for the Army Medical Service in time of war, and consequently the whole of the waggons, &c., would have to be furnished upon the outbreak of war. He asked some time ago what arrangements were made, and he was informed that the Army Service horses and drivers were allocated to the hospital corps in peace, and that practice would be followed in time of war. He asked if that practice was followed by any other Army in Europe, and whether members of a combatant corps would be permitted to wear the Geneva Cross and be regarded as forming part of the transport of the Medical Army Corps. The right hon. Gentleman told him it was the fact that in the other Armies abroad the practice was adopted, and that there was no doubt that the Geneva Convention would give the necessary permission. He was sorry to say he did not take advantage of the opportunity given him by the right hon. Gentleman of consulting with an officer in the Department, but he believed there was some misconception on this point. It was true there were certain persons who were allowed to wear the brasseur of the Geneva Convention, and if not absolutely entitled they received protection under fire. But there were two brasseurs, one a temporary brasseur which was given to the men employed in the removal of the wounded after a battle, but that was mainly to protect them from being shot as deserters, and to escape the charge of malingering. There was also the brasseur of the Convention, which was given to all the men who were properly enlisted in the medical corps. The question was what they were to do in their own Army in time of war.

Sir G. Chesney

Hitherto their wars had mainly been with semi-savages. In the Boer war the Boers refused to recognise the Geneva Cross in the case of transport drivers who belonged to a combatant corps, and he (Mr. Arnold-Forster) thought they were justified when these men might be engaged one day in transporting medical stores and the next in transporting ammunition, and therefore they ought not to be recognised as non-combatants. If the difficulty was to be got over in time of war they must contribute a certain number of drivers and horses who were now on the strength of the Army Service Corps and assign them to the Army Medical Corps. He admitted this was a difficult operation, because every man and horse they assigned for this duty must be taken from the Army Service Corps as it existed at the present time, and the difficulty he imagined would be in regard to the provision that was proposed to meet the demand from members of the Reserves. He presumed the matter would have been well thought out, though he had not seen any statement to the effect that it had been done or was contemplated. He should therefore be glad if the right hon. Gentleman, in the interests of the Medical Service, would inform them what arrangement had been made and what shrinkage it would cause in the Transport Service and in the Army Service Corps. There would have to be a very large increase made in both Services in case of mobilisation. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would be able to give them some information on these points.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : Perhaps my hon. Friend will allow me to make some further inquiries into this matter. The point raised is one of very great importance, but I am not in a position to answer it now.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) said, there were two or three small matters he wished to ask a question or two about, and the first of these came under Sub-head 3. He had a friend an apothecary, and he pointed out that if reference was made to the appendix apothecaries ranked by their pay relatively with surgeon captains and surgeon lieutenants. This friend of his pointed out that whilst the surgeon captain only got 15s. a day the apothecary got 18s. a day, and he also said that they were not adequately considered in their relation to other ranks. There were surgeon captains, surgeon colonels, and surgeon generals, and why should there not be an apothecary captain, an apothecary colonel, or an apothecary general? [Laughter.] Hon. Members might laugh, but the one was not more laughable than the other. If they had a surgeon who preferred to be called a captain, a colonel, or a general he could imagine the same ambition animating the breast of an apothecary. He understood there were two apothecaries, but that the one at Woolwich was to be abolished, and if so who was to make up the medicines? His friend pointed out to him that the compounding of medicines was of the utmost importance, and that the lives of very many persons might be at the mercy of an apothecary's mistake, and his friend claimed that these apothecaries should be continued, and therefore he asked why the remaining apothecaries of England were to be abolished? Then he came to the question of the medical staff, and in regard to this matter he found that the postal expenses amounted to the sum of £1,050 in the year. Taking the instance of Ireland, there he found the postage was put down at £250 during the year. That seemed to be an enormous sum. Assuming they were prohibited from using halfpenny postage-cards, that would represent 60,000 letters in the course of the year. What could be the necessity of writing 60,000 letters from Ireland to England? Was it that the system was too much centralised, that no one was allowed to do anything without first referring to London? If so, here was a case in which much money might be saved and the efficiency of the Service greatly increased. He thought when the Committee came to realise that £1,050 was put down as postage they would see what an enormously extravagant sum this was, and from it would be able to judge how extravagant all these items were. His third and last point was with regard to civilian medical practitioners, the cost for whom was put down at £7,600. He asked why this was? He could perhaps suggest a reason for it, as he had some experience of Army doctors, not upon his own person, but through living in places where these surgeon captains, colonels, and generals were stationed, and his experience was that wherever the officers could find a private practitioner they did so. He hoped this was not creeping into the Service generally, and if it was it ought to be altered. When they had a staff of Army surgeons he could not see why they should employ these private practitioners at all.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, that the civil practitioners were only employed at those scattered stations where the Army surgeon was not available; but he admitted that the Estimate did seem rather a large amount. With regard to the apothecaries, he was glad to say they were an expiring body, and as they ceased their places were taken by a class of non-commissioned officers who were called compounders of medicine, and this was supposed to be a better arrangement.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, he thought it was extremely dangerous to hand over the compounding of medicines to these practically untrained men. The compounding of medicines should be done by trained persons who knew a poison from a blue pill.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, these men were better trained than some of the old apothecaries.

*SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.) thought that one observation made by the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. A. C. Morton) ought not to be passed over in silence, and that was when the hon. Member referred to the want of care and solicitude for the men on the part of their officers. If it was once the case it certainly was not at the present time, and so far now from there being any want of care and solicitude, the very opposite observation applied. He had taken some interest in the matter of ambulance work, and he thought the House was indebted to the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury) for giving prominence to this question of practical exercise in medical skill and training, and he could not help thinking that a little knowledge of ambulance work in the Army generally would be highly advantageous. Men might, for instance, be taught first aid and how to act as bearers. He also thought that great advantage would accrue not only from the lectures that had been suggested, but from instruction in physiology, and he hoped this point would not be lost sight of. He was glad that the right hon. Gentleman had taken seriously the question of transports and the immunity of the men when engaged in this work. It was a question that demanded very serious consideration, as grave doubts existed on the subject; and the sooner they were settled by International Convention the better. He would not go into the point which had been ruled out of Order with regard to the examination of the Estimates by a Select Committee, but he thought he might say, without being out of Order, that the method of dealing with the Estimates did not give a real and effective check to the over-expenditure; therefore, if they could be referred to a Committee for examination, reserving questions of policy for the House, it would be most advantageous.

MR. BRODRICK (Surrey, Guildford) said, that in regard to this point—

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member must not pursue that subject; it is not in Order.

MR. BRODRICK said, he only wished to make an observation which was germane to this Vote, and he thought it would not be out of Order. Whatever might be the course pursued with regard to the Estimates generally, with regard to this Vote it had been most carefully overhauled by a Committee of the House of Commons. This was one of the Votes to which great exception was taken in 1887, and it was examined, both in that year and the following year, by Lord Randolph Churchill's Committee, and an opinion was expressed of considerable weight—namely, that having in view the large increase in the Medical Service during the Egyptian War, the time had come when considerable reductions should be made. That was taken very much to heart by his right hon. Friend the late Mr. Stanhope, who committed the Vote to a Committee of the War Office, which went into the matter, not to see how it might be reduced, but to ascertain what was necessary to put the Medical Service in an efficient form to go into the field. He had not the Estimate before him, but he knew the inquiry resulted in a great reduction, and that the Vote had kept very much on the same level ever since.

SIR R. TEMPLE (Surrey, Kingston) said, before they passed this Vote there were one or two questions he wished to ask, and he trusted the right hon. Gentleman would be able to answer them offhand. They related to items under Sub-heads E and F. Under Sub-head E the cost of medicines was put down at £16,000 for this year, and it was exactly the same amount last year. He thought it was somewhat peculiar that it should be exactly the same year after year, but he dared say it was susceptible of explanation. With regard to the contractor or contractors with whom the War Office was in the habit of dealing, he might remind the right hon. Gentleman that in previous years there had been considerable questions on this point raised before the Committee of Public Accounts, but the question had not been raised this year, otherwise he should not have brought it before the Committee. In previous years there were lengthened discussions upon it from the fact that the War Office had always dealt with one particular firm. That particular system might have its merits, but it inevitably aroused jealousy outside, and the question before the Committee was whether the contract to some extent should not be thrown open. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman might be able to give them a satisfactory answer, and at the same time perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would explain how it was that exactly the same sum was taken year after year. The other matter related to Item F, appropriations-in-aid. Here again the same amount was taken as was taken last year—namely, £12,000 odd. Might he ask how these appropriations-in-aid were derived? No doubt they represented receipts, the sale of stores, or were derived from income to the Medical Body. There was an increasing jealousy in auditing the accounts in regard to these appropriations-in-aid, and if the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. A. C. Morton) was in his place he would bear him out in that. Before he resumed his seat he would like to ask whether they were to understand that the very important question raised by the hon. Member for Belfast (Mr. Arnold-Forster), as to the immunity of the transport staff in time of war, whether that immunity from being fired upon or treated as combatants had received full consideration?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said that, taking the points raised by his hon. Friend, the medicines were now supplied by open tender; that was to say, that certain chosen firms were adopted, their premises were inspected by medical officers, and the drugs certified to be of the proper description. The same principle had been adopted in Ireland, so that there was no longer the same monopoly that existed formerly. The next point of the hon. Member was as to the appropriations-in-aid. These arose in various ways—sale of stores, &c.—and the amounts had practically stood at the same figure in the last few years. The other question was in regard to the point raised by the hon. Member for Belfast (Mr. Arnold-Forster). He would make full inquiry into the question raised by the hon. Member as to the immunity of the Transport Service in time of war, and he would give the information required upon Report.

SIR R. TEMPLE (Surrey, Kingston) asked how it happened that the amount spent on medicines was the same every year? He also inquired whether the contracts for the supply of medicine were open.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN stated that medicines were supplied to the Army by open tender, limited to certain chosen firms whose premises were visited by Inspectors. The same system prevailed in Ireland, and its results so far had been satisfactory. He would make full inquiries as to the immunity of transport, and would, upon Report, give the desired information.

MR. HANBURY asked, with regard to contracts, whether the contract for surgical instruments had been at all enlarged or left open?

*THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. WOODALL, Hanley) said, the contracts were made on the same principle, the articles so obtained were subjected to strict inspection, and the decisions were arrived at after very careful calculation as to the capacity of the firms tendering to fulfil the contracts, and the competitive prices.

Vote agreed to.

2. Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £600,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for the Pay and Allowances (exclusive of Supplies, Clothing, &c.) of the Militia (to a number not exceeding 185,743, including 30,000 Militia Reserve), which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1895."

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.) said, he had no desire to set himself up in opposition to distinguished military authorities on this subject, but having had 10 years' experience as a cavalry officer he desired to say a few words. He pointed out that whereas the Army Reserve was for the Army and the Naval Reserve for the Navy, the Militia Reserve was not a reserve for the Militia, but at once went to the Army on a declaration of war. This took away 30,000 men, and other reductions previously mentioned by the hon. Member for Belfast brought down the nominal 125,000 available men of the Militia to something like 40,000 bayonets. Moreover, this force was without cavalry, artillery, or transport, and possessed no means for mobilisation, while half the officers only used the Militia as a stepping-stone to the Line. He could not therefore help thinking that the hon. Member for Belfast was not very far out in describing the Militia as a patent and recognised fraud. Anyone possessing practical knowledge of the subject would agree that fraudulent enlistment was also a cause of considerable weakness to the Militia, while the system of inspection was so ineffective that it really was little more than a fraud and a farce. A man with knowledge of the various times at which different regiments were called out for training might enlist in half-a-dozen, so that the Secretary for War would be counting the same man as six efficient soldiers when he was probably in reality not one. No doubt the Secretary for War had endeavoured to stop this fraud on the country, but the only way he could hope to succeed would be by calling a number of regiments at the same time. Another point was that the same battalions should not be constantly picked out for training at Aldershot. When he was there he always saw the same regiments sent down, for the purpose, it seemed from their appearance, of disgusting the Regulars with the Militia. Then, promotion should be made interchangeable in both battalions, as the regiments were territorial. If those suggestions were carried out we should get a more valuable Force on which we should be able to rely.

sons into the Army as officers, and condemned the present system of mechanical preparation for examination by "cramming." A few years ago the cost of putting a young man into the Army was £450, for his commission and perhaps £50 for preparation for examination. It was now £1,000, taking three years as about the period taken in passing examinations. Young officers entering Militia regiments were, in addition, handicapped by expenses, and the country on that account lost the services of suitable young men. It would be a great advantage if service in the Militia could count towards obtaining a commission in the Army. By the "cramming" system young men were not properly educated. The country did not get, therefore, proper service, and the whole system was carried on in such a way that only men of a certain class got into the Army.

MR. COCHRANE (Ayrshire, N.) suggested that it would be easy to reduce the number of "black sheep" in the Militia by sending round non-commissioned officers to the different regiments in training, so that the men who had been guilty of fraudulent enlistment might be picked out and punished. He had often found that the removal of those "black sheep" had benefited the discipline of the company he commanded. Officers were always glad to get them taken away as a nuisance. Having been for some time with the Militia, he could say that it comprised many good, well-conducted regiments, of far finer materials indeed than many in the Line. For chest measurement, general physique, and drill they compared favourably with any Line regiment in the Service. He quite agreed with what had been said by the hon. and gallant Member for Essex as to the inutility of the inspections. He did not think the suggested interchange of officers between the battalions desirable. The headquarters of his regiment were in Stirling, and the rest of it in Renfrewshire. Militia officers, as a rule, were not very anxious to get into the Army; they knew they could leave the Service at any time, and they did not intend to spend their days in the profession. The retirement system was unsatisfactory. A great deal might be done in the non-drilling season to give the men a little musketry practice, as was done in the case of the Volunteers, who were able to get their practice at a very small outlay. If a few of these general ideas were acted upon by the Secretary for War he would get a valuable and cheap body of men at a cost of £13 6s. per head, as against the many times greater cost of the Regular troops.

*MR. RENTOUL said, he desired to mention the case of Colonel Stewart, commanding the Donegal Artillery Militia, whose headquarters were at Letterkenny. Two or three weeks ago he had put questions to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, and he gathered from the answers he then received that the right hon. Gentleman thought that he (Mr. Rentoul) was not in full possession of the facts; but the answer given showed that it was the right hon. Gentleman himself who was not in full possession of the facts. At any rate, his facts and the right hon. Gentleman's facts were remarkably different. This was an extraordinary case; and in order that the Committee might understand it, he would explain, first, that Colonel Perry commanded the Artillery of the District and Colonel Stewart commanded the Donegal Artillery. Colonel Perry, in transmitting a Report in reference to two of Colonel Stewart's non-commissioned officers of the Permanent Staff, writes—

"I would further invite the attention of the G.O.C. to Colonel Stewart's general remarks, the tone of which I consider most improper and unfair, as it shows a very decided personal animus towards the Members of the F.S."

That was signed by Colonel Perry; and there he made a most serious charge against a man in Colonel Stewart's position—namely, that he, an officer of rank and a gentleman of very high standing in that county, would be guilty of personal animus against two men who had been in the first instance private soldiers, and were now sergeants—men, of course, in a totally different rank of life to Colonel Stewart; and of course if he were acting as stated he would be acting disgracefully and would be unworthy to command a regiment. Now, he (Mr. Rentoul) would read to the House what Colonel Stewart had written in reference to the matter on the 31st January, 1894, to the Commanding Officer (Colonel Perry) for transmission:—

"Sir,—I have the honour to request that you will forward for submission to the proper authorities this my application for the re-transfer to the Regular Forces of the undermentioned non-commissioned officers of the Royal Artillery, who belong to the P.S. of the unit under my command,"—

Then the names were mentioned, which he (Mr. Rentoul) would not give, but would call them A and B—a company sergeant-major and a sergeant on the permanent staff of the regiment—

"on the ground of their inefficiency and indifferent conduct."

As regarded A, Colonel Stewart said—

"I have repeatedly applied through you for his re-transfer, commencing with my letter dated 25th July, 1891, in which I stated my opinion that this N.C.O. was unfit for his position, and that he had been recently tried by District Court Martial for drunkenness on the line of march, when the regiment paraded at Letterkenny on 21st May, 1891, for embarkation. I have to refer you to my letter, dated 1st June, 1893, calling attention to the serious inefficiency of the P.S., in which I enclosed a certificate from the medical officer of the unit as to this N.C.O.'s state of health, and in which I stated that for the preceding two years A had only been an encumbrance. Again, he was on the 11th October, 1893, made a prisoner on charges of, first, absence from a sergeants mess-meeting when treasurer, and, second, gross irregularities when treasurer, and was severely reprimanded. With further reference to this N.C.O. I have also to quote my letter of 9th November, 1893, and reply dated 12-12-93 to A.A.G.'s minute dated 22-11-93 on my letter of 9-11-93. Regarding B, I beg to enclose copy of your memo. 4309-93, dated 6th of January, 1894, together with my reply thereto, from which it appears that you consider him quite incompetent to perform his most elementary duties. He joined the P.S. on 10th of June, 1893, at Letterkenny, being in possession of A.F.B. 241. He was drunk on duty on the 30th November following, and severely reprimanded. I have also to invite attention to my memo. of 26th November, 1893, in reply to yours of 7-11-93, copy enclosed. In view of the fact that the Donegal Artillery Militia is under orders to train at Harwich this year, the training to commence on 9th May, I am especially anxious, and for obvious reasons, that each member of the permanent staff should be efficient in his duties, and eligible as regards health, conduct, and appearance. The N.C. officers I have named herein, I beg to repeat, offer but an evil example to the militiamen, and their presence with this unit I deem to be absolutely prejudicial to its discipline, and this opinion applies, if possible, in an intensified degree to A."

That letter was signed by Colonel Stewart. The Committee would observe that the charge made was one not merely of personal animus, but of very decided personal animus towards the permanent staff as a whole. But the fact was, that Colonel Stewart only referred in his letter to two individual members of the staff, both of whom had been punished for drunkenness, and one for drunkenness on the line of march, and he also was a prisoner and punished for having made away with the funds of the sergeants' mess. Both men had, moreover, been found fault with and objected to by Colonel Perry and General Black, commanding at Belfast. One of the men applied for transfer to the Volunteers, but he was refused by General Black on account of his inefficiency and his entire unfitness for the Volunteers. The other non-commissioned officer was sent by Colonel Stewart to Colonel Perry, who reported on the 6th January, 1894—

"The man you have sent to me is an inefficient man, totally ignorant of infantry drill."

Consequently the proof of the inefficiency of this man came from Colonel Perry himself on the 6th of January, yet on the 31st of the same month, when Colonel Stewart reported this sergeant as inefficient, Colonel Perry wrote to headquarters to the effect that Colonel Stewart was guilty of very decided personal animus towards the permanent staff. Now, the House would observe the astonishing fact that the first Report of the inefficiency of this man came from Colonel Perry himself. As military Members of the Committee well knew, the permanent staff of a Militia regiment was made up of 20 or 30 soldiers detailed from the Regular Army in order to train Militiamen in their duties, but it was only against two members of the staff that Colonel Stewart complained. Colonel Stewart naturally took the strongest possible objection to the Report of Colonel Perry, for he believed it to be absolutely false and without a shadow of foundation in any shape or form. He therefore went to the authorities at the Horse Guards, and was advised by them to take no further steps until he heard from them. As two weeks passed and he received no intimation he wrote for the return of his documents. Next he wrote to Colonel Perry, under date 16th of March, 1894, who had made this grave charge against him, and who was his immediate superior officer, and through whom, of course, he had to communicate with the higher authorities, denying the accuracy of the allegation, and pointing out that he had never even seen one of these men towards whom he was accused of having shown personal animus.

He further asked for a Court of Inquiry in accordance with the Queen's Regulations, under which an officer was empowered, if he thought himself wronged by his commanding officer, to make such a request. This letter was written on the 16th of March, and another on the 2nd of April, and a reply was subsequently received from the General Officer commanding in Belfast, stating that he agreed with Colonel Perry in objecting to the tone of Colonel Stewart's letter. At about the same date a letter was received from Lord Wolseley. It was addressed to the General in command at Belfast, and was to the effect that he saw no necessity for a Court of Inquiry being convened, whereupon Colonel Stewart applied for the redress of a wrong under the 42nd section of the Army Act, which letter of Colonel Stewart crossed the letter from Lord Wolseley. To this latter letter of Colonel Stewart Lord Wolseley replied that the matter was closed. Now, had Colonel Stewart been in the wrong, no doubt a Court of Inquiry would have been granted. All Colonel Stewart desired was an investigation at which he could be present, and if then he was found to be not absolutely right he was quite willing to be relieved of his command, or to be punished in any other way. He (Mr. Rentoul) did appeal to the Secretary for War to give his serious attention to this question. Did not the right hon. Gentleman consider that a gross, grave, and shocking charge had been made against Colonel Stewart in accusing him of personal animus towards men who had risen from the ranks? It was a disgraceful charge, which Colonel Stewart declared to be utterly false and entirely without foundation. Would the right hon. Gentleman look upon a letter such as Colonel Stewart's as disrespectful if addressed to him by a subordinate? The fact was that the letter was rightful in tone in every way. The charges made against Colonel Stewart were absolutely and entirely untrue. There was surely something very rotten in the state of affairs under which such a thing occurred as that Colonel Stewart's immediate superior officer accused him of personal animus, while Colonel Stewart replied—in effect, accusing his superior officer of absolute falsehood in the matter. There ought certainly to be a further investigation into the matter.

Mr. Rentoul

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, he was not very anxious to interfere with the authorities in the matter of this quarrel. It was quite possible that the expression "personal animus" was a strong one, and personally he held it was too strong to have been used. But the general question they had to consider was the condition of the regiment, and was the permanent staff in the condition alleged by Colonel Stewart?

MR. RENTOUL: But Colonel Stewart makes no charge against the permanent staff.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: He did make one.

MR. RENTOUL: No; he only made a charge against two men, asking that they should be removed.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: On the 2nd of March, 1894, Colonel Stewart saw Sir Francis Grenfell at the War Office, and said the permanent staff was composed of men from the Royal Artillery of bad character and bad conduct.

MR. RENTOUL: Referring, of course, to these two men.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: No, to the general permanent staff.

*MR. RENTOUL: But the charge made against him of personal animus was made on the 17th of February, 1894, and so could not be affected by any conversation held on the 2nd of March. Besides, Colonel Stewart absolutely denied ever having made such a charge to Sir Francis Grenfell, and it was odd that he should make it in conversation when it had never been made in writing. It was easy to mistake or misquote conversations, but hard to get away from a voluminous correspondence, and the authorities must be hard pressed when they quoted a conversation of March 2 to account for a letter written on February 17. No wonder a Court of Inquiry was refused if this was the sort of evidence that would be put before it! The fact was, Colonel Stewart was absolutely in the right, and there was no answer possible to his just request for redress.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, he preferred to deal with the somewhat larger aspects of the case. There was a general accusation against the permanent staff made to the Deputy Adjutant General at the War Office, and the course which the War Office had taken, and of which he approved, was to direct that the regiment should be placed under strict supervision. The General Commanding the Eastern District had been directed to look into the matter, and to form an opinion as to the condition of the regiment. That course at once removed the matter from those mere local disputes to which the hon. Member had referred. The General Officer Commanding in Belfast, and the Field Marshal Commanding in Ireland, agreed that it was very undesirable to reopen the case. The point of discipline having been dealt with, there remained merely the question whether the regiment was efficient, and that point would be best settled by the course which had been taken. He did not think that any good purpose could be served by bringing up the disputes between the two officers concerned. Colonel Perry and Colonel Stewart, in the House of Commons, or by their attempting to express an opinion on the matter. It was no doubt a wrong thing for one officer to impute personal animus to another officer; it was a strong thing to do, but it was not deserving of all the importance which had been attached to it in this case. Occupying the position he did he was anxious not to interfere more than was necessary with the Generals commanding districts, who were responsible for discipline. He had no wish to override their decisions. He thought justice had been done in the case by placing the regiment under such conditions of training and supervision as would enable the authorities to come to a sound conclusion as to its condition. Under those circumstances the best course for him to pursue until he had received the Report was to abstain from any interference.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER (Belfast, W.) said, he was very familiar with the facts of the case, although he was not personally acquainted with the two officers. There was, he felt, something more involved in this than a mere quarrel; it was really a matter of discipline, and the fact remained that an officer was compelled to retain under his command men whose records he could not approve. He feared there was a good deal of misapprehension as to the actual points at issue, and he felt it to be a serious consideration that this colonel and the two non-commissioned officers should be compelled to continue the performance of their duties without any sort of inquiry being held. But his main object in speaking that afternoon was to call attention to certain details connected with the Militia Force, the importance of which deserved careful consideration. The nominal strength of the Militia Force was 134,000 men, and the country paid something like £600,000 a year for it, but it was nothing like efficient. He challenged contradiction when he stated that the actual strength was very many thousands below the nominal strength, and it certainly was a reasonable computation to say that the real total was something like 30,000 (sic) below the number on paper. That seemed to be a monstrous statement, but he had it from a high authority. He was indeed very sorry to believe it was well founded, and he would ask the right hon. Gentleman if nothing could be done to bring about a better state of affairs, and either to relieve the country of the burden or ensure that it got better value for its money. At present it was absolutely useless as a fighting Force, and, at any rate, they ought to reduce it to some semblance of an Army as the term was understood in modern times. Now, although the establishment of the Militia was returned at 134,000, the enrolled strength was only 124,600. Then there was the Militia Reserve of 31,000 included in the total. He did not think it ought to be so included, as the object of keeping up the Reserve was to bring the Line battalions up to their normal strength in case of mobilisation. These two items alone reduced the effective strength by 40,000 men and he had still further reductions to make. At the last annual training 5,500 men were absent with leave—a very small percentage, no doubt—but no fewer than 13,767 were absent without leave, making a total deduction to be made of 58,000. Further than that—and these were not deductions made upon speculation—2,000 might be taken off as double enlistments, for he had heard of cases in which the same man had enlisted in two, three, and even four different battalions, so that in the case of mobilisation they would only count as one, although in the official Returns they counted as two, three, or four, as the case might be. Finally, a deduction of 14,000 had to be made for the men who passed annually out of the Militia into Line regiments. It might be that the recruiting would make up for the withdrawals, but he doubted it. It seemed to him that an effort had been made to reduce the Militia, particularly by the Line recruiting sergeants, but he thought it was a great mistake to bring the Militia into the Line—at all events, to count them as being both in the Line and the Militia. The Line relied upon an annual supply of 14,000 men in order to make up for the men going out. There was another feature which might be of interest to hon. Members who were not acquainted with the circumstances connected with the Militia battalions in Ireland. The standard of efficiency was in some cases admirable, but there were other cases in which the regiments had not gone through the necessary preliminary training that would enable them to take the field. A very considerable reduction had to be made in respect of untrained Militia recruits, and he could not state the number of Militiamen who were untrained in musketry. He was reminded that these men might go through their training at any period of the year, but at some period of the year at least half the recruits were untrained in musketry, and were without any practice in manœuvring with large forces. These men, therefore, could not be estimated as effective members of the Force. He believed that from the causes to which he had referred there were 70,000, if not 100,000 men who ought to be deducted from the total establishment of the Militia. He could assure the Committee that he had not brought this matter before them without having obtained some information in regard to it. His contention was that if the state of things he had set out was approximately correct, the country at all events ought to understand it. The Militia Committee which had sat did not appear to have brought about any improvement in the system which he felt bound to attack.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, he should like to deal with this matter at once. He admitted that there was unfortunately a very serious discrepancy between the nominal strength of the Militia and the actual strength of the Force. That discrepancy, however, had been very much exaggerated by the hon. Member. As a beginning he swept off with a stroke of the pen the whole Militia Reserve. Of course it was an error, and a common error, to suppose that in the case of invasion the Militia Reserve would join the Army. Nothing of the kind would take place, but the Militia Reserve would be mobilised with the Militia. Hon. Members were aware that the Reserve was available for service abroad with the Regular Army in case of a foreign war. But for the purposes of home service it would serve with the Militia. Then, as he understood, the hon. Member contended that 5,500 men ought to be deducted as the number of men who were usually absent on leave. He did not agree with the hon. Member. There were officers and men absent with leave in the Army, but he thought no one would suggest that they ought to be deducted from the strength of the Army. The hon. Member said that in case of war the number of men on leave would greatly increase. He doubted that very much, and rather thought that the number of men on leave would disappear, for the spirit of officers and men would induce them to return to the colours. Another deduction made by the hon. Member was that of 14,000 men recruited into the Line from the Militia. His advisers were not disposed to think that these men should be deducted, because they would be available for Militia purposes up to the moment of their joining the Line. Then a Militiaman who joined the Line was replaced by a recruit, and thus a balance was preserved. The figures given by the hon. Member were portentous, and, as he had said, exaggerated; but it was true that a serious deduction must be made from the whole Militia strength of 124,000. When that deduction was made there remained about 90,000 effective men. He was glad to believe from the information supplied to him that in recent years the Militia had immensely improved in efficiency. Many regiments had attained a standard which was marvellous considering the difficulties under which they were trained and maintained. One remedy for double enlistment, to which evil several hon. Members had alluded, was the simultaneous training of regiments in different districts, and that course was being taken to a large extent. Another means of preventing double enlistment was to try absentees after detection by Courts Martial instead of by the civil power, and considerable results were expected from the adoption of this plan. Some progress had already been made, but no Report as to the results of the steps adopted had yet come in. These, he thought, would be most effectual cures. The hon. and gallant Member suggested an interchange of officers for promotion. He thought that might be possible when the two regiments concerned belonged to the same county. They all knew what county susceptibilities were, and he should be very suspicious of any arrangement that would prevent the integrity of the Militia of each county being maintained. With regard to the question of officers entering the Army through the Militia, undoubtedly that system was adopted to supply the want of junior officers in the Militia, and they would have been hard put to get them but for that system. He did not think that the system was altogether satisfactory, though he did not think it was so objectionable on the ground of expense as the noble Lord who raised the question seemed to think.

*CAPTAIN BOWLES (Middlesex, Enfield) said, it was only fair to remember that a recruit had two months in which he was made fit for service in his regiment, and at any given time 45,000 recruits ought not to be struck off the effective strength. The Militia was our second line of defence, making up deficiencies in the Regular Army, and it was the duty of the authorities to see that the training of the men came as near as possible to that of the Regular Forces. There were one or two other points which he wished to put before the Secretary of State. The first was that in his opinion it ought to be made much easier than it was at present for officers of the Militia to qualify at Hythe. He knew that a certain number in each regiment were allowed to go to Hythe each year, but thought that if a man was patriotic enough to desire to improve himself as an officer, he ought to be allowed to do so. As to the shooting of the Militia, they perhaps did not enjoy the same advantages that other branches of the Service enjoyed. They were armed with Lee-Metford rifles, and at Aldershot they were given black powder to use with them, and everyone knew how difficult it was to sight that particular rifle when black powder was used. With regard to dual enlistment, he could only say with respect to the company he commanded, not a single man had been taken away as having enlisted in another regiment. He believed the figure had been put unduly high. He felt that the method of mobilising the Militia in the Home District during the last three years was a move in the right direction, and would tend to make the Militia an invaluable service.

MR. RENTOUL (Down, E.) said, with regard to the case of Colonel Stewart, he understood, Colonel Stewart would be satisfied if the expression used by Colonel Perry were withdrawn. The Committee would see that the charge of personal animus still stood. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had now delivered an expression of opinion which he was very glad to hear and which he understood to be unqualified. Colonel Stewart was one of the most prominent men in his (Mr. Rentoul's) native county, and it was a serious thing for him to be accused of personal animus against men under him. If the Secretary for War were accused of personal animus against the hall porter in the War Office he would no doubt consider that a shocking charge had been made against him. Why a Court of Inquiry could not be granted he (Mr. Rentoul) entirely failed to see. Are the authorities afraid of holding an inquiry? Colonel Stewart courts inquiry. He had no desire to press the matter unduly if the right hon. Gentleman would give him an assurance that he would try and obtain the withdrawal of the words complained of. The right hon. Gentleman had said that the Donegal Militia was in very good order, and that a Report was to be made upon it shortly. The Donegal Militia had always been reported on most favourably by the authorities ever since Colonel Stewart held the command, and it was on account of the great pride he took in the regiment, which had been commanded by his relatives since it first came into existence, that he wished that two disgraceful sergeants should not remain in it, and that he so objected to being accused of personal animus. If the right hon. Gentleman would say he considered that the expression ought to be withdrawn, that, at all events, would be something gained.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : I cannot, of course, undertake to withdraw an expression which I have not myself used, but I have already said it is a strong expression, and I will see whether any modification or qualification can be made in it, although I have not gone so far as to give it unqualified condemnation. I wish to correct a misapprehension that appears to prevail as to Courts of Inquiry. It is quite a mistake to suppose that there is any right on the part of any officer to have a Court of Inquiry. That has been laid down by General Order. A Court of Inquiry is only instituted by the Military Authorities for their own information.

*MR. RENTOUL: What about the 42nd section of the Army Act? Had it no meaning? Had it no effect? It was said that under our law there was no right without a remedy, and he wanted to know what remedy there was for an officer who had been slandered by his superior officer if that superior had not the manliness either to prove the truth of his statement or to withdraw it and apologise for it?

MR. BRODRICK (Surrey, Guildford) said, that the matter had now been closed up, and it was impossible to have it reopened. He thought, however, that his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Rentoul) had obtained practically what he desired, as the Secretary of State had expressed his opinion that the language used was unfortunate and was too strong for the occasion.

MR. RENTOUL said, he would drop the matter at present, and await with confidence the action of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. COCHRANE (Ayrshire, N.) remarked that there was a great want of more drill-sergeants for the Militia. When the non-commissioned officers of the permanent staff who were employed as cooks, sergeants of the mess, sergeants of the canteen, and so on, were deducted, very few sergeants were sometimes left to drill the companies. He had seen over 100 men drilled by one non-commissioned officer. It was perfectly obvious that under these circumstances the drill could be little better than a farce. If there could be what he might almost term a locomotive staff of young corporals trained for the purposes of drilling to go about from one regiment to another, the result would be greater uniformity in the Militia, and the men would be drilled in up-to-date style. He trusted that the Secretary for War would carefully consider the point.

MR. R. G. WEBSTER (St. Pancras, E.) said, he gathered from the speech of the hon. Member for Belfast (Mr. Arnold-Forster) that he considered the Militia Force in this country was to some extent decreasing in numbers, and that it was not in such a satisfactory condition as it had been in past years. He found that that was not at all the fact, for on looking at the Report with regard to recruiting in the Army and in the Militia during the last five years he found that whereas there was a net decrease in the Militia of 1,865 in 1890, there was a net increase of 212 in 1891, of 6,256 in 1892, and of 5,042 in 1893, and he found further that the increase in 1893 would have been much larger than in 1892 had it not been found necessary to check the recruiting by raising the standard of height to a minimum of 64 inches for the Infantry and of 66 inches for the Artillery, and by stopping all enlistments of growing lads between 17 and 18, even if up to the standard. He thought, therefore, that the hon. Member for Belfast had not done justice to the oldest constitutional Force in the country. He was told by a large number of Army officers, at the time when the Reserve was called out, that they never wished to see men of better physique, or men who did their duty better than the men of the Militia who were sent to them on that occasion. He regretted, however, that the Militia did not receive the official recognition which other branches of the Service received from the authorities. A good many years ago, shortly before the time when Lord Cardwell altered the Army system from the numerical to the territorial, he wrote a short work upon the amalgamation of the British Army, and he would venture to point out to the Committee, that had the scheme which he then suggested been carried out, he believed it would have improved not only the Army, but the Militia more than the scheme which was then carried out, because it would have preserved the esprit de corps, which was such a valuable factor in military service. There were in the British Army about 109 regiments,—some double battalion, some four battalion—and he ventured to say that it would have been a very much better system than the system then inaugurated if, when they had inaugurated the territorial system, they had knocked off the nine odd regiments, which were practically Indian or Canadian regiments, and stuck to the number of 100, that they had made a reserve of—

THE CHAIRMAN : I do not think the hon. Member is now in Order.

MR. R. G. WEBSTER said, he would go back to his point. What was the case at present when the Militia Reserve were called out? They practically made the first battalion of the regiment a skeleton regiment, absolutely useless for any purpose; it was nothing more nor less than a cadre. They should have one strong battalion of Militia, say, 1,200, and the remainder should be placed in the second battalion. The Line regiments at present, no doubt, were strengthened, but the Militia were nothing more nor less than a recruiting ground for the Army. He thought it would be wise if they went back to a system that he believed worked very well for a great number of years in keeping up the strength of the Militia battalions—the system that was called “bringing money,” which was as follows:—When a Militiaman went back to his village or mine, if he could persuade any of his comrades that it was a good thing to serve in the Militia, he received a small gratuity from the State, and in that way they had practically a large and easily workable recruiting force for the Militia. No doubt the increase in recruiting might be attributed to the fact that a larger proportion of men had been thrown out of work during the last three years by the prolonged strikes. There was a system of advertisement now adopted which brought more widely to the attention of the masses the advantages to be gained by enlistment in the Militia. He found from the figures before him that there were in the three countries in 1891, 100,000 effective Militiamen; in 1892, 106,195; in 1893, 112,901; so it was apparent that the Force was not a decaying one, but was going on satisfactorily. He thought it was false economy on the part of the War Office not to provide a proper head-dress for the Militia, when they were paraded for review, of a similar kind to those worn by the Line regiments. The head-dress would probably last from 10 to 15 years, and he was told that the officers of the Militia themselves would in many cases be pleased to provide it out of their own pockets. He was not going to dilate upon the past services of this branch of the Army, nor to refer to the fact that a large number of Militia served in their uniforms at Waterloo, but he would point out that when the Government of the Member for Midlothian called out the Militia Reserve a few years ago, he believed that almost to a man they turned up to serve in their regiments. That was a great and important fact. They strengthened the Army to the extent of from 20,000 to 30,000 men. It should be remembered also that the Militia were a body of men who could be withdrawn from a civil life with greater ease than the Volunteers. He, therefore, hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would give as much official recognition as possible to the Militia, and that he would do everything in his power to strengthen the Force.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER said, he would like to say a few words with regard to the remarks of the hon. Gentleman, who had very naturally criticised, and to some extent impugned, the figures he had given. He must say that he adhered to his point with regard to the enlistments from the Militia to the Line, and contended that when the men passed to the Line their place must be filled by recruits, who, for practical purposes of warfare, were useless without a considerable amount of training. The Secretary of State for War had made a statement of great interest. The right hon. Gentleman had, for the first time, settled the query of what would be done by the Militia Reserve in case of war, and he had told them that the Militia Reserve would not be required and utilised to fill up the Line battalions.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, they would be used to strengthen the Army on all those occasions when the Militia itself would not be required.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER said, that the first thing that must be done, whatever hostile operations were engaged in, must be the mobilization of the Regular battalions, and his view was that the Militia Reserve was an absolutely essential element for strengthening and filling up the Line battalions. This was also the view taken in the Army Book of the British Empire. There were 143 Regular battalions, apart from the Guards, and they were dependent for mobilization on the Army Reserve. The Infantry Reserve, as apart from the Guards, had practically reached its maximum figure of 52,800 men. If they took 350 men from a battalion, which was an exceedingly low estimate, so as to bring the battalions of the Line up to the full war establishment, that would take 49,000 men, leaving a margin out of the Infantry Reserve at present available of 3,800 men. He believed he was correct in saying that there must be an immediate and large draft upon the Militia Reserve, not for meeting any emergencies of war, after war had been declared, but at the first outset of war for the mobilization of the Line battalions, and for bringing them up to their full strength. No one could suppose that the Line battalions, even with the addition of the 350 men from the Army Reserve would have been filled up to their full strength. There would be very large numbers of recruits and inefficient soldiers, who would be withheld from service in the front, and there would be such a shortage in the Infantry battalions when mobilized for war, as must make it necessary to call upon the Militia Reserve in order to fill up the Line Infantry battalions in case of war. He claimed to have made out a fair case, and he had some reason for abiding by his original statement. He claimed he was right in deducting the whole of the Militia enlistments in the Line, because if they were in the Line they would keep these men, who were just becoming valuable soldiers in their battalions. The moment they tried to keep them in the Militia battalions when they had learned their duty, they took away 14,000 men from the Line. It was perfectly true they could replace them by 14,000 more recruits, but in case of war such recruits could not take the place of 14,000 more or less trained soldiers. On the other point, he thought he was right in saying they must consider the Militia Reserve as a reserve for the Line, and not as a reserve for the Militia, and if they were to regard the Militia as of any value at all, they must make the deductions he had asked the Committee to make.

SIR R. TEMPLE (Surrey, Kingston) said, that though, of course, it was no part of his duty to support the statement made by the Secretary of State for War, yet he might for a few moments be permitted to support indirectly what the right hon. Gentleman had said with reference to the military statistics now before the Committee with regard to this particular Vote. He had listened with great interest to what had fallen from the Member for West Belfast and the Member for Essex, and he must say it was hard to understand with what object such speeches were made. If they had been made with a view of finding out defects in the Militia, then they had had the excellent result of eliciting the valuable testimony that the Militia was a very valuable National Force. But all the imaginable improvements in the Militia were to be made, then the Vote would be not £630,000, but double or treble that sum. He did not believe that the British public were under any delusion as to the Militia; what they understood was that the Militia was a valuable reserve and a portion of the National Forces. He had never heard anybody acquainted with the matter claim that the Militia was more than that or represented anything else than a portion of the Reserve National Forces of the Empire. He submitted that it was a very valuable Force, notwithstanding all the criticisms that had been made upon it. He would say it was better not to disparage unduly our national reserves, because nothing good came of criticism of that character. As regarded military statistics bearing upon the Militia, how did the case stand? Not in books written outside by military critics, but in the figures before the Committee, what was the fighting strength of the Militia? It was returned at 135,000 men, of whom 30,000 formed the Militia Reserve, and 105,000 the ordinary Militia. How far did these figures represent realities? The hon. Member for Essex said that, in the first place, 30,000 men must be deducted for the Militia Reserve, and in this he was borne out by the hon. Member for West Belfast. He was not concerned, after what had been said by the Secretary of State for War, to say whether the 30,000 ought to be considered a portion of the Militia or of the Army Reserve. The Committee could form its own opinion, having heard what was said in the highest official quarters, but, be it an Army Reserve or a portion of the Militia, it must be returned somehow, and it was at present returned in the Militia. To say—as had been said by the hon. Member for West Belfast—that these men were counted twice over might be a figure of speech, but it was not a statistical fact. How did he show that? He did not take any outside authority, but he took the very Returns in the Estimates, which were in the hands of hon. Members. The Militia Establishment was returned as 134,000, and the effectives at 121,000, and in that number was included the Militia Reserve. That was, again, quite apart from the ordinary Army Reserve. The Regular Reserves were kept absolutely and distinctly separate from the Militia Reserve. It was, therefore, clear that the 35,000 men in the Militia Reserve were not counted twice over in the matter of military statistics. That was the kind of statement made in that House, and read by civilians outside, which unless at once explained might lead to misapprehension. It was said that the number of men enlisted into the Army ought to be deducted. What was the truth as shown by the actual figures upon the Committee? The Militia establishment was given as 134,000 men, and the number of effectives, by the latest Return—that of the 1st of February—was rendered at 121,000. There, of course, was the difference of 14,000 men. He inferred from that that on the 1st of February 121,000 men were returned as the efficient or present strength of the Militia. There they had a difference of about 14,000 men, and that would fully account for any possible deduction on account of the men who were being recruited into the Army; therefore he said that according to the Returns there were present in February last, notwithstanding any possible transfers to the Army, 121,000 men, which was the strength of the Militia. The next deduction which it was proposed should be made was that on account of absentees. He did not in the least, as an Englishman, think that in the event of danger or necessity of any kind that all these absentees would be absent. The men on leave would return at once, and he thought a great number of the absentees, who were away without leave, who simply did not turn up because there was no very great necessity for them to do so and so on, would certainly turn up if their country were in danger. He knew that technically they were termed deserters, but he did not believe they were deserters in the popular acceptance of the term. Their case was simply that of non-attendance, and there might be hundreds or thousands of men of that class out of this large number of Militia. There was the further deduction which, it was said, ought to be made on account of recruits. Recruits were necessary in all Armies. The only thing was that many of the recruits were, perhaps, raw. The hon. and gallant Member for Enfield, however, assured them that they were more or less trained, or soon became so. There was nothing very wonderful in a certain number of recruits being untrained or comparatively ineffective in the ranks of the Militia, but that did not diminish their actual combatants in the force as a whole. He contended there was nothing whatever to lessen for a moment the national trust in the Militia, not as a Regular Army at all, but as a fighting body forming a valuable adjunct to the Reserve of the National Forces.

MR. HANBURY said, that his hon. Friend had shown that the Militia was not at all in the bad state which might have been assumed from previous speeches. There were one or two points which he should like to bring to the notice of the right hon. Gentleman. The first was with regard to the magazine rifle. So far as he understood the matter, there was an abundant supply of magazine rifles at the present moment, something like 400,000 having been manufactured altogether. There was, he believed, one regiment of the Line which had not got the magazine rifle and several battalions of the Militia. Why all had not got them he could not understand. It could not be a question of expense; the rifles were in stock, and surely the Militia ought to be armed as rapidly as possible with them. But perhaps it was no good to supply them with rifles until they had ranges. If that was not the explanation it was perfectly inconceivable why they should not take steps as rapidly as possible, having the rifles ready, to put them in the hands of the troops. If they had not the ranges he should like to know from the right hon. Gentleman what steps were being taken to procure them. This dead-lock could not go on much longer. It was no good arming the troops with rifles if they had not the ranges, and the money would be thrown away. Only one-third of the Militia had been supplied with magazine rifles because they had not got ranges. It was high time that the War Office should take some effectual steps to deal with the enormous evil of the want of rifle ranges for practically the whole of the Forces. As to the Militia, as far as he could make out from the figures, the ideal establishment for the Militia at home was 134,000 men, but only about 121,000 were actually enlisted, of whom only about 106,000 attended last year's drill. This difference between the nominal establishment and the actual number of enrolled men he did not quite understand, because the Regular Force was recruited up to its full strength, and surely in times like these they ought to be able to get the full establishment of the Militia. Was it the policy of the War Office to let the numbers of the Militia remain below the nominal established strength? The Militia establishment was put at 134,000 men; they had not got that number, but only 121,000, and he should like to know what was the explanation of not having the remaining difference of 13,000 men? Surely some more vigorous steps should be taken to have the complete establishment. If it was the policy of the right hon. Gentleman to keep up the complete strength of the Militia, why did he not take steps or at least make some suggestion to effect that purpose? There was no difficulty in getting recruits, so that that could not be the reason for the present state of things. He should like to know, at any rate, what was the policy of the Government with regard to the Militia strength.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN replied that there was the difficulty of money. The enrolled members of the Militia had increased, but with all the claims upon them for other Services they could not spend more money on the Militia. As long as they got sufficient recruits for the Army and to maintain the regiments in sufficient strength, he was not disposed to push recruiting by extraordinary means, which would involve a large additional expenditure. Last year, indeed, they found the recruiting for the Militia was so lively that they had to take steps to check it. He did not see why there should be any hesitation in stating that fact in the House of Commons. As to rifle ranges, he was glad to say that the difficulties connected with the range in County Dublin had been got over, and they intended to proceed to exercise the power they possessed to set up a rifle range in that district. Of course, they had similar difficulties all over the country, and if he were to take ranges at every point he should be obliged to come to the House of Commons for a very large sum of money. They had gone on as well as they could. Again in this case the difficulty was a financial one, and he did not think that in the present state of affairs it was desirable to take extravagant measures for the provision of rifle ranges. With regard to the issue of the Lee-Metford rifle he believed that many Militia regiments had requested that the new magazine arm should not be issued to them this year. Others retained the old rifle in consequence of the want of suitable ranges.

MR. BRODRICK said, he could not consider the answer of the right hon. Gentleman as at all satisfactory, and he should be excused for saying that he thought the War Office had gone to sleep over this question of the issue of the magazine rifle. It was already two years beyond the time at which it was contemplated that the Lee-Metford rifle should be in the hands of the Militia, and it really was not a sufficient excuse for the Secretary for War to say that requests had been made to him from certain Militia battalions to postpone the issue. He was afraid he must challenge the statement of the right hon. Gentleman as to the want of suitable ranges for the new magazine rifle. He had presided over a Committee which sat some time ago to consider the question of rifle ranges, and that Committee had declined to be guided entirely by the War Office views on the subject. He was sure the right hon. Gentleman would find in the Report of that Committee that they disagreed with the view of the War Office that the rifle ranges which had been used for the Martini-Henry rifle could not be utilised for the new magazine rifle, and that they had come to the conclusion that some of the existing ranges at least might be used. He would urge on the right hon. Gentleman that he should take up this subject in a more active spirit. It seemed that only 49 out of the 161 battalions of Militia had been supplied with the new magazine rifle. Suppose the Militia regiments were mobilised for home defence in the case of an invasion, what a grave danger they would run by having some of the regiments supplied with the old rifle and some with the new, both rifles requiring different ammunition, and having a different range. The matter was altogether too important and too serious to be put off with the answer that some of the Militia regiments desired to retain the old rifle because they wanted to avoid the trouble of learning the new rifle, for that really was what it amounted to.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, this request of some of the Militia regiments was founded on the difficulty of obtaining safe rifle ranges for the magazine rifle. He believed that in one case where the magazine rifle was served out to a Militia regiment the men were drilled with that arm and had to shoot with the old weapon.

MR. BRODRICK said, he had already stated that a Committee of experts, appointed by the House of Commons, had found that the case of the War Office with regard to the ranges for the new rifle was not made out, and that several of the ranges might be used for the new rifle. They had been discussing for the last hour whether they should count the Militia Reserve in the Line or in the Militia. Suppose they turned them into the Line; as they would not have been trained in the magazine rifle, they would not therefore be fit to join a regiment which had been trained with the new weapon. That might prove to be a grave danger. It certainly was a serious loss of power, for they should recollect that the number of Militiamen who go into the Line each year was as much as 10,000, and, as most of these men were trained with the old rifle, the Committee would understand what a waste of training there was going on because all the Militia regiments were not served with the new weapon. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would take up the question of the ranges in a different spirit from that which he had shown; otherwise, the same excuse as had now been made would be reiterated year after year for not issuing the magazine rifle to the Militia. They had got the men and they had got the rifles, but they had not got the ranges in all cases, and he very much doubted whether they had got the ammunition. He urged the right hon. Gentleman to look a little more closely into the question of ammunition also. He had pressed this question on the attention of the right hon. Gentleman time after time since he had left Office two years ago. He believed the reserve of ammunition for the new rifle was not adequate to the demand that might be made upon it, and he would again urge on the right hon. Gentleman to give the subject his most earnest attention.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN submitted that the discussion on the question of rifles and ammunition for the Militia would have been better taken when the Committee came to consider the Vote relating to Warlike Stores. It would be quite a mistake to suppose that the Government were at all apathetic in this matter of the provision of rifle ranges, or in seeing that there was a sufficient supply of Lee-Metford ammunition. With regard to ammunition, the hon. Member was well aware of the difficulty created owing to a lawsuit that was still in progress. But the Government had expedited the manufacture of powder both in their own factories and by inviting as many traders as possible from outside. He would again point out that the issue of the new rifle to the Militia regiments would surely be of no advantage to them when, though trained with the new rifle, they had to shoot with the old. The question of how best to acquire ranges for practice with the new rifle was receiving their most careful attention, but they could not take any violent steps in a matter that involved the expenditure of such enormous sums of public money. The Government had not lost sight of the question, and were giving every due attention to it with a view to finding out how most economically the money could be spent.

COLONEL NOLAN said, he could endorse, at any rate, one remark that had been made by the Secretary for War. For the last 20 years he had taken the deepest interest in the question of new ranges, and certainly during that time the Government could not have been accused by anyone of having shown a desire to take any violent steps to acquire new practice grounds for the men. There was no doubt whatever that the Militia were sufficiently trained to "march past" on review well enough, though not of course so well as the Guards, and, so far as he could judge, that was all that was expected from them by the Inspector General. No facilities were given them to learn shooting, and he had never heard anyone suggest that a Militiaman could shoot at all. He was on the Committee to which reference had been made by the hon. Member for Guildford; and when the Inspector General was examined before it he had tried to get from him his opinion as to how the Militia shoot. But if they were to put a pair of thumb-screws on the Inspector General they could not get a straight answer from him on the subject of the shooting of the Militia—and he told him so at the time—though the Inspector General was perfectly candid on every other question. Probably the inability of the Militia to shoot was to be accounted for from the fact that their rifles were constantly being changed. It was perfectly clear that, whenever the Militia had to take their share of active service, they would be found absolutely unfitted to go into action. Ranges were to be got, of course, for a reasonable figure in all parts of the country, if the Government only took the trouble to look about and find them. In his own County of Galway he often drives over 20, 30, and 40 miles of uninhabited country where the Government could easily and cheerfully get rifle ranges. They were also to be procured easily in England. There was Dartmoor, for instance—

THE CHAIRMAN: It is not in Order to discuss the subject of rifle ranges in any detail on this Vote.

COLONEL NOLAN said, he thought the Chairman's ruling was extremely good, because shooting had nothing to do with the Militia, and the Militia had nothing to do with shooting. He believed that as to shooting the Militia knew nothing whatever about it; but perhaps when the Committee got to the Vote for Warlike Stores they would be able to discuss the subject more fully.

MR. S. HOARE (Norwich) said, he could not agree with all the unfavourable remarks that had been made by his hon. and gallant Friend about the Militia. He believed they were a body of men alive and ready to do work when they were called upon to do it; and he regretted that the Secretary for War had so strongly given it as his view that no more money would be spent on the Militia under any circumstances.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I did not say so.

MR. S. HOARE said, the right hon. Gentleman had at least stated that he did not think his colleagues would support him in any much larger outlay on the Militia. He wished to draw attention to the fact that the colour sergeants in the Militia found that their position was not nearly so good as it would have been had they continued with their regiments, instead of joining the permanent staff at the various depôts of the regiments. This was especially the case with regard to the number of hours they were now expected to give daily to their duties, and to the very much smaller rate of pension they would be entitled to, as compared with the colour sergeants of the Regular Army. They believed, when they were persuaded to remain on the permanent staff, instead of volunteering for service in the Regular Army, as many of them would have done, that their services would be required only at certain hours on certain days; that they could live at home, and supplement their occupations by engaging in other occupations. But they now find that their whole time was taken up with work at the depôt; that they were only receiving 2s. 6d. a day, while colour sergeants in the Regular Army were receiving 4s. 6d. a day; and that when they were 55 years of age they only received a pension of 10½d. per day, while the colour sergeants of the Regular Army received 2s. 9d. per day. It was those colour sergeants that had trained the colour sergeants of the Regular Army, who were now receiving much larger pay than themselves; and no wonder, therefore, that they felt they were hardly treated when they had been persuaded by their officers to join the permanent staffs, contrary to their own wishes, and found that their position was far inferior to what it would have been had they joined the Regular Army. He was sure that if the right hon. Gentleman fully considered the position of those men—and they were not many in number—he would find that they had grievances which called for redress. Their work now was much more arduous than that of the colour sergeants 10 or 15 years ago. They could spend scarcely any time at home, but were obliged to devote all their time to military service. If the right hon. Gentleman would consider the case of these men—who were few in number, and many of whom had volunteered for active service in time of need—if he would improve their position or hold out to them some hopes of a pension, he was sure it would be doing that which would be appreciated by men who had served their country well, and were very much disappointed at the position they now found themselves in.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, the case of these men had already been before him, and it had been completely considered. He knew what good men they were, but, at the same time, they were an expiring class of the old permanent staff of Militia sergeants, and their places were being filled by men on Army engagement. He did not think they were badly paid, and though they might feel a grievance, he could not hold out any hope that anything would be done for them. He promised, however, to look into the case again.

MR. S. HOARE said, he thanked the right hon. Gentleman for so kindly saying that he would look into the matter. As the right hon. Gentleman alluded to the men as "an expiring class," he must feel that it would not be a serious matter to do something for men who were diminishing in number. It was to be hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would treat the matter in the generous spirit that the Committee would desire to see him exhibit.

COMMANDER BETHELL said, the difficulty seemed to be that these men did not get such good pay as did the men in similar positions who belonged to the Regular Forces. Though it was true they got all their engagements promised them, the Committee would see that it was hard lines for them to see younger men occupying similar positions to themselves drawing larger pay. There were very few of these men left; and though he was not anxious to push unreasonable claims, he thought this was a case which did seem rather hard, and one in which the demands of the men ought, at any rate, to some extent be met.

MR. HANBURY said, he should move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £100. When the Debate was started they were told, in language which he considered rather exaggerated, that the Militia were a fraud. He thought it had been proved that, so far as the personnel were concerned, they were a good body of men, but there were two respects in which the Militia was a fraud. It was ridiculous to say that the Militia Establishment was 135,000 men, when the right hon. Gentleman admitted that he had no intention of recruiting up to that strength. The number was 14,000 men less than that figure, and that alone would be sufficient to justify the moving of the reduction. But he had a better reason. Though these men were very good men, and there was no fault to be found with them, the Government refused to put arms into their hands. What was the use of spending this money on the Militia if the men were not armed? To arm half the Force with one kind of rifle, and the other half with another, would be more mischievous than to leave all the men armed with the old rifle. Why was the Committee asked to accept this position? It was said to be a question of expense. But rifle ranges would not cost less in a few years time than they would now; indeed, the probability was that they would cost more. This difficulty of providing ranges would have to be faced. It was no use handing it over from one Government to another. The right hon. Gentleman in this matter was no worse than Conservative Secretaries of State, but the Committee had a right to protest, whatever Government was in power. They had been in a hurry to get the magazine rifle. Now they had over 400,000 of these rifles, sufficient to arm the whole of the Regulars and the Militia as well, but they were told that money could not be found for ranges. If they were going to get the ranges cheaper later on it would be a different matter, or if there had not been sufficient time to go into this question of ranges. But the right hon. Gentleman had now been in Office two years. They could not forget that. He had had plenty of time to consider this range question. He (Mr. Hanbury) ventured to say that it was about the most pressing question the Secretary for War could possibly deal with, and he did not think the right hon. Gentleman could ask the Committee to delay dealing with it any longer. They had not got these ranges. They had not even got them in Ireland, though they were told there were plenty to be had in that country.

THE CHAIRMAN (Mr. J. W. LOWTHER): My predecessor in the Chair, I understand, ruled that the question of rifle ranges could not be discussed on this Vote. The question of the rifle ranges will probably come on on Vote 10; therefore, I must ask the hon. Member to defer his remarks to that Vote.

MR. HANBURY said, that was so, though the question was bound up with the Militia, and the Militia did use rifle ranges. He would press the matter seriously on the attention of the right hon. Gentleman.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That a sum, not exceeding £599,900, be granted for the said Service."—(Mr. Hanbury.)

COLONEL KENYON-SLANEY (Shropshire, Newport) said, that considering how often this question of the Militia was brought up at public dinners and elsewhere, and how perpetually they were told that the country had to congratulate itself that it had in the Militia a thoroughly efficient and equipped Force to be availed of on an emergency, and that the country was getting its money's worth, when this Vote came before the Committee, it was fair that hon. Members who understood the question should state the facts of the case so that the country might not be deluded by a too highly-coloured description of the state of things. There were two practical conditions which had to be met before the Militia, or any Military Force, could be described as efficient—first, that the Force must be well disciplined; and, secondly, that it must be well trained in the use of the weapon placed in its hands. It might be granted that the Militia were in a very creditable state of discipline. They had heard with the utmost satisfaction the result of the efforts made by the commanding officers of the Militia and the officers and permanent staff to inculcate the primary necessity of discipline in the Militia. It would be fair for the Secretary for War to say that the Force had learned the rudimentary principles of discipline and was in a state in which its discipline could be amplified almost up to any requirement. But when they had the Force well disciplined they had only got half the soldier. Many people would tell them that if the Force could not use the arms put into their hands, their discipline in these days would be practically valueless, and all that could be done with them on an emergency would be to put them in the rear to satisfy the minor wants of a campaign. It could not be said that the Militia fulfilled the second and equally necessary condition—skill in the use of the rifle. In that respect, as had been shown, the Militia were not efficient, and, if they were to be made so, the present confusion of weapons must be done away with, and the men armed and trained with one weapon only. It was a stale observation to say that there might not be time when the emergency came. There was too much disposition to procrastinate and put off these things on the assumption that, after all, time would be given on an emergency and that they would not suffer through delay. That, however, was not a safe line to take up. In these days before going to war they would not get the long warning which would be necessary to make a perfect Militiaman.

MR. BRODRICK (Surrey, Guildford) said, the reply given by the right hon. Gentleman on the question of the arming of the Militia with the magazine rifle was not at all satisfactory. He had held out the hope that the Force would be so armed within a reasonable time, or before the next training. The Opposition might be content not to carry the protest any further, but the reply of the right hon. Gentleman was altogether indefinite. The right hon. Gentleman said there was a difficulty as to the money. He did not tell them that he intended to remove that difficulty. Under the circumstances, if the hon. Member thought it necessary to press his Motion to a Division he (Mr. Brodrick) should feel bound to support him.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, there was no doubt about the provision of rifles or stores. The difficulty arose on the question of ranges, and he had said all he could say on that.

SIR J. FERGUSSON (Manchester, N.E.) said, that as having been for many years commandant of a Militia regiment, and as being honorary Colonel now, he took great interest in the Militia. He could not regard the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State as satisfactory. In the first place, they learnt that the Militia was not to be recruited to the full establishment.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, it had been recruited to its full strength.

SIR J. FERGUSSON: I understood the right hon. Gentleman was not going to make an effort to recruit.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: It is fuller now than it ever was.

SIR J. FERGUSSON said, he did not think it was fuller than it ever was. But, in the next place, the right hon. Gentleman did not intend to arm the force with the rifle supplied to the Regular Army, and with which half the Militia were already armed, because he was not in a position to provide the necessary ranges. This, he maintained, was not a satisfactory state of things, but one eminently unsatisfactory. As an hon. and gallant Gentleman had said, they could not expect that the piping times of peace were going to last for ever. As we had only a small Force as compared with the interests at stake it ought to be efficiently armed, and that could not be unless it was armed with the rifle of the period. Everyone conversant with the arming of troops must know what a magnificent weapon we now possessed as compared with past years. If only one-third of the Militia was armed with the magazine rifle, the Force remained in a position of inferiority, and would not be able to do on an emergency what it had done at other periods—that was to say, take its part with the Army in fighting the battles of the country. Before the Battle of Waterloo 500 men of a Militia regiment were drafted into a battalion of Guards, and fought in it. In that case if the Militia had not been trained as well as the Regular Army, and armed in the same way, they could not have reinforced the battalion of Guards in one of the greatest struggles in which the British Army had ever taken part. Surely the right hon. Gentleman only required the support of the House to induce him to take strong steps to remedy such a state of matters. How was the Militia Reserve to take the place of the Regular Army if it was not trained in the use of the weapon with which the whole Army was armed? Then, he should like to know if the right hon. Gentleman was providing ammunition to be used with the magazine rifle. He was informed that the amount of ammunition turned out was only sufficient for the wants of the day, and that it did not accumulate in store as rapidly as it should.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, that the next time the right hon. Gentleman got up to justify beforehand a doubtful Vote he ought really to learn a little more what the Government had to say upon the subject. In the first place, he (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) had never said that there was any lack of rifles for the Militia. As a matter of fact, there was an abundance of rifles; in the next place, he had never said that the Government were taking no steps to deal with the question of ranges. He had taken every possible step to deal with that question. Reference was made to a certain Committee which had disagreed with the War Office authorities as to the extent of the danger on existing rifle ranges; but did the right hon. Gentleman think he, as Secretary of State, should be justified in throwing over the opinion of his responsible advisers, and adopting the sanguine view of some outside Committee which had no responsibility? Events which had occurred within the past two or three weeks showed what difficulties there were in establishing rifle ranges without adequate security. He was not disposed to hurry the thing up, because it might lead to embarking upon a large scheme of what might be dangerous and imperfect ranges. The fact was, the question of ranges must be dealt with gradually and carefully. As to ammunition—which did not arise on this Vote—no one at the War Office could have gone an inch farther than he had done. He had no want of sympathy with the objects of hon. Gentlemen opposite, but he was bound in his situation to be cautious in the matter of rifle ranges, and by no amount of small reductions of the Vote would he be goaded into giving a pledge which it might be impossible to fulfil.

COLONEL KENYON-SLANEY said, they all recognised the fact that the right hon. Gentleman sympathised with the objects hon. Members had in view, and what they were trying to do was to strengthen his hands. The right hon. Gentleman told them there were plenty of the very best rifles, but there was no ammunition to put into them.

MR. WOODALL: Yes; we have the ammunition.

COLONEL KENYON-SLANEY said, if they had the ammunition they must not let it off, because there were no places where it could be done in safety. Without the ammunition they might as well have popguns with corks in the muzzles. They could not make much use of their weapons unless they had the opportunity of firing a certain number of rounds every year in practice; and the right hon. Gentleman would make the Militia a useful force if he would issue cartridges to them out of his magazines.

COLONEL GUNTER (York, W.R., Barkstone, Ash) urged that the new rifles should be put in the hands of the Militia even before they received ball ammunition, so that the men might become accustomed to the use of the weapon. He also urged that the ammunition for the different branches of the Service should be uniform. Properly equipped many of the Militia regiments with their fine physique would be quite fit to stand beside the Regular Army. It was said they were not recruited up to their full strength, but during 15 years he had been able to place on parade before the inspecting officer on many occasions 1,000 men in his regiment.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) said, the Vote was for 134,000 men, but the right hon. Gentleman told them that after making the necessary deductions there were only 121,000. This was little short of a falsification of accounts. Something should be done to meet the difficulty arising from want of ranges, for, as the country became more and more populous it would increase year by year. In reference to the numbers, he must protest such a misstatement of the affairs of the country.

The Committee divided :—Ayes 36 ; Noes 101.—(Division List, No. 148.)

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

*MR. H. L. W. LAWSON complained that the Yeomanry had not been fairly treated, as the Volunteer decoration had not been given to them during the last two years. It involved no additional outlay and no special favour. In the old days the Yeomanry were very little better than a mounted mob ; but all that had been changed, and there had of late years been great improvements in the mounting, shooting, discipline, and organisation of the Force. This was testified by the most competent military authorities in the country. It was mere pedantry on the part of the War Office to draw an unreal distinction. The Yeomanry depended on the voluntary principle, and it was contending against immense difficulties. If the Yeomanry were to disappear to-morrow the country would be absolutely without Volunteer cavalry, and he could not think that the authorities would willingly see the Force done away with. He hoped he would do his best to persuade the Horse Guards to offer this inducement to the men to stay longer in the ranks, and so improve a valuable branch of the Auxiliary Forces of the country.

MR. CORNWALLIS (Maidstone) supported the appeal of the last speaker. He thought that the Yeomanry would appreciate very highly the proposed decorations, and he could see no reasons to distinguish them from the Volunteers in this respect. They should be encouraged in the keen zeal they showed in serving Her Majesty year after year.

MAJOR RASCH said that, while serving in the Regular cavalry, he had sometimes been encamped with the Yeomanry ; and he never could conceive the reason of their existence. He supposed they were created for some purpose, or else Providence or the War Office would not have placed them where they were. In making these remarks, he desired to say that there were some very smart regiments that were fit to stand side by side with the regiments of the Line. Nobody would think of depreciating the service of the North Staffordshire Yeomanry, or the Gloucestershire Hussars, but those were only the exceptions which proved the rule. The Secretary of State for War, when in a position of greater freedom and less responsibility, had criticised adversely the Yeomanry Force. He knew of one Yeomanry troop in which the Commanding Officer had to mount 38 of the men when they were called out ; only a few of the troop could mount themselves. He doubted very much whether any Yeomanry corps, except perhaps half-a-dozen, and particularly those he had mentioned, could keep the field for more than 10 days. A friend of his, a distinguished Yeomanry officer well known in that House, had said that there were only two courses to adopt with regard to the Yeomanry—the one was to abolish them, and the other was to reform them root and branch. In his opinion, much more good would be done by spending the £70,000 that this effete force cost upon increasing the efficiency of the Regular cavalry.

MR. BROMLEY DAVENPORT (Cheshire, Macclesfield) said, he did not agree with the observations of the hon. and gallant Member who had just spoken, and he could not allow his remarks to pass unchallenged. He understood that the hon. and gallant Member agreed with somebody or another who had said the Yeomanry were an effete force. So far from the Yeomanry being an effete force, it had year by year become more efficient. The Regular cavalry might excel the Yeomanry in matters of drill, marching past, and parade movements, but they did not excel them in the practical and useful work of reconnaissance, map-drawing, and similar matters. The corps to which he had the honour to belong brought 270 men and horses into the field, and in times past they had rendered most valuable service and received grateful acknowledgment for preserving order. The services of the Force were very cheaply obtained by an expenditure of £70,000 per annum. He trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would give some assurance that the long-service medal would be conferred upon the Force.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, that his remarks which had been quoted by hon. Gentlemen on this subject were made in the unregenerate days of the Yeomanry, which had certainly become much more efficient during the last few years. He was bound to say that in these days he heard nothing but good of the Yeomanry, and this applied not only to their greatly increased efficiency, but also to the excellent spirit in which the officers and non-commissioned officers had carried out the additional duties that were placed upon them, and had met the difficulties under which those duties were discharged. It might be that there were some corners yet to be rubbed smooth, but he hoped there might be a permanent improvement, and such a condition of things as to enable them to obtain the sanction of the Treasury to the continuance of that extra allowance which was given temporarily, for a limited period, for the purpose of encouraging musketry practice. That was all he need say on the general question of the Yeomanry. He was in agreement both with those who were suspicious of the old and those who had hopes of the new; therefore he hoped he agreed with everybody all round. With reference to the extension to the Yeomanry of the long-service medal, he should be disposed to place no technical or pedantic objection in the way of that being done, but it would be necessary for him to make some further inquiry and see if there was no countervailing objection to what was asked.

MR. W. LONG (Liverpool, West Derby) said, as one who had been connected for more than 20 years with the Yeomanry, he had listened with the greatest possible satisfaction to the speech which the right hon. Gentleman had just delivered, and he submitted that this Vote could be more abundantly justified on the present than on any previous occasion. He believed in a country like theirs, where they depended for their defensive forces on voluntary spirit, they would be very foolish if they did anything to discourage a movement which provided them with a great number of Yeomanry corps which might be useful in times of difficulty and danger. As to the question of reorganisation, those connected with the Yeomanry had done their best to fall in with the new system. He trusted that the Secretary of State for War would insist upon the continuance of the increased grant. He had had the good fortune to share in the Yeomanry manoeuvres in Wiltshire and Berkshire in 1890, and he felt certain that the military witnesses of those manoeuvres would confirm his statement that the conduct of the Yeomanry in camp was admirable, and that they did their work with intelligence, and showed an amount of military knowledge surprising to those who had not previously been brought into contact with this Force. It would be a great mistake to attempt to abolish a Force that had so creditable a record. With regard to the proposal to grant a medal, he was glad to hear that the Secretary for War intended to make further inquiries before coming to a decision. It was his opinion that in the majority of instances the Yeomanry did not desire the medal, there being a prevalent view among them that medals should only be conferred for service in the field.

SIR W. LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth) said, he wished to say one word about these warriors. He had voted against this grant on former occasions with the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War, and, as he was not on the Treasury Bench, he did not see why he should vote differently now. Seventy thousand pounds was a great deal of money, and if they could save that sum in these bad times it was their duty to do so. The hon. Gentleman who had just sat down said that the Yeomanry Force was formed in times of trouble and emergency, and then expressed the belief that such times would not recur. The hon. Member had thus supplied them with a very good reason for not continuing to support the Force by voting this money. Quite recently, at a meeting of the Cheshire Farmers' Club, caustic criticisms were passed on the local Yeomanry, and it was said that the bulk of the men were so stout that they would be unable to get away fast enough if an enemy were to pursue them. The speeches which he had heard that evening confirmed him in his former view that the Yeomanry were utterly useless. As gentlemen on the other side of the House seemed to be of the same opinion, he asked them to join with him in opposing the Vote.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, he understood there was a general desire on the part of hon. Gentlemen opposite that the further discussion of the Army Estimates should be postponed in order to give them an opportunity of discussing the Parochial Electors Bill.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (Manchester, E.) said, he understood the agreement was that only the Army Estimates should be taken to-day. It was not until after he came down to the House that evening that he heard of the proposal to consider the Parochial Electors Bill.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. J. MORLEY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne) said, the change in the Government plan was announced before the commencement of Public Business. There were urgent reasons why the Bill should be pressed forward, and he trusted that hon. Members opposite would not oppose the proposal.

MR. W. LONG (Liverpool, West Derby) said, he was not aware that the case was one of urgency.

MR. A. C. MORTON (Peterborough) moved that Progress be reported.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Mr. A. C. Morton,)—put, and agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported to-morrow; Committee also report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

PAROCHIAL ELECTORS (REGISTRATION ACCELERATION) (re-committed) BILL.
(No. 282.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress, 25th June.]

Bill considered in Committee.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 4, after the word "shall," to insert the words "as far as possible."—(Mr. Rankin.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE, Bradford, Central) said, he could not accept the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman, as it was directed against a principal feature of the Bill.

MR. W. LONG (Liverpool, West Derby) said, he should like to point out the inconvenient position the Committee were placed in owing to the absence of the hon. Member for Leominster (MR. Rankin), who moved the Amendment. He thought that unless this Amendment were inserted the Revising Barristers would have no means of knowing whether they were right or whether they were wrong.

MR. GRANT LAWSON (York, N.R., Thirsk) said, he did not think that the Revising Barrister ought to be hampered by the instruction in the clause. In many places it was at present extremely difficult for the Revising Barristers to find places in which to hold their Courts, and in many cases it would be absolutely impossible for the Revising Barrister to carry out the instructions in the clause. Why not leave it to him to make the most expeditious and convenient arrangement he could?

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE said, he must point out again that the Amendment of the hon. Member for Herefordshire would destroy the effect of the clause. The clause as it stood had been inserted at the express wish of the clerks of County Councils.

MR. W. LONG said, that as he understood the Amendment it was a very important one. The circumstances affecting the Revising Barristers in different parts of the country were very varying. In some districts communication was good and in others very difficult. The Amendment of the hon. Member for Herefordshire sought to leave the matter to the discretion of the Revising Barrister. It seemed to him essentially a question which could only be settled on the spot and by men acquainted with local circumstances and difficulties.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE said, upon the whole the matter had better remain for further consideration.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. GRANT LAWSON said, that the Bill consisted of clauses which had been inserted by the Select Committee. They put Revising Barristers under entirely new conditions as to the times at which the lists should be completed, substituting the end of November for the end of December, and he proposed that the obligation should be qualified by the words "if possible."

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 16, after the word "shall," to insert the words "if possible."—(Mr. Grant Lawson.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'if possible' be there inserted."

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE said, the Amendment would defeat the object of the Bill, for which it was necessary that all the Registers should be completed by one day. This was one of the essential points of the Bill, upon which the Committee were unanimous. He must ask for the support of the Committee in this matter.

MR. W. LONG said, he agreed to some extent with the right hon. Gentleman, but the question whether it was possible to so accelerate the registration so that all the Registers should be completed by a certain day—

It being Midnight, the Chairman left the Chair to make his report to the House.

Committee report Progress.

MR. W. LONG inquired when it was intended to take the Bill again? If the Government desired to proceed with it, and it was urgent, the Opposition had no desire whatever to stop the Bill. [Ministerial cries of "Oh!"] They would deal with that class of interruption when they had the opportunity. Many gentlemen opposite knew perfectly well that Members of the Opposition, in the views they expressed on the Bill, were only representing the opinions of Revising Barristers, clerks of County Councils, and other men who would have to do the work which the supporters of the Government were ready without adequate discussion to place upon them.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE: I am quite sure that there is no desire on the part of gentlemen opposite to obstruct, but that they wish to facilitate business. What I would venture to suggest now is that Mr. Speaker should be allowed to go out of the Chair, and that we should proceed with the Bill. [Opposition cries of "No!"]

Committee to sit again upon Tuesday.

CONCILIATION (TRADES DISPUTES) BILL.—(No. 125.)

SECOND READING. [ADJOURNED DEBATE.]

Order read, for resuming adjourned Debate on Second Reading [23rd April.]

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (MR. BRYCE, Aberdeen, S.): I hope the House will consent to take this Bill now. I am willing that the other Bill on the subject standing in the name of my right hon. Friend the Member for the University of London (Sir J. Lubbock) should be read a second time, and that both Bills should go before the Standing Committee.

Several hon. Members objected.

Debate further adjourned till Tomorrow.

MUSSEL SCALPS (SCOTLAND) BILL.
(No. 169.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Birkmyre.)

MR. BROMLEY DAVENPORT (Cheshire, Macclesfield) asked for some explanation of the Bill's provisions.

MR. BIRKMYRE said, the Government quite approved of the principle of the measure, and the principle had already been approved by the House of Commons and the House of Lords.

SIR C. PEARSON (Edinburgh and St. Andrews Universities) said, he did not know whether the hon. Gentleman was justified in claiming Government approval for this Bill. He (Sir C. Pearson) had read the Bill, and it seemed to him to be one of the worst drawn measures he had ever read.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. Bryce, Aberdeen, S.): In reply to my right hon. Friend, I may say I do not think the drafting of the Bill is perfect, but the hon. Gentleman in charge of it has expressed his willingness to admit certain Amendments which the Government think necessary, and if those Amendments are introduced we have no objection to the measure.

MR. ANSTRUTHER (St. Andrews, &c.) said, he should like to have the opinion of the Lord Advocate (Mr. J. B. Balfour) on the drafting of the Bill. He (Mr. Anstruther) had no objection to the principle of the measure, and, indeed, he himself had introduced a Bill based very much upon the same principle, although not providing for the rating arrangement sanctioned by this Bill. The Government had early in the Session taken objections to the reading of his Bill a second time, although he had never heard why they had done so.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. Balfour, Clackmannan, &c.): As my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade has just stated, subject to certain alterations on points of detail we do not object to this Bill.

An hon. MEMBER : I object.

MR. BIRKMYRE : I would appeal to hon. Members not to prevent the Second Reading of the Bill.

An hon. MEMBER : I object.

Second Reading deferred till Tuesday next.

PIER AND HARBOUR PROVISIONAL ORDERS (No. 2) BILL.—(No. 203.)
Lords Amendments agreed to.

EDUCATION PROVISIONAL ORDER CONFIRMATION (LONDON) BILL [Lords].
(No. 300.)

Read a second time, and committed.

PEEBLES FOOT PAVEMENTS PROVISIONAL ORDER BILL.

On Motion of Sir G. Trevelyan, Bill to confirm a Provisional Order made by the Secretary for Scotland, under "The Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892," relating to the burgh of Peebles, ordered to be brought in by Sir George Trevelyan and the Lord Advocate.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY,—considered in Committee.

ARMY ESTIMATES, 1894-5.

1. Motion made, and Question proposed,

*MR. A. C. MORTON (Peterborough) said, he intended to move the reduction of the Vote. He should like to see it rejected altogether; but he imagined that part of the money had been spent, and that, therefore, it would be useless to make a Motion to that effect. The Minister for War had spoken yesterday of unregenerate days — alluding either to himself or the Yeomanry. Probably the reference was to himself, seeing that in days gone by the right hon. Gentleman was in favour of economy, but now his soundness on that Radical doctrine appeared to be doubtful. The War Office, possibly, was too strong for him now that he was in Office, but he was strong enough to oppose them when out of Office. The right hon. Gentleman had gone against the charge years ago, and had asked hon. Members to oppose it; and if he adhered to his former view, he ought to have the courage, now that he was in power, to strike out the Vote altogether. He (Mr. Morton) did not wish to say a word disrespectful of the Yeomanry. They were no worse than other people, but as a fighting force the Yeomanry were of no use whatever. He was altogether opposed to the maintenance of fighting forces, being in favour of arbitration as a means of settling International disputes. Still, if we must have an Army, it should be a fighting force. The Yeomanry merely "played at soldiers." Therefore, they ought to be got rid of altogether. They were told that in past days the Yeomanry had been of some use in putting down rioting, but the police were now able to do that. It had not been shown that the Yeomanry was in an efficient state to do any fighting whatsoever. He was entirely in favour of giving this money to the Volunteer Force, who had done good service in putting itself into a state of efficiency for the defence of the country. He understood from experts that they could not very well have an efficient Volunteer Cavalry Force. The Yeomanry were something of that sort, and he could well understand the difficulty there was in making it efficient and in obtaining horses. If the money could be spared it should be voted to the Volunteers, who rendered efficient service to the country, and who had never been properly recognised by the State. For the purpose of testing the question he would move to reduce the Vote by £40,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £34,000, be granted for the said Service."—(Mr. A. C. Morton.)

MR. A. H. SMITH (Christchurch) said, he must protest against the attacks made in the Committee against the Yeomanry Force. He submitted that the criticisms of the hon. Baronet the Member for Cockermouth and others were altogether out of date, and he would advise them when they renewed their attack to discard the stale jokes and antiquated gibes which were hurled against the Yeomanry last night. The hon. Baronet did not always make stale jokes, but when he alluded to the pace at which the Yeomanry were able to retire the joke was a very ancient one. If the hon. Member for Essex, who, though he might have great knowledge of other Military Forces, had very little acquaintance with the body in question, were to ask cavalry officers who had inspected Yeomanry regiments during the last few years, they would one and all, he was certain, give a very different account of the Force to that which was given last night. They would all bear testimony to the value and efficiency of the Force. The hon. Baronet had made complaint of the expense of the Force. In his opinion, it was an extremely cheap Force, and the £70,000 spent upon it was extremely well laid out. He would ask hon. Gentlemen this one question, although he knew it was no use pressing it upon the hon. Member for Peterborough: Did they think it possible for the Reserve Forces to be of use without cavalry? No doubt it would be impossible to maintain Volunteer cavalry, but that was the strongest argument for maintaining the Yeomanry in the most efficient state possible. This was the only form in which cavalry in connection with Volunteers could possibly be maintained. He was surprised to hear the right hon. Gentleman opposite last night attribute all the improvement in the Yeomanry Force to the new Regulations and the organization lately introduced, because it was well known that that improvement began long before the new Regulations came into existence. The Yeomanry, however, were quite willing to carry out those Regulations and to be tried by the new standard of efficiency. One point of difficulty connected with the new organization was the long distances the permanent staff had to travel in carrying out their duties in regard to preliminary drill, and so on. He knew instances where the permanent sergeants had to travel 25 miles to reach the troops or shooting grounds. A healthy rivalry existed among the Yeomanry, which would always tend to maintain their present excellent condition, though no doubt troops forming one squadron and at perhaps 20 or 30 miles distance from headquarters would have very little in common.

MR. WINGFIELD-DIGBY (Dorset, N.) did not think that the disparaging observations of the hon. Member for Peterborough—who, no doubt, possessed great military knowledge—with regard to the Yeomanry would have much weight with the country. Perhaps the hon. Member would explain how under his new tactics infantry were to act without cavalry. It was absolutely necessary that the Yeomanry Force should be maintained in order to act as the cavalry of the Volunteer Force. The force was a most inexpensive one, and it possessed the advantage of having one horse to each man instead of two men to each horse, as was the case in the Regular cavalry. The defenders of the Yeomanry fortunately were not confined to one side of the House alone. The hon. Member for Cirencester had pointed out how useful the Yeomanry cavalry were to the country. Something had been said last night about the Yeomanry being useful assistants to the Civil power, but the Force earnestly hoped that they would never have the duty imposed upon them of riding down an unarmed mob of their fellow-countrymen. As had been pointed out with regard to the inception of the Yeomanry, many of the regiments were raised at the time of Napoleon's threatened invasion of the Island. It was very interesting at this day to examine the maps then drawn up, showing the tactics to be adopted in the event of a descent upon our coasts. The Force was extremely popular, and, whenever it was called out, it brought a considerable amount of business to the country towns. An article, written by Mr. Frederic Harrison, had recently appeared in the magazines in reference to the incidence of taxation, and suggesting that it would be well to go back to the system of the old days, when the lauded gentry provided so much of the money and so many of the troops or armed men required for the service of the King. The article also referred to the ancient Greek and Roman times, when men were picked out for the service of the State. The writer was evidently hardly aware of the existence of the Yeomanry cavalry, largely maintained by the country gentlemen, the cost being only supplemented by the small amount granted them by the Government. The country gentlemen were willing to go on supporting the Yeomanry and Volunteer Forces in spite of the cold water which was thrown upon them. The Yeomanry had been long threatened, but "threatened people lived long," and he trusted the Force would continue to do the good work it had done in the past, in spite of the attacks of the great military authorities opposite and their new tactics. He hoped the War Office would not reduce the permanent staff, which was as low as it could be consistent with the efficiency of the Yeomanry.

CAPTAIN BAGOT (Westmoreland, Kendal) said, there could be no doubt this was one of the cheapest Forces we possessed, and that to do away with it would be a piece of great folly in the organisation of the defence of the country. The hon. Member for Peterborough was probably not aware that the total cost of the Yeomanry to the country was not equal to that of a single Regular cavalry regiment. When the squadron system was adopted from the Regular cavalry lately in the reorganisation of the Yeomanry, the permanent troop-sergeant-majors were done away with. It was now complained that the duties of the sergeant-majors, on whom the efficiency and internal organisation of the regiment depended, were too onerous, and he suggested that they should be granted railway passes so that they might easily cover the distances which separated the two troops under their control.

*SIR F. FITZWYGRAM (South Hants, Fareham) said, the important question was whether the Yeomanry would be fit for the duties which they would be called upon to discharge in the case of war—whether they were quite up to the mark? In a country like England cavalry could not be utilised to any great extent by way of acting in mass, but in scouting duty the hunting farmers of England, who largely formed the Yeomanry, would be invaluable. It was on our Militia, Volunteers, and Yeomanry that we should mainly have to depend in case of invasion, which could only occur after a great disaster in a European war, when probably our Regular cavalry would be depleted or destroyed. That was an answer to the question so often asked—Why could not the Regular cavalry do this duty? Of course, they would if at home. But before we can suppose an invasion, we must suppose disaster to our Army abroad. And in such case our home defence would largely depend on the forces—namely, Militia, Volunteers, and Yeomanry—which cannot be sent abroad. For those reasons he strongly supported the Vote for the Yeomanry. They received no pay, and the allowance made for man and horse was but small, and that which was done for the Volunteers should surely be done by the country for the Yeomanry as well. His hon. Friend had mentioned the case of a yeoman who, at 75 years of age, had not missed drill for 50 years. While allowing the importance of having tried and well-trained men in the Yeomanry, he agreed that if it were composed largely of men with such service records as that it might then very justly be considered by its critics as even more useless than the Yeomanry Force of the olden time. From observations he had made during the years he commanded in the cavalry, and also from the general experience of hunting and steeplechasing men, he was inclined to say that the age for active service should not exceed 42 years either in the Yeomanry or for cavalry regiments.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) said, he would not presume to follow the gallant and distinguished officer in his criticisms and eulogium on the Yeomanry from the point of view of Army work, but he would submit that this Force had a special merit, in so far as the men were civilians first and soldiers afterwards. His sympathies had always gone forth to such men, for he shared the prejudice held by some people against having any standing Army at all. The fact that they were civilians as well as soldiers should not be lost sight of whenever it was necessary to call out a military force in order to quell any local disturbance, for, as fellow townsmen, they would certainly act with more consideration than the Regular troops, and, therefore, would not be so likely to incense the mob to commit acts of violence. He remembered reading of a case in which during the Reform riots in Wiltshire the local Yeomanry were called upon to charge a mob which had taken possession of a park. In the charge one of the troopers dropped his sword, which was promptly picked up and handed to him by a rustic. His next man asked him why he did not cut the rustic down, and the reply was that he would not have done that for anything, as the man was the son of his carter. He considered that the Yeomanry Force was the most economical of all the branches of our Army. For these reasons he trusted that the hon. Member for Peterborough would not press for the reduction of the Vote. He had often been happy to follow the hon. Member's lead in Motions for the protection of economy, but believing, as he did, that their energies might be more usefully applied to matters on which more money was spent, he appealed to him, in the name of old comradeship in the fight for economy, not to press the Motion.

*MR. BRODRICK (Surrey, Guildford) heartily supported that appeal. He believed it was impossible to get a cheaper or more economical force than the Yeomanry, which, he maintained, formed a most valuable auxiliary to our cavalry. It was a Force of 9,000 or 10,000 men and horses, costing £112,000. He thought the hon. Member must have been misled in this matter. Some time since he had the assistance of the present Secretary for War in voting for the abolition of Yeomanry Cavalry.

MR. A. C. MORTON: I did not have his assistance; he had mine.

*MR. BRODRICK said, the right hon. Gentleman had evidently now found salvation. They had his authority for it that the Force had immensely improved, and was much more useful for service in the field than it was some years since; and as other Votes of great interest were to come before the Committee, he hoped they would be allowed to proceed without further delay and without a Division.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.) said that, after the speeches delivered on the previous night by the hon. Gentleman the Member for West Derby and the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War, he did not propose to vote for the Motion of the hon. Member for Peterborough. The Secretary for War had every opportunity of knowing whether the Force was efficient; but that as they had his authority for the statement that it was, he would rely on his judgment. But while he could not support the hon. Member for Peterborough he did not feel he could vote the other way, and he should therefore abstain from taking any part in the Division.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 19; Noes 112.—(Division List, No. 149.)

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Mr. Gibson Bowles

2. £804,000, Volunteer Corps, Pay, and Allowances.

SIR H. FLETCHER (Sussex, Lewes) said, he wished to take that opportunity to congratulate the Military Authorities and the Volunteer Force generally on the increase in the Force. Although this, of course, involved an addition to the Vote, he thought the money was well spent. He noticed from the Estimate that the total of the Force had risen from 218,800 to 221,000 men, and this was a proof that satisfactory steps were being taken to keep up a most useful Force. But he had one or two suggestions to make to the Secretary of State for War, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would be able to see his way to give effect to them. The first was with regard to the Capitation Grant. At present this grant, together with the proficiency allowance, was paid once a year, and he ventured to suggest that at any rate some proportion of it should be handed over as soon as it was earned. The Volunteer year ended on the 31st of October, and of course the men must have made themselves efficient prior to that date. But the grant was not paid until April in the following year, and he thought six months was a long time for the officers to be kept out of the money, the result being not infrequently that money had to be borrowed to meet the current expenses of the battalion. It might be urged that this would upset all the financial arrangements of the War Office, but probably an earlier payment might be made without much difficulty, and it certainly would be much appreciated by the Volunteer authorities. Then there was the question of transport in case of mobilisation. In the case of its being necessary to move it, a Volunteer corps would be useless without transport, and many officers recognising the fact had already made arrangements to supply their regiments with the means of transport. This, however, was necessarily an expensive proceeding, and his suggestion to the Secretary for War was that when an inspecting officer certified that transport vehicles sufficiently horsed were paraded at the annual inspection a capitation grant of 35s. for one man per company to act as driver should be allowed, the man to wear the uniform of the battalion, but not to otherwise qualify. That would be a great help to the Volunteers in this matter of transport. As to the Capitation Grant generally, he thought that was sufficient for all practical purposes. The next point was as to the transfer of Volunteers to the Regular Army. It frequently happened that after a young fellow had been in the Volunteers a few months he enlisted into the Regulars. But during his service as a Volunteer a considerable sum of money had been spent in providing him with a uniform, and these clothes were, as a rule, thrown on the commanding officer's hands, for there was a general dislike to the issue of old or part-worn uniforms, and many men refused to serve in corps in which this practice prevailed. He would suggest that in such cases of enlistment a grant should be made to the Volunteer corps to cover the expenses thus incurred. Many Volunteer regiments had now become battalions of territorial regiments. In the old days they were called Rifle Corps, but for some years that designation had to a great extent been abandoned. As the system of making them battalions of territorial regiments was now pretty general, he thought the Volunteer regiments should as nearly as possible assimilate with that of the Militia battalions of the same regiment. Many inspecting officers had already advocated that; and only a fortnight previously, at his own regimental camp, the inspecting officer found fault with certain badges worn by the non-commissioned officers, and said that they should be similar to those used in the Militia battalion. But the present Regulations did not permit Volunteer officers to clothe and dress their men in the same way as Militia battalions, although he believed such a thing would be very popular. Coming next to the permanent staff, he urged that an allowance should be made to the commanding officers of headquarter companies to enable them to engage some sergeant discharged from the Army to assist the sergeant-instructor as orderly-room clerk, the necessity for this arising from the fact that the Official Returns to be filled in were rapidly increasing in number, and if the sergeant-instructor had to attend to them he was bound to neglect his other duties. Further, he thought that the permanent staff should be attached to a Line regiment for drill purposes one month in every year. The resident instructors lived, many of them, in the country villages. They attended a few regimental and battalion drills, but had really very little to do. It would be a great advantage if the sergeant-instructors could be sent out more regularly to make them better acquainted with the new drill, and he would put it to the right hon. Gentleman whether he could not see his way to order sergeant-instructors for a period of one month each year to be attached to and drill with the Line regiment, or with the dépôt of the territorial regiment. It was the more necessary to carry out some suggestion of this kind, because, every year almost, changes in drill were made and imposed on the Volunteer Force as well as on the Regular Army. A point which had been more than once previously referred to in connection with the Force was the brigadier system, which had been in operation several years. He had no fault to find with the system as it at present existed, but the duties and responsibilities of the brigadier should be more clearly defined by the Military authorities, for at present the position of those officers was in many respects anomalous. As to the existing Musketry Regulations for the Volunteers, he thought they were sufficient; and, in view of an intimation given by the right hon. Gentleman on a previous occasion that it was proposed to introduce further and larger conditions, he would suggest that to press the Volunteers too hard on this point would have an effect contrary to that which might be intended and desired. Field-firing was undoubtedly a very important matter with the Volunteers and Regular Army alike, and he desired to assure the right hon. Gentleman that the Force tried hard to fulfil the conditions required to the satisfaction of the Musketry Inspectors; but the Volunteers suffered greatly, in common with the Regular troops, from the want of suitable ranges for practice, and he wished to press this fact on the attention of the War Office authorities. With regard to the Volunteer decoration, he was very glad to see by that day's papers that the right hon. Gentleman, in response to an appeal, had slightly modified the existing rule. The entire Force would feel grateful for that concession, but he would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he could not carry it a little further. As the Rule now stood, no Volunteer would be entitled to the decoration who was not actually serving in the Force on the 1st of January, 1893. He knew many hundreds of men who had served in the Volunteers for more than 20 years continuously, and who would be entitled to the decoration but for this condition. The restriction was very severely felt, and he would appeal to the right hon. Gentleman to consider whether it could not be dispensed with. A few days ago the right hon. Gentleman, he understood, said, in reply to a question, that the difficulty which he and his military advisers had in the matter was that no trustworthy Returns of service could be obtained.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : In many cases.

SIR H. FLETCHER continuing, said, that might be so, but he thought the right hon. Gentleman might get over that difficulty—at all events, in the great majority of cases. In the early days of the Force, when it was loosely controlled, Returns were not sent into the War Office, but he could say, speaking as a commanding officer, that it had been the practice for the last 25 years to send in full and complete Returns. If this further concession were granted it would gladden the hearts of many old Volunteers who had given their services to the country for more than 20 years, but who were now deprived of the decoration by the restriction referred to. With respect to the use of the Lee-Metford rifle, it had been suggested to him that when that rifle was served out, the short rifle manual should be abolished, and that the Volunteers should be drilled with the same manual as that used for the Regular Army. He thought the time for this change was fast approaching.

SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.) said, he begged to say a few words with the object of endorsing what had been said by the hon. Baronet respecting the Volunteer medal. The Statute for facilitating the acquisition of sites for barracks and ranges had not been taken advantage of sufficiently, and the Act ought to be amended so as to make it easier for Municipal Authorities to assist Volunteers in such matters. But the chief difficulty against which Volunteer corps had to contend was the growing dearth of officers. The primary cause of this dearth was the expenditure which a commission involved. Eligible young men were deterred from entering corps by the knowledge that they might have to become liable with their colleagues in respect of drillhalls, ranges, &c., for sums in excess of the liability which they felt justified in incurring. If the Volunteer Forces were really required for the defence of the country, officers and men ought to be relieved from those disbursements which they now had to make in connection with their military training. The State ought to provide all the means of attaining efficiency, including complete equipments and drillhalls and ranges. Allowances ought also to be given to both officers and men for camp expenditure. The payments made by the Government to the Volunteers engaged in submarine mining had greatly conduced to the efficiency of the corps, and that seemed to him to be a precedent which might be followed with advantage. One other point was that Volunteer corps suffered distinct loss with regard to capitulation in consequence of enlistments in the Army, and that loss ought to be made good to them in some way or other. Possibly some addition to the status of Volunteer officers would encourage young men to seek commissions. The question of uniform was not an important one in this connection, but a closer assimilation of the Volunteers with the Militia might be advantageous. He was of opinion that not only in the matter of uniform but in other things there might be a closer assimilation between the Volunteers and the Regular Forces, and that more service and greater efficiency should be required. This might be brought about under the present Volunteer conditions by having more afternoon or day drills than there were at present. It would be, in his opinion, right and advantageous to offer commissions in the Regular Army to Volunteer officers in the same way as they were offered to officers in the Militia; and he also thought the exemption from jury service might very well be granted to Volunteers as a return for the work they did for the State. Reference had been made to the desirability of having greater association of the Volunteers with the Regular Forces. He thought it was impossible to over-estimate the advantages that would follow from increased association of this kind. An illustration of the great benefits that were derived from this source was supplied by the efficiency attained by the Volunteer Submarine Miners through their continuous association with only very small detachments of the Coast Brigade of the Royal Engineers. The Submarine Mining Volunteers had received a capitation grant of £5, which was much in excess of the grant made to other Volunteers. If this increased grant had been the means of obtaining efficient service he thought the principle might very well be extended to other branches of the Volunteer Force.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. WINGFIELD-DIGBY said, he was aware there was a Committee now sitting in connection with this question of the Volunteers, which was inquiring into the discipline and status of the Force, but he thought he was right in stating it was not inquiring into such questions as transport. He was bound to say he thought the Government ought to give a capitation grant to any regiment that could turn out a complete regimental transport, including horses, and he would like to press that upon the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War. He could not speak, as other hon. Members had done, as a Volunteer, because he happened to belong to the Sister Service, the Yeomanry, but he took great interest in the Volunteers, and was one of those who, though not serving himself, was perfectly prepared to support with his purse the local corps, and therefore he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would be able to see his way, if not this year, at some future time to give a capitation grant for the purpose he had mentioned. But there were one or two questions in regard to which some of his constituents who were Volunteers had grievances, the chief one of which was with regard to the new medal and long-service decoration. He had received complaints about the decoration and about the date at which those who were serving in the Force should be entitled to wear the decoration. But, in the first place, on behalf of those Volunteers who were interested in the question—and he believed all Volunteers were—he desired to thank the right hon. Gentleman for the concession he had already made in regard to the service being consecutive. Still, he could have wished that the concession had been extended and that there might have been a longer period than one year intervening in the time reckoned for the 20 years' service. For instance, it often happened that a man, on succeeding to his father's business, was unable to continue his Volunteer service for a year or two while he was making himself acquainted with the business, and afterwards was glad to return again to the service, and consequently an interval of two or three years would have met practically the whole of those cases. In connection with the Yeomanry he had known cases where a man on succeeding to his father's business was unable for the first two years to keep up his drills with the corps, but after becoming thoroughly acquainted with his business had returned, as it were, to his first love, his old corps. Many of these were their best men, were strong supporters of the Volunteer movement, and he thought they should be encouraged to return rather than discouraged by making them ineligible for the decoration, and that encouragement be given by allowing a longer interval than one year to elapse during the time they were with the colours. Another grievance had reference to the date of the completion of the 20 years' service in the Volunteer corps. He had had several letters on this subject, and in one company alone of a Volunteer regiment with which he was most familiar he heard there were seven men, having an average of 27 years' service and over, who had been cut out of the decoration. And he would like to point out that in some cases these men were compulsorily retired through age, and therefore the reason of their being cut out was not, so to speak, of their own free will, but purely owing to their compulsory retirement. One of his correspondents complained that the commissioned officers were placed in a better position than the non-commissioned officers and men; and stated that certain officers had been granted the medal whilst some of the non-commissioned officers and men who were equally entitled were left unrewarded. He would, therefore, strongly appeal to the right hon. Gentleman to see whether it would not be possible to get rid of the obnoxious clause—Clause 2—in the Army Order which fixed the date as the 1st January, 1893. He would also like to urge the cause of those he was specially pleading for, the non-commissioned officers and men, who in many instances had been the backbone of the movement, who, at a time when the Force was not so popular as it was now, when officers and men were not so easily obtained, had kept the Force going by their individual efforts. These men felt keenly being cut out from the wearing of this decoration, whilst their juniors who had not spent so much time in the service, or taken such trouble in regard to it, were eligible because in their case there had not been any break in their service. Many of these men he referred to would also, but for being compulsorily retired, still be officers in their corps. He trusted that by some means or other an exception might be made in favour of these men who had done so much for volunteering. He also urged upon the right hon. Gentleman there should not be one law for the officers and another for the non-commissioned officers and men, but that all should be treated upon an equal basis. This was a great grievance with those men who had been compulsorily retired previous to 1893, and he would impress upon the right hon. Gentleman the desirability of allowing these old men to wear the long-service medal. The expense of the few additional medals that would be required could not be much, and he hoped that would not be allowed to stand in the way. Then with regard to the keeping of the records, he thought it was rather hard lines that regiments that had kept their records should have to suffer for those regiments in which records had not been kept. Would it not be possible for the Secretary of State for War to grant the medal decoration in cases where the records of the regiment were authentic, and not punish them for the neglect or perhaps indifference of those regiments and commanding officers who had not kept any records? There was very great feeling in the country on this matter, and some of these old men felt they had not been justly treated, and also that it was unfair there should be one law for the officers and another for the men.

*COLONEL HUGHES (Woolwich) did not think that the claims of the Volunteers ought to be designated by the serious word "grievance," as there were very few things to complain about at the present moment. The Volunteer movement had not been the plaything of Party, but had received the attention of those who were responsible for the defence of the country. The Force had become more serviceable year by year, and, knowing how difficult it must be to impose conditions upon the Volunteers which they would not be eager to accept, he thought the Government had done very wisely in rather following the views of the Volunteers themselves. It was now a very popular Force, though formerly it was not so; and he spoke as one who had belonged to it for 33 years, and had raised a brigade of artillery from 37 men to nearly 500 men. He knew they had grievances in the past, but at the present moment they were only trifling, and had only to be considered to be rectified. With regard to a break of a couple of years in the Service cutting a man out from the decoration, he thought that was rather hard upon the men. The proof of their title to the medal might be put upon the men, and unless that was satisfactory the medal would not be granted; and, as to records, he should hope that in every corps there were records kept from the very commencement of every man who had been enrolled, and therefore there should be no difficulty in accepting every one of these cases. He knew a volunteer who was in his corps, and who resigned because he was going to get married. He said to him, "Well, my dear fellow, after you have been married a little while, you will be glad of an excuse to come out and enjoy yourself," and, as a matter of fact, that was the case, and this man rejoined and continued most efficient. This break in the service ought not to prevent that man from being placed in an equal position with those who had served, perhaps, a less time, though their service had been continuous. He noticed that third-class fare was allowed to officers attending camp or first gun practice. He thought they should either allow a higher class fare or none at all. It seemed to be an indication that the officers were to travel in the same class as the men, which they knew very well they would not do, and which, he thought, would not be in accordance with good discipline. Officers and men drew their allowance for the first time they went down, but there were officers who had to go down a second and even a third time with men to complete the gun practice, but after the first time they went down they got no allowance. Then, again, officers in camp got their 2s. a day, but the whole of that was absorbed in the hire of furniture and other matters that could not be drawn from the stores. If they went on the supposition that all expenses were to be paid by the State, officers ought to have a larger allowance in consideration of not being able to draw camp furniture. Another point was that if a garrison artillery corps armament was changed to 16-pounder guns, the officers were allowed to go again to the School of Instruction at the expense of the country, but if the armament was changed to siege artillery they were not allowed to go again to the School of Instruction except at their own expense, and he could not see the reason for the distinction. But these were matters which he felt sure the War Office authorities would consider in a true and proper light.

*MR. TOMLINSON (Preston) desired, in the first place, to add all the force he could to the suggestion made by his hon. and gallant Friend as to the payment at an earlier period of a portion of the capitation grant. It was a great hardship upon the officers not to have money in hand to meet the expenses. The number of men to be provided for was known at the War Office shortly after the conclusion of the Volunteer year, and if as soon as this was known a proportion of the capitation grant was given it would be a very great boon to the officers in the administration of the corps. His hon. and gallant Friend said something about assimilating the uniform to that of the Militia. He was in a corps in which that had been done except in regard to the lace, and if a change from silver to gold lace was suggested that was a change which was one that he did not desire to advocate; he thought they might swagger quite sufficiently even without so much silver lace as they had now. There was one part of the full dress and parade uniform which he thought might well be dispensed with, and that was the cross-belt, which was used as a substitute for the sash worn by the officers of the Regular Army. He did not see why a sash of a sufficiently distinctive character should not be allowed to Volunteer officers. He deprecated the requiring adjutants of Volunteer battalions to assimilate their uniform to that of the Volunteer officers. One thing essential to the welfare of a Volunteer battalion was to have a good adjutant, and it might well be that an officer in every respect eligible for the post was led to decline to serve in the Volunteer Force because he was required to change his whole uniform. He asked that this question might be reconsidered. He desired also to support the claim to the long-service decoration of those who had served for 20 years continuously in the Volunteer Force, though they might have retired before the date fixed by the new Regulation. Many of those men were a most valuable element even in the present working of the Force in their several districts; and if the decoration was not conferred upon them, it would tend to discourage them in continuing to interest themselves in the Volunteer cause. He did not deny the advantage of brigade camps, although they involved a diminution of the time for instructing the battalion whilst in camp; but he said that if the present brigadier system was to be maintained, it would be desirable to reconsider its construction and see how far it was in harmony with the regimental system, and if it was not in harmony with the regimental system to see what charges ought to be adopted to bring about conformity. Again, if the brigade camp system was to be developed and encouraged, would it not be desirable to arrange to have a camp in which both artillery and infantry were brigaded together? If the Volunteers were to be brought up to that condition of efficiency that they would be fit to take their place in the field they ought to be put to drill not only alongside other battalions, but also in company with artillery, and, if possible, cavalry also. In connection with instruction in musketry he urged the desirability of arranging for the initial practice for recruits in musketry with small charges and at short ranges, which, he said, might be provided for in the barrack yards. Accurate shooting at very small marks should be taught. This would not require any expensive purchases of land for machinery or ranges, but it would only be necessary that the ammunition used should be suitable for short range shooting. Those who have given close attention to the subject were of opinion that the shooting of the Volunteers and of the Army generally could be very much improved if recruits were not allowed to go to the long ranges until they had learned to hit small objects at a short distance. He did not know what proportion of the engineer force to the artillery and infantry was arranged, but unless there was some reason which, on military grounds, made it desirable not to increase the Volunteer engineer force beyond a certain limit, he believed that a much larger and an extremely efficient corps might easily be obtained. There were in many parts of the country persons who were perfectly skilled or who would quickly become so, in all the field work of the engineers, and who would readily join a force of that kind in which they could make use of the knowledge they had acquired in the course of their daily avocations, and who would be glad to apply these qualifications to the service of their country if the War Office would allow some additional engineers to these corps. Very many Volunteer corps had efficient cyclist squads attached to them, and as there was some expense connected with forming cyclist detachments it might be well for the War Office to consider whether they could not give some slight additional allowance in the case of efficient cyclists.

*SIR E. HILL (Bristol, S.) had no intention of inflicting a long speech on the Committee, but desired to say a few words on the Volunteers, a service in which he had been interested for a number of years. He was a Member of the Committee which had sat to consider matters in connection with the Volunteer service, and he was somewhat hampered by the fact that that Committee had not yet reported on the subjects brought before it, and to which he should not, therefore, think it right to call attention in any way. He desired to join in the remarks of satisfaction made by his hon. and gallant Friend below him on the condition of the Volunteer Force. At the present moment not only had it increased in regard to numbers, but he spoke from personal experience when he said that the spirit which called the Volunteers into being existed as strongly as ever it did, and if the present numbers were not considered sufficient a very slight appeal would cause a large number more to flock to the service. But there was one dark cloud overhanging the Volunteer service, and that was the difficulty of obtaining officers. He need scarcely say that it was absolutely useless to have a large number of men unless they could command the services of efficient officers in suitable quantities. Many reasons had been given for this difficulty. Some had said it was because of the expense. That was not his experience at all. It was idle to say that the cost of the outfit of a Volunteer officer stood at all in the way of increasing the numbers. There were immense numbers of people in this country to whom the question of £40 and an expenditure of £10 a year was a mere bagatelle. Other reasons had been adduced for the difficulty, and it had been suggested that if they clothed the Volunteer officers in a particular simple garb they would have more gentlemen coming forward. He thought that would be a mistake. The only way in which the Volunteer service could be made attractive to what he might term the officer-bearing class was by increasing and maintaining, as far as possible, and improving its military status. That might be done in many ways. Some he did not feel able to refer to for the reason he stated just now; and there were others. He thought that unless they could bring home to the public generally that the Volunteers were not merely a number of excellently intentioned persons who had learned a certain amount of drill and the use of arms, and were considered meritorious and well deserving, but that they absolutely formed an integral and indispensable portion of the defensive force of the country and were a necessary part of Her Majesty's Army, he did not think they would greatly increase the number of officers. If they succeeded, however, in impressing this on the public mind he could not help thinking that there was sufficient patriotism among the officer-bearing class to come forward and do themselves the honour of accepting Her Majesty's Commission. Another way in which the desired result might be brought about was this. He thought that until the whole of the expense of the military training of the Volunteers was borne by the public, so long would it be difficult to impress the public mind with the fact that they were indispensable and necessary. His own feeling was that it was absolutely derogatory to the service that the public should be appealed to for subscriptions to pay for uniforms, greatcoats, accoutrements, drill-sheds, and rifle-butts. All these were necessary to military training, and as long as the Government did not provide them, the public would say to the Volunteers, "It is very kind of you to come forward, but really you are not wanted, and you ought to be thankful to us for doing as much for you as we do." On the other hand, he should like to express his gratitude to the Secretary of State for War—not only of this Government, from whom the Volunteers had received every consideration—and to his predecessors for what they had done for the Volunteers. He thought it was very desirable to encourage the attendance of officers at the Schools of Instruction, and both officers and men should also be encouraged to attend the exercises of the Regular Forces, particularly field exercise. It was of importance that the Volunteers should be brought into close contact with the Regulars, so that they might note their soldierly bearing. It was a mistake to ask Volunteer officers to travel third-class, not to pay for their chargers, or not to supply them with fodder for their horses—a small point, no doubt, but it was injurious to the service to neglect it. Then, he did not know why Volunteer officers when at school should be regarded as in a different position to their brother officers in the Militia. They were men of the same standard, and should be treated equally. He sympathised with what had been said about transport, which could be arranged for locally better than centrally, and at less cost. And as to uniform, whatever might be the best for the soldier, all troops, Regulars and Auxiliary, ought to be dressed in the same way. Why should Volunteers, who must necessarily be the less disciplined troops in a combined force, be marked out by their dress as the men who were the least capable of withstanding an attack? The uniforms of Regulars and Volunteers ought not to be distinguishable to an enemy; and whatever lace was considered necessary for an officer ought to be worn by all alike. The continued efficiency of Volunteers depended largely on a constant supply of good adjutants. If the existence of the Volunteer Force were a military necessity, there could not be a more important duty than the drilling of Volunteers. He did not know much about the infantry. He believed there was not much difficulty in getting a selection of good officers; but there was great difficulty in the Artillery. An adjutant of Volunteers who had to look after a good big regiment was thereby the better fitted for regular command, because he must have acquired a considerable amount of tact. However efficient a colonel of a regiment of Volunteers might be, it was impossible for him to go through the work which devolved upon an adjutant. As there was difficulty in getting good adjutants in the artillery, he would put it to the Secretary for War that it was worth considering whether greater attractions could not be held out so as to secure the services of the best men who were available. There was only one other matter upon which he wished to say a word, and that was as to the medal for non-commissioned officers and men. He hoped it would be found possible to give the medal to everyone who had actually served for 20 years. His experience in command went back 30 years, and he was able to speak most highly of the assistance he had received from non-commissioned officers from time to time. He had known many of these men who had worked hard in the interests of the service, and had devoted a great deal of their time and money to it, and he thought it would be a gracious recognition of their service if they were allowed to participate in the decoration whether they had retired or not, so long as they had served 20 years. He joined in the appeal to the Secretary of State to see if he could not do something in this matter. The Volunteers would always be ready to respond to whatever calls might be made upon them, and, on the other hand, he thought they should receive at the hands of Her Majesty's Government every consideration, which they deserved.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I think I may now make some reply to the observations which have been made, and, in the first place, as regards the point last adverted to by the hon. and gallant Member who has just sat down—namely, the long-service medal. Several hon. Members have told the House that they have received a great number of representations with regard to the long-service medal, but that number will be nothing to the number that have reached me from all quarters. The matter is a simple one. When it was determined to institute the medal for non-commissioned officers and privates, it was not contemplated that it should be given except to those who were then serving, and that accounted for the fixing of what has been called an arbitrary date—the 1st January, 1893. It is said that that date is somewhat earlier than it ought to have been, but it has been chosen with a view to including the men serving at the time that the announcement was made. In considering the matter, it was in our minds that there might be a demand that the Volunteers who had served in previous years might be included amongst those eligible for the distinction. Let me say that I agree with what has been said by one or two hon. Members that among earlier Volunteers there may be those who almost deserve recognition in a higher degree than those who are now serving. Volunteers 20 or 30 years ago found their duties more arduous than did the Volunteers of the present day, who, although they no doubt have laborious duties to perform, find their paths easier than did their predecessors; but obviously if we were to go back behind the date named, we must go back to the very beginning of the force, and, according to the best of my information, there would be great difficulty in deciding applications which would be made in regard to the early period of the Volunteer movement. For instance, the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Lewes admitted that, so far as control or clerical work went, he was nearly the whole regiment in himself. He was not only commanding officer, but orderly clerk and adjutant, and the whole organisation of the corps. In these early days in many corps there was a lack of records with regard to all except officers, whose claims, of course, are recorded in the Army List. There may be some corps that have complete records and others that have not, and that would lead to inequality as between men whose services and claims are equal. I am not one of those who thought that where a corps had kept its records well, it should have an advantage. Where two men had given equally good service it was hard on a man who, through no fault of his, because records had been lost, was deprived of the medal, while his comrade who had been in a better-conducted corps received it. But there has been disclosed a very strong desire that the older Volunteers should receive the long-service medal, and I will inquire whether the difficulties to which I have referred can be overcome, so that the distinction may be extended to all Volunteers who can show satisfactorily that they have given the requisite service. No doubt we shall be able, in some way or other, to overcome them. There remains the question of interruption of service. I have already made arrangements by which the hiatus in the period of service of not longer than a year will be allowed if it is due to a reasonable cause, such as change of employment or change of residence. I am not disposed to go further and admit a man who out of his own caprice has served for a year or two, and then has given it up, and, when it has suited him, again has taken it up once more. Subject to these conditions, I hope to be able to hit upon some way of overcoming the difficulties which presented themselves at the outset, and so to include older Volunteers among those whose services the Queen has been graciously pleased to approve by the institution of this medal. During the course of the Debate a very considerable number of questions have been put to me by various Members. It is impossible for me to reply to them seriatim, but I have carefully noted the principal points of the long category of subjects touched upon by my hon. Friend the Member for Lewes, and as I believe they cover most of those that have been raised I shall single out the hon. Baronet as the special victim of my reply. My hon. Friend wishes that the Capitation Grant should be paid as soon as it is earned.

SIR H. FLETCHER: A proportion of it.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: But it is now paid before it is earned. It is due on the 1st of April in respect of the coming year. It is not a payment of money earned in the past year, but a payment of the amount that will be due in the coming year, based on the figures of the past year. There is a clear distinction established. The payment is made somewhat on the principle of the Income Tax assessment. The Capitation Grant paid on the 1st of April one year is for the year then commencing, and not for the year then past. As they must, of course, have some figures to go on, they took the figures of the previous year as the scale for the coming year. Then the hon. Member turns to the question of the transport. He asks whether, where a transport corps is raised, some allowance cannot be made. There is a good deal of force in that, if the raising of these corps had been adopted as a general system. But that has never been the case. In isolated cases transport has been provided. The efforts made by certain corps in that direction are being watched, and, if they are successful, the desirability of instituting a general system will be considered. The hon. Member asked why a Volunteer regiment has to bear the loss of uniform in the case of a Volunteer enlisting in the Regular Army. We are glad to see Volunteers enlist, and I am glad to think that there is, though not a large, still an increasing, number who do so enlist, and it would be hard if the result of such enlistment was to impose serious loss on the corps. But as the corps receives capitation money in respect of each man if he has gone through his drills, I think that amount should be set off against any such loss that the corps may sustain. Then I come to the question of the dress of the Volunteers. It has been urged that the uniform of the Volunteers should be the same as that of the Regular Army. Personally, I agree with the hon. Member who last spoke. I consider that any glaring distinction in the dress of the different regiments is a mistake, and may be the cause of weakness in the case of an emergency. But, at the same time, it must be remembered that when the territorial system was introduced inducements were offered to the Volunteers to clothe themselves like the Regulars, and if they then preferred to retain their old uniforms the Government cannot be expected now to contract any expense in the matter. But I am entirely with the hon. and gallant Gentleman, that it would have been a very desirable thing if the Volunteers had agreed to change their uniform when the territorial system was introduced. I have before now expressed my inability to understand the genesis of the brigadier, or what his amphibious duties consist of; but, without carrying the obvious attractiveness of the subject as a matter of joking further, I must say that I think the appointment of brigadiers has been a good thing. A number of projects under this head have come before me, some from outside and some from inside the War Office. There are those who think that there ought to be a complete war organisation for Volunteers—Volunteer from top to bottom, from Volunteer generals downwards. That is one extreme view. The other view is that the proper brigadier for a Volunteer brigade is the colonel of the district in which the brigade is situated. Between these two extremes we have the present somewhat anomalous arrangement, which must obviously drift into something different before long. The matter has occupied the best and most authoritative and experienced minds at the War Office for some time past, and I hope that before long some modification may be introduced that will remove the inconsistent and almost indefensible position of this officer and his organisation. The hon. and gallant Gentleman referred to the Musketry Regulations. It is intended to make some alterations in this matter, and I am bound to warn hon. Gentlemen, though without desiring to alarm them, that these changes will be in the direction of stiffening the test. I quite agree that in these things it is necessary to follow the Volunteers, and not to force them too hard; but I believe that they are very willing to submit to anything that will promote their efficiency and increase their fitness for service. I do not wish to frighten my hon. and gallant Friend into the idea that anything terrible is contemplated, but we do intend to make some changes, and these, as I have said, will be in the direction of increasing the test. Then, as to the dearth of officers, it is, no doubt, a great difficulty, but it is not greater now than it has been. No figures that I have seen lately show that the deficiency has increased, but it is undoubtedly a serious matter, whatever the cause may be—whether it is, as is sometimes said, the initial cost of the uniform, whether it be the chance of incurring expense in connection with the corps afterwards, or whether it be, as my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Bristol said, the want of military stiffness, or whether it be the greater attraction of golf clubs, cricket clubs, and football clubs. Whatever the reason, the difficulty exists. One of the suggestions made is to increase the status of Volunteer officers. But I am not sure that that would have any effect, because they had to meet the same difficulty in the case of Militia regiments. The hon. and gallant Member for Woolwich said he thought the Volunteers have no real grievances, but that they have a few small complaints to make. He mentioned some of these in good temper and reasonableness, and I will look into them. The hon. Member for Preston made a very reasonable suggestion with regard to shooting—namely, that it should be allowed at short ranges with reduced charges in initial stages. I am glad to say that that is being tried, 20,000 rounds of the reduced charges having been issued as an experiment. I think now I have touched upon all the subjects referred to. I can only assure hon. and gallant Gentlemen who, on these matters, speak from their own experience, that I have taken note of all their suggestions, and will see that they are considered and decided upon with every desire to do everything in my power to increase the efficiency of the Volunteer Force.

SIR H. FLETCHER said, he felt grateful for the concession the right hon.

Mr. Campbell-Bannerman

Gentleman had made in regard to bestowing the long-service medal upon Volunteers who might have left their corps before the date originally announced. With regard to uniform, he had not meant to suggest that all Volunteer corps should be forced to adopt the dress of the territorial regiments to which they were attached, but that an endeavour should be made to bring about uniformity when future changes were made. All antiquated badges should be done away with, and an assimilation made between the Volunteer and territorial regiments. He was glad the right hon. Gentleman had undertaken to consider the other points brought before him. The question of transport he regarded as important, and he could assure the Secretary for War that he would not ask for an allowance to be made unless the transport was efficient and satisfactory to the inspecting officer.

COLONEL KENYON-SLANEY said, that if he rightly understood the attitude of the right hon. Gentleman with regard to the provision of transport, it was this—that while he conceded the value of the suggestion made—that if an efficient transport was paraded it would be worthy of consideration whether it should not receive some allowance, he would at the same time prefer to wait until the system was more generally adopted before he considered the point of making a contingent allowance. He thought that if the right hon. Gentleman wished to develop the idea he should endeavour to help it on, and not wait until it had reached efficiency by its own spontaneous growth. On that point perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would be willing to consider even more favourably the suggestion of his hon. Friend. On the whole matter of the Volunteer Force, as on all other subjects presented to them in the Estimates, hon. Members were bound to be critics—though he hoped not captious critics. He was delighted that there had been an increase in the number of the Volunteer Force, and that the allowance for the attendance of Volunteers at camps of instruction had been increased by no less than £10,000. And this brought him to a point on which he had had some correspondence with the right hon. Gentleman—in regard to these camps and enabling Volunteers to attend them.

There was one cardinal point to be kept in view, and that was that every Volunteer Corps should have a chance of attending a brigade camp—not composed of Volunteers only, though he was not disposed to run those camps down—but composed essentially of Regulars, at all events every few years. The Volunteers should all have the chance of standing side by side with the Regulars, of seeing how discipline was conducted, and of learning how regular soldiers prepared for warfare. There were several Volunteer Corps—he himself could name more than one—which were anxious and willing to submit to that sort of training, and the only obstacle to the accomplishment of their desire was the old vulgar trouble of expense. It ought to be remembered that many of the Volunteer Corps and some of those who would most benefit by this additional training happened by local circumstances to be at a long distance from a camp of instruction of the Regular Forces, and that heavy cost must be incurred in attending such camp, the Government allowance not being sufficient. That cost at present must fall on the officers, and it was too much to subject them to such a heavy expense. He thought this was a question of essential importance which affected very closely the efficiency of the Volunteer Force. The right hon. Gentleman would, he thought, be in sympathy with him when he asked if there had been any development in the Volunteer Forces on the question of Mounted Infantry, because that branch of the Service he thought might be pushed with some advantage in the Volunteer system. That branch had about it something extremely attractive to the younger, keener, and more ardent spirits connected with the Forces—particularly to those who were really fond of the horse, and to whom soldiering came all the more pleasantly when it was combined with the use of the horse they loved and were accustomed to. The circumstances surrounding the training and exercising of mounted infantry were such as would induce many an old soldier to join a corps, if Mounted Infantry companies were attached. This branch of the Service, he took it, therefore, deserved as much encouragement as could be bestowed on the Volunteer movement. The question of the dearth of officers, which had been referred to by several hon. Gentlemen, and by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State himself, was a very serious difficulty. There seemed to be a serious difference in this respect in the case of the corps manned and officered in the big towns, and the corps manned and officered in the rural districts. The difficulty was more pressingly felt amongst the rural than amongst the urban corps. In the rural districts they had to depend for their officers—though he did not say they ought to—upon gentlemen who were not as a rule very wealthy or able to bear the cost which attached to the position. The rural Volunteer Corps generally found their centres, company by company, in the little rural towns. Those towns probably gave their name to the companies, and out of those towns the officers had to be found. It was a matter of common knowledge to people acquainted with rural life that in such towns there were not a large number of leisured or wealthy men. If the Government wished to induce the best class of officer to join these corps they ought to make the position as attractive to them as possible. It might be possible to make some concession in the matter of jury service, or to make some allowance for travelling expenses. Again, when they were out for their training it became a necessity, when in camp, for them to establish a mess. He would suggest that something might be done in the way of mess allowances when officers were obliged to constitute a mess, and they had to do so occasionally in order to maintain their position amongst the officers in other branches of the Service. Another suggestion he would make was that, when field officers were called upon to do duty at a distance, the cost of the conveyance of their chargers should be borne by the Government. Everything that could be done in this direction should be done, for the mounted officers of Volunteer Corps were not all of them in a position to keep horses for their own amusement and sport. The provision of a reliable charger was not always an easy thing for a man who had not a large stable at his command; therefore, everything that could be done to minimise the cost to the officers in this direction would be most valuable. Then, it was suggested that the time had passed when the actual military necessities of a Volunteer should be found by private subscription. The provision of drill sheds should be made for the Volunteers at the public expense. At present the cap had to be sent round, and, as a rule, the first person to whom it was presented was the local Member of Parliament. No doubt Members could not spend their money on a more laudable object, still, the tax was a serious one, and one from which all well-wishers of the corps ought to be relieved. Another point was this: he supposed that nothing more interested Volunteer Corps than annual prize-shooting competitions that took place company by company and sometimes regiment by regiment. What happened then? The prizes all had to be found from local sources. He did not object to that, as he thought this was a matter in which the residents in a town could show their sympathy for and give support to the Volunteer movement. He was glad to think that the demand for subscriptions was, as a rule, generously responded to. But would it not be an extra inducement to the men if, in addition to the local prizes of a pound of tea, a barrel of beer, a bottle of whisky, a turkey, a fat pig, and all the other things which constituted the prize list, a special prize were sent down by the Secretary for War in his official capacity? To have such prizes would advance the general interest felt in the corps and bring it into closer relationship with the War Office and the Regular Forces, which was a thing they were all aiming at and seeking to accomplish.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston) asked whether it would be possible to increase engineers' establishments?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN replied that they did not at present think of increasing that establishment.

MR. W. SIDEBOTTOM (Derbyshire, High Peak) said, that the Secretary for War had thrown a shell which had scattered his ideas to the winds when he said that the capitation grants given to the Volunteers were not for the year past, but for the year to come. When he (Mr. Sidebottom) joined the Volunteers he was under a different impression, believing that the grant earned for the year was paid on the next following April 1. He was sure what the right hon. Gentleman had stated was not thoroughly understood by the commanding officers of Volunteer corps. One thing was certain—namely, the financial position of these corps was altered if the right hon. Gentleman's statement was true, for those corps which had considered themselves solvent up to now would know that they were totally insolvent. It would be impossible for many of them, should they come to be dissolved, to meet their liabilities. The right hon. Gentleman had said that Volunteers joining the Regular Army would be no loss to their corps, but that was erroneous, for the corps, instead of earning the capitation grant of 35s., would get nothing at all, and all the trouble and expense devoted to them would be thrown away. They all approved of Volunteers joining the Army. He thought it a good thing for the Army to be reinforced in that way, but he could assure the right hon. Gentleman that commanding officers of Volunteer corps would not give facilities for recruiting sergeants to go amongst their men if they knew that the result would be that they would be mulcted of the capitation grant in the case of the men enlisted. The right hon. Gentleman should give an undertaking that in these cases the capitation grant would not be lost to the corps. As to the causes which militated against young men joining the Force as officers he believed the initial difficulty with most corps was the question of expense, and he was confident that if the Government relieved the Volunteer officer of some of the necessary charges and expenses he had now to bear, the number of officers would soon be largely increased. An economical outfit could not be obtained for less than £30, and the annual expense was at least £15. No improvement in this matter could be looked for until these charges could be in some way reduced, particularly at the present time, when agriculture and trade were so depressed. Young men were less inclined than formerly to incur the necessary initial expense, especially as they could obtain amusement in the golf clubs, and in other ways that had been mentioned, at much less cost and perhaps be more their own masters. He thought, therefore, that if something in the direction suggested by the hon. Member for Sussex were done it would have the effect of increasing the number of Volunteer officers. With regard to camps of instruction, he wished to point out that the cost to Volunteers in attending a regimental camp was much more than in attending a brigade camp. While the brigade camp might be more useful to field officers, the regimental camp was certainly far more useful in the way of instruction to the subaltern and the rank and file. Why a difference should be made in the allowances for attending the camps he could not understand, and he would suggest that the allowances for attending the regimental camp should be raised so as to be at least equal to those granted in the other case. He hoped the military authorities would favourably consider the various suggestions that had been offered for the improvement of the Force.

MR. HANBURY said that, with regard to the appeal made to the right hon. Gentleman as to the exemption of Volunteers from serving on juries, he thought the proposal was a good one. No doubt it would have the effect of bringing in more officers, but he would suggest that the right hon. Gentleman should not deal with the officers alone in an isolated way. The Regulation should be a general one—to apply to all Volunteers.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, the proposal was to exempt Volunteer officers from service on juries, otherwise there would be no inducement for the men to become officers.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) hoped the right hon. Gentleman, in considering the question of exemption from service on juries, would draw a distinction between the demands of duty and absence on account of private interests.

*MR. BRODRICK asked the Secretary for War to take into favourable consideration the question of arming Volunteer brigades with the magazine rifle in those cases where existing arrangements afforded adequate means of practising with that weapon—where adequate range accommodation could be found. He believed that there were cases in which whole brigades, both in Scotland and in London, had ranges which admitted of practice with the magazine rifle, and seeing that these brigades were likely, on mobilisation for home defence, to serve with Regulars in the field, it appeared to him essential to take steps to arm them with a rifle of the .303 bore pending the general arming of the Volunteers, which, from the account given by the Secretary of State of existing range accommodation, would not be speedily concluded.

MR. T. H. BOLTON (St. Pancras, N.) was sorry his suggestion last year for affording facilities to Volunteer officers for passing into the Regular Army in the same way as did Militia officers had not been very encouragingly received by the right hon. Gentleman, but he still hoped it would be considered, as he believed it would attract gentlemen to join the Force. Not only would it act as an inducement, but it would help to raise the tone and character of Volunteer officers, and would certainly be appreciated as a graceful act on the part of the right hon. Gentleman.

*MR. GODSON (Kidderminster) expressed regret at the present dearth of Volunteer officers, and observed that many married officers, who had done good service and wished to retire, refrained from doing so apprehending that their places might not be refilled. It was at the greatest pinch in some of the agricultural and manufacturing districts in the Midlands that officers were able to continue in the Force, but a sense of duty kept them there. This was a very important point, and deserved serious and immediate consideration. He also urged that assistance should be given by the Government to Volunteers who, in the case of isolated local companies, were compelled to travel long distances to their ranges. He could give one instance where Volunteers had to travel four and a-half miles to their range.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, if the hon. Member would give particulars of the case he referred to, he would see whether an allowance could be made to the men. An allowance was made when Volunteers were compelled to go beyond a certain distance for instruction and practice in shooting. On the subject mentioned by the hon. Member for St. Pancras as to the inducements to be given to young men to take commissions in the Volunteer Force, he had an open mind, and the suggestion would not be forgotten. The question of exemption from jury service was now under the consideration of the Committee on the Volunteer Acts, and therefore he thought he ought to express no opinion upon it. With regard to the suggestion that the mess expenses of officers in camp should be met by extra allowances, he doubted whether that would be a popular change if no corresponding allowance was given to the men. Besides, it would be an innovation. At present a grant was given to a whole corps; nothing was given to the individual man. To give a special allowance to an officer in respect of his mess expenses would therefore be a novelty. The question of the hon. Member for the Guildford Division would, he thought, be dealt with more conveniently on the Vote for Stores. After the bombardment he had been subjected to last night in reference to the Militia, he was nervous about promising anything for fear other things might be asked for; but the case mentioned as to the want of range accommodation was exceptional. If the range accommodation for the whole force of every description were sufficient it would, no doubt, justify the speedy issue of new rifles.

Vote agreed to.

3. Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £631,600, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for Transport and Remounts, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1895."

Mr. JEFFREYS (Hants, Basingstoke) asked for information as to the proportion of horses to men in cavalry regiments. It was quite clear that there were not a sufficient number of horses to mount the men. Some of the regiments were very short indeed of horses, and ought to be put on a better footing. The answer generally was that it was unnecessary to keep the cavalry on a war footing, but without giving a horse to every man the regiments might be properly equipped. He suggested that trials ought occasionally to be made of the reserve horses which in times of emergency would be used for transport purposes. There were 14,000 of these horses, mainly employed in drawing omnibuses and tramcars, and it was doubtful how they would behave when they were put to draw transport wagons amid the noise of bands and guns. Some steps should be taken to see whether we had really a useful reserve of 40,000 horses or whether it was merely a reserve on paper.

Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said that, though he did not speak with any personal authority on the question, he understood that the proportion of horses to men in cavalry regiments was not at all in an unsatisfactory position. In the regiments first for foreign service there were 682 men of all ranks and 410 horses. That was considered to be the proper complement. Every one, he believed, who was acquainted with the economy of cavalry regiments agreed that there were always a large number of dismounted men engaged in duties which did not involve riding. With regard to the training of "ear-marked" horses, he said it was not considered to be a serious matter that such horses should not be trained. In every Army there was a large number of horses which had no previous military training.

THE MARQUESS OF CARMARTHEN (Lambeth, Brixton) referred to the recent extension of the policy which had taken place of conveying troops round the coast by sea instead of sending them by rail. Last year the King's Own Borderers were sent from Chatham to Hull by sea in the Assistance, and were then marched to York in midwinter. This policy involved a considerable waste of money as well as of time. He had spoken to naval officers on the subject, and they had absolutely condemned this policy. Without committing himself on the matter one way or the other, he would be glad of any information the right hon. Gentleman could give about it.

Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, the question had been looked into some time ago, though he did not remember the circumstance just referred to. The sending of troops by sea should be avoided in bad weather and reduced to a minimum. The question of fitness of vessels for the purpose and the accommodation they afforded should also be considered. With regard to sending a regiment to Hull, he would look into the subject. The War Office wished to avoid these occurrences as much as possible.

Mr. HANBURY said, this case was worse than the hon. Member had made it, because the troops had been sent by sea in very bad weather. The regiment was removed from Plymouth, not Chatham, to Hull by sea, and then they were marched to York. Sea transport ought only to be undertaken when absolutely necessary, such as the passage from England to Ireland. The Assistance was a disgrace to the Service as a troopship. There was no sleeping accommodation for either the non-commissioned officers or the men, and if the vessel belonged to a private owner it would not be allowed to carry steerage passengers at all. The men even did not like to use their blankets on deck on account of the heavy damages they might have to pay. Questions had been asked in Parliament about it time after time, but the Government still went on employing this wretched old tub. He asked the right hon. Gentleman to consider how far it would be possible to reduce this Transport Vote by a wise economy. It was difficult to see why such constant changes of station were made unless on account of the unfitness of the barracks for troops to remain in them long at a time. He suggested that troops might be marched a great deal more than they were from station to station instead of being constantly carried by train. The War Office was throwing away a great opportunity in not marching troops in these circumstances through the rural villages with the object of securing recruits. It was a serious evil that the recruits for the Army were being more and more drawn from the large towns, where the men obtained were not of such good physique.

COLONEL WARING (Down, N.) said, with regard to conveyance of troops by sea, he had made a passage in the Assistance, and could confirm what had been said about the vessel. The officers' accommodation was good, but the accommodation for the men was simply shameful. Nothing had been done to improve her for the last 10 or 12 years, and it was time that the Assistance was superseded by a vessel of a better class.

COLONEL LOCKWOOD (Essex, Epping) also entered a protest with reference to the accommodation for the men on board the Assistance. He asked the right hon. Gentleman to inform the House what means of inspection were provided of the quality and condition of the registered reserve horses, and who was responsible for the inspection? Though he agreed generally in the view that troops should be marched more frequently through the villages, he pointed out that the question of despatching troops by rail from time to time was a necessary part of their training.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN repeated he had no recollection of the case which had been referred to on board the Assistance. He remembered the case where the vessel took a battalion from Scotland to Dover in distressing circumstances and when a Committee of Inquiry was appointed. Hon. Members, however, should remember that the ship was under the control of the Admiralty. She had been certified as a most useful ship for coast purposes, and, as he had before stated, she would only be sent to sea in good weather. He quite agreed with hon. Members opposite in thinking that a voyage in such a vessel in stormy weather was a thing which soldiers ought not to be subjected to, and he would inquire further into the matter. There was a great deal in what the hon. Member said as to the movement of troops, and the matter should be looked into. He hoped the most common-sense solution would be arrived at. In regard to the inspection of horses, this took place periodically, and satisfied the War Office that the horses were in good condition.

*MR. BRODRICK said, that as to the training of reserve horses to ensure their usefulness on active service, he thought the necessity for that had been somewhat overstated by his hon. and gallant Friend, for they had high authority for the belief that while the transport horses now employed in omnibuses and trams would be in excellent condition for the work assigned to them, the horses registered by Masters of Hounds and others for cavalry service would, after a very short training, be fit to be placed in line with trained animals. If these authorities, like the hon. and gallant General behind him, were relied upon, they need not trouble about training them. He wished, however, to particularly refer to the subject of billeting, and to remind the Secretary of State for War of his former promise to provide some sort of rest houses for cavalry when moving from one place to another. He mentioned the point again now as his constituents were very much interested in the subject and had made frequent representations to him. Indeed, two of the towns in the division he represented were the places chiefly affected by over-billeting, because at all periods of the year troops were passing through them.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, he wished to strongly advise the Secretary of State for War not to be beguiled by any Admiralty officials in regard to the Assistance, as those persons seemed to be of opinion that anything was good enough for a soldier. If the right hon. Gentleman wished to test the vessel let him go to sea in her in a good strong equinoctial gale.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : Or send the Secretary to the Admiralty.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, that that would be much better still, especially if the Secretary were accompanied by the First Lord of the Admiralty. If they came back he would be very glad to see them again. They were paying £325,000 this year for doing for the Army that which it ought to do for itself. Surely one of the most important things in the training of the Army was its movement from place to place. Why should they not use their horses and their feet instead of having recourse to more expensive methods of transport? That admirable vessel, the Assistance, cost them no less than £10,000 a year for coast purposes, whereas the vessels which took the troops to India cost little more than double that. He thought the system of relying on hired transports and giving up the troopers was bad, and he saw no reason why the War Office should not increase, rather than diminish, the use of Her Majesty's troopships, which formed a most useful reserve. He had before him a statement showing the relative cost of taking troops to India in Government vessels and in hired transports, and he found that in the former case it was £9 and in the latter it ranged from £10 to £14.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : The cost of conveying soldiers to India is paid by India, and does not come out of this Vote.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, that might be so, but a comparison that was good for India was equally applicable to the cost of transport to other places to which we sent troops; and he must repeat that if the Government had their own ships for the work, those ships, manned as they would be by naval officers and men, would constitute a valuable reserve. This matter deserved the attention of the Secretary for War, who was, he believed, the superior officer of the First Lord of the Admiralty. [MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN dissented.] At any rate, the First Lord had to apply to him for honours for the Navy. It was very unfortunate that Imperial ships should be used less and less for transport, and that hired vessels should be more and more resorted to. He noticed in the Estimates that chaplains cost £1,100 a year for their journeyings, while the veterinary surgeons only cost £870 for conveyance. It seemed to him, however, that the latter were at least as important an adjunct to a cavalry regiment as the former, and if he belonged to the cavalry he would prefer to leave the chaplain behind and take the veterinary surgeon. Why when the regiment moved could not the chaplain be left behind? Surely each regiment had not its own particular orthodoxy professed by its own particular chaplain. One chaplain must be assumed to be as good as another in the Service for the purpose of teaching spiritual dogma, and no regiment ought to fear trusting itself to a particular chaplain, lest it should imbibe erroneous opinions. £1,100 a year seemed to him to be a large sum for taking theology about the country. He recommended these matters to the serious attention of the right hon. Gentleman, and again advised him not to believe too implicitly in Admiralty statements.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, the hon. Gentleman was continually recommending matters to his serious consideration, but what he had said as to the chaplains was surely not to be taken seriously. At one time he believed there was a chaplain to each regiment, but now that was no longer so; chaplains were in the nature of staff officers, they had to move about from one station to another, and hence that item in the Estimates. In discussing the question of troopships under this Vote they must exclude the Indian troopers, which were worn out and were replaced temporarily by hired transports pending the decision of the Admiralty and the War Office as to future arrangements. Dealing with the question of transport within European waters, he was disposed to agree with the hon. Member, that it was desirable to have a certain amount of transport accommodation of their own, though they might of course have to resort to hiring on occasions. As to billeting, he had stated the other day that he had endeavoured to vary the routes as much as possible, and to spare those places which had complained of excessive billeting. Only at Exeter, however, had they been able to establish a camp of rest, and the great difficulty had been in obtaining ground for such camps.

MR. HANBURY said, he understood they had a distinct promise that this was the last time the Assistance should appear in this Vote. This vessel cost something like £10,000 a year. In the interests of soldiers he must press for some assurance on the point. The complaints about her had been made for many years. She was not the kind of ship in which troops ought to be put; and yet she had been at sea in stormy weather for four or five days, with troops on board bound from Plymouth to Hull, although she had not accommodation even for seasonable weather. Naturally the Admiralty did not wish to lose the £4,500 received annually from the War Department for the use of the ship, and consequently their statements on the point must be looked on with suspicion. The time had come to protest against the continued use of the vessel, and, therefore, with the object of obtaining a satisfactory statement he would move the reduction of the Vote by £1,000. He wished to add a word about the Army Service Corps. He was told that the work of the transport companies was work that any ordinary civilian could do; that very little training was required; and that at any time it would be easy to obtain as many competent men as might be required. Yet they were giving as much pay to two drivers as they gave to three privates in the Army. It would be an economy if the whole work were done by contract in time of peace. He moved the reduction of the Vote.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £630,100, be granted for the said Service."—(Mr. Hanbury.)

MR. C. H. WILSON (Hull, W.) believed it to be important that the people should see as much of the troops as possible. Unfortunately, they never saw them at Hull except in the case of a strike; but he was in Hull at the time a certain regiment embarked there in the Assistance, and in view of the excitement and interest created by the event he was convinced of the desirability, in the interests of the Army itself, that the soldiers should march through our towns and villages as much as possible. As to the Assistance, they were told that it was not over safe, and that it was dangerous for it to undertake winter voyages. Whatever was the country coming to? We were daily sending out iron ships heavily laden with passengers and cargo making voyages to all parts of the world, and yet it was said that one of Her Majesty's troopships could not safely go from Plymouth to Hull and back. He could not agree with the statement that the Assistance was unsafe. He remembered seeing troops embark for the Crimea, and he could tell the House that they had then to travel in much inferior ships. This system of conveying troops had been too little used, and he trusted it would be continued in spite of the protest that had been made. He, for one, could not support the Motion for the reduction of the Vote.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, he had already explained that he was not personally cognizant of the circumstances under which the arrangements were made for sending the troops by the Assistance; and, with every disposition to prevent anything like improper transport by a vessel lacking in proper accommodation, he could not at once give a pledge in a matter involving inquiry in more than one department.

MR. HANBURY said, the right hon. Gentleman was always anxious to meet them in a fair spirit, and he was always willing to show his gratitude for such treatment. He would, therefore, in view of the assurances given him, not press his Amendment to a Division. But he would like to say in reply to the hon. Member for Hull, said it was not so much a question of safety as of want of proper accommodation, for if the hon. Member owned a vessel of the kind he would not be allowed to put steerage passengers into it; and our troops suffered by being sent long voyages in mid-winter in this wretched boat. It was simply ridiculous to suggest that because the people of Hull liked to see them, soldiers should be sent long voyages in wintry weather, in a wretched boat of this character. He agreed that the troops should be seen in as many towns and villages as possible; but even at the risk of disappointing the people of Hull, he was inclined to stop the Assistance even going there again.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(No. 115.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

*THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, in moving the Second Reading, that the Bill emanated from the Church of England Temperance Society, formed to do part of the work incumbent on the Church—namely, to fight intemperance in every possible way. The existence of intemperance in this country, with its attendant serious evils, was generally recognised. Intemperance judged alone was not perhaps the worst of sins, but when the consequences flowing from it were regarded no other evil had results so disastrous. Not only did it inflict untold injury and misery on innocent helpless women and children, but it reduced its victims to the lowest degradation. The Church was bound to do all in its power to counteract so terrible an evil. The Society promoting the Bill was not, however, fanatical. It did not urge that the use of intoxicating liquors was sinful, nor did it propose in any way to interfere with their legitimate consumption. On the contrary, a large number of its members were themselves avowedly moderate drinkers—at all events, not pledged as total abstainers. That, of course, was expressing no more than was involved in the demands of ordinary respectability; nevertheless, the Society welcomed their aid, they desiring earnestly to take their part in contending with the evil. Such a Society could not be said to be animated by a fanatical spirit in this matter, nor could it be said that they wished to interfere with the ordinary indulgence in such pleasures as could be derived from intoxicating liquors in moderation. The Society by its own example placed in the forefront an admission that such consumption was not wrong, and they put no stigma upon it whatever. But the Society impressed upon all whom it could reach that the consumption of alcoholic liquors in this country went much farther than was at all necessary, and that it went to a mischievous excess. It interfered with the country's prosperity; it damaged trade, to the extent in some cases of driving work out of England to foreign countries. No one would for a moment dispute that it was a great evil, and even those who were not at all prepared to give up the use of intoxicating liquors most readily condemned the excess or abuse of them. This Bill was intended to deal with the matter in that spirit. Last year he had introduced a Bill of similar but more extensive character, going further in its details and proposing, amongst other things, the creation of new Licensing Bodies distinct from those at present holding that authority. This Bill had been considerably lightened because it was found that the real objection to the former measure was to its machinery. For the machinery the promoters did not so greatly care as for the main purpose of the Bill itself, and with that main purpose he invited the House to deal. The proposal to take the licensing authority from the Magistrates, and place it in new hands was objected to on various grounds, and particularly because it would be a bad thing to have more elections, of which so many already existed. It was further objected that the working of such a measure should not be placed in the hands of those who might not act altogether impartially, but would be likely to be guided by special opinions of their own on the subject. The promoters would be quite satisfied to get the work done by machinery of a different kind, and if the Bill were passed it would no doubt be found that the Magistrates would be quite able to work it effectually, and bring about very nearly the same result as would be attained by the proposed new Licensing Bodies. In other respects also the Bill had been lightened of matters to which objection had been taken by the House, though they had appeared necessary to the full operation of the measure, and it was now re-introduced at the request of the Society in the hope that, the grounds of objection having been removed, their Lordships would give it a Second Reading, and let the subject be carefully considered in detail in Committee. The Bill had two main purposes. It proposed to empower the Magistrates to gradually diminish the number of licences until a certain minimum was reached, and then to leave any further diminution to the ordinary operation of the law for the suppression of particular houses which were not needed or were doing positive mischief. But in the meantime it was proposed that the number of licences should be diminished by one-fifth over the proposed minimum every year for five years, when the Act would come into full operation. The Church of England Temperance Society felt that in this respect it stood, perhaps, on a somewhat different footing from other Temperance Societies in recognising that it was not always right to suppress these licences without giving compensation to the holders. Of course, if they misconducted themselves it would be quite right to suppress their licences without assigning any further reason, and that could be done at present; but otherwise it seemed just that compensation should be given. The Bill, therefore, provided for compensation on a statement of profits for a certain period previous to the commencement of the operation of the Bill. That would constitute the claims to compensation, and they would be met by the holders of unsuppressed licences four-fifths in the first year, three-fifths in the next, and so on, until the end of the five years, when it was presumed that sufficient time would have been given to prepare for the suppression of the licences which must then come. If objected to, an appeal was provided for the examination of claims. The compensation would be levied on existing licence-holders on a definite rule, and if the money thus raised was not sufficient to meet all claims the County Council would be empowered to advance the amount required to pay them, to be repaid in a certain period by a still-continuing levy on the remaining licence-holders. In that way the compensation would come from the trade itself, which probably would not consider it unreasonable that that payment should be made, for it had been admitted in another place that the profits had enormously increased of late years, and it must be remembered that these licence-holders possessed a monopoly which excluded all others from interfering with their trade, and might, therefore, justly be called upon to contribute towards their monopoly being made even closer and more valuable than before. The suppression of a certain number of licensed houses would unquestionably give an additional value to those remaining. Those were the two main principles of the Bill: the gradual suppression of the excessive number of public-houses, and compensation by the trade to those whose licences were taken away. The rest of the Bill was really subsidiary to those purposes. It was proposed to entirely confine the power of granting licences to the Magistrates; for in some cases it seemed that the Excise granted licences where the Magistrates would have refused, and it was never well to have two concurrent authorities dealing with matters of this kind. It was also proposed to limit the number of temporary licences, which were rather too numerous and too vague in their definitions, but not in any way to interfere with the power of providing liquors for those who required them. Another important point was the registration of all clubs where liquors were sold to members. Such clubs were growing up in great numbers, and in many cases existed simply for providing means of intoxication. They could be subjected to no control by Magistrates as private houses, and must be so treated. There was no doubt, however, that they were doing serious mischief. Further, an important proposal was the appointment of special Inspectors to see that the law was enforced in all licensed houses. At present that was done by the police; but they had many other duties to perform, and were either unable or unwilling in all cases to enforce the law. In fact, the police regarded a house as orderly if it was sufficiently so for the locality, although a great deal of disorderly conduct might take place in it, not breaking out into violent riots, which would constitute disturbance of the peace and necessitate charges before the Magistrates. Inspectors who had nothing else to do would be able to prevent breaches of the law much more effectually than the police were doing at present. That was the substance of the Bill, and he believed its main principles would commend themselves to the House, and to all reasonable persons who considered the present state of the country in this regard. The ground which its supporters took was that the existing law led to the licensing of public-houses and similar places to an extent which surrounded the great mass of the people with temptation, particularly those who lived by manual labour. Beyond question far more public-houses existed than were necessary to supply the legitimate wants of those desiring to obtain intoxicating liquors, and the passing of this Bill would place no real difficulty in their way. But as things were, a man who had no desire to indulge excessively was beset by temptation at almost every step he took. Wherever he went the public-house, with all its attractions, was sure to flare its lights in his face, and the memory of past enjoyment, even though it might be an enjoyment he wished not to repeat, proved too much for him, and his strength gave way. It was easy to say, "The man has only to keep out of the public-house—why does he go in?" If this Bill concerned their Lordships that would be a reasonable retort. They were not subject to a temptation which was very severe upon a vast number of the people. It might be said these men were weak-minded and contemptible, and deserved nothing but scorn. That very fact must cause any Bishop—any member of Christ's Church—to feel that every effort should be made to give them strength. Over and over he had met with men struggling with all their might to escape from the snares of past indulgence, making good resolutions, praying to God for help, coming constantly to the clergy for advice, but falling back in spite of all their struggles to help themselves from the abundance of the temptations which surrounded them. They felt it—if their Lordships could not understand it, never having had that experience—they felt it every day of their lives. No doubt, in many places where drunkards abounded, if a poll were taken whether they would have the public-houses closed against them, the drunkards themselves would say "Yes." Not themselves having the strength to cut off this offending right hand or foot, as commanded by the highest authority, they would ask their Lordships to do this for them if they would. Could they be deaf to the petition of men really earnest in their desire to have such a curse removed from their daily lives? Let them consider the case, step out of their own surroundings for a while, and think not of what they would themselves do, or how they would be treated. They could not then refuse to help these unhappy men whose strength was altogether too weak to resist these enormous temptations, and would not enable them to stand as Christians should. There was, in his belief, no panacea for this great evil; no legislation would at once set it right; no exertions of their Lordships would at once convert the whole body of the people to genuine sobriety. But, on the other hand, he felt confident that by causing a substantial diminution in the number of temptations they would save these men from the danger of having their steps dogged, as it were, by perpetual invitations to remain in an evil course; and thus a very large number of them would be enabled, with the help of God, to save themselves from that which was now their curse. He appealed to the Legislature of their country to do something for these people who were suffering from this terrible evil, to give them real aid. Would not their Lordships help those who were doing their best to restore these people to temperance and respectability, by lessening this perpetual temptation which now made their lives degraded and their rescue all but impossible? For that reason, and in that hope, he ventured to bring the matter before the House, appealing in no fanatical spirit, though he had, for his own part, knowing that sympathy was one of the strongest powers that could act on human souls, altogether given up the consumption of intoxicants, so hurtful as they were to his brethren in this condition, but that he had never maintained that every man was called upon to follow his example. He would only say, and he said it from the bottom of his heart—"Here is a work which we are doing; in the name of God do, if you can, remove out of our path the hindrances which now make that work so terribly difficult!"

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Bishop of London.)

LORD NORTON thought that there was little need to insist upon the evils of intemperance, and was sure that every noble Lord present fully agreed with what the right rev. Prelate had said in condemning it. He was sorry to oppose anything which came from the right rev. Prelate, but the more anxious their Lordships were to diminish intemperance the more careful they should be as to the remedy they proposed, because if they proposed an absolutely ineffectual remedy they would only increase the evil and render it more hopeless to propose any effectual remedy for it. He knew nothing of the Church of England Temperance Society of which the right rev. Prelate had announced himself the spokesman, stating that their principle was not to abstain from but to use moderately intoxicating liquors. He maintained that intoxicating liquors were not consumed so much for pleasure among a great number of the working classes as for food. As the late Lord Bramwell used to say of the phrase "intoxicating liquors," they might just as well call water "drowning fluid," because people sometimes drowned themselves in it; and so liquors were only intoxicant to block-heads who did not know how to use them. To effect a remedy the first consideration was the nature of the disease. The present excess of licences came from the arbitrary manner in which they had been granted in the past. The excess was in this respect like that of the London cabs. Magistrates had given licences to almost every apparently decent man who asked for one. If the ordinary relations of supply and demand were secured no arbitrary limit would be needed, and the fault of this Bill was that it retained the arbitrary selection. The Bill last year proposed what would only increase the evil—namely, to make an Elective Board the Licensing Authority. Now one-fifth of the licences are proposed to be suppressed?

THE BISHOP OF LONDON explained that the proposal was to suppress one-fifth of the number in excess each year for five years.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: The Bill proposes to allow one public-house to 600 people. That is the limit in country towns.

*LORD NORTON said, that would make the proposal still more arbitrary. If there was one licensed house for every 600 people, the provision would be excessive in some localities and inadequate in others. He was perfectly convinced that the real remedy for the excess of licences was not to be found in arbitrarily restricting the supply. It was rather to be found making licences forfeited on abuse either by drunkenness, rioting, or drugging of drink, and still more by leading people to higher modes of amusement than the pot-house. He believed that the same causes which had put an end to excessive drinking in the upper and middle classes would ultimately also put an end to it in the lower classes. By regulating the supply of licensed houses to the legitimate demand through forfeiture on abuse, an end would be put to that rivalry in selling drink, which was caused by their number being in excess of their legitimate demand. He did not think the remedy proposed in any way met the disease, and if their Lordships were to pass it they would only be diminishing their ability at a future time to deal with this admittedly existing evil.

LORD RIBBLESDALE said, he quite agreed with the noble Lord who had just spoken in regard to the difficulty of dealing with the sale of intoxicating liquors. As he understood the Bill, it proceeded on the premise that the excess of public-houses brought with it a great increase in the consumption of intoxicating liquors. But Mr. Goschen in his Budget speech of 1892 gave some interesting figures as to the consumption of tea, tobacco, and spirits during the past 50 years, from which it appeared that the increase in the consumption of spirits had only risen from seven and a-half to eight pints per head of the population, while the consumption of non-alcoholic beverages such as ginger-beer, lemonade, and soda-water, had increased threefold. That seemed to show that the increase in the number of public-houses had not been accompanied by an increase in the consumption of intoxicating liquors.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Earl of Kimberley): My Lords, I have not had as much time as I should have liked for looking into this Bill, but it appears to me to contain a number of rather complicated provisions, many of which seem to be open to objection. In one important particular this Bill differs from the Bill brought in last year by the right rev. Prelate, inasmuch as it does not provide for the principle of popular control. Last year I said that that principle was approved by the Government, and that, on account of that principle being embodied in the Bill, I was not disposed to vote against the Second Reading, although I did not approve of other provisions in that Bill. The present proposals are very like those contained in the Bill of last year, only the principle of popular control is now left out. In the early part this Bill proposes that the decision of the local Licensing Authority is to be final, and that all the provisions in the present law requiring the confirmation of licences, or as to appeals, are done away with. I attach the greatest value to the requirement that every licence has now to be confirmed by a superior authority. I do not think any provision has proved more effectual than this in preventing the undue increase in the number of licensed houses. Noble Lords must be aware of the extraordinary facility with which people can obtain testimonials and signatures to Memorials that a new public-house is wanted in a particular district, I have, in the course of my experience, taken opportunities of questioning persons who had signed such Memorials, those persons being at the same time strong advocates of temperance. Their answer was:—"After all, one likes to be good-natured to one's neighbours; and the applicant is a very respectable man." Influences of that kind operate on those who have the granting of licences in a particular district, and lead to their being granted without consideration whether they are needed. I have had the honour to be a member of the confirming committee of the Quarter Sessions in my district for many years, and I have generally found that committee take a far more stringent view than the bodies by whom licences are originally granted. They take a general and larger view of the whole subject, as they are not interested in the particular localities, and I have again and again seen licences not confirmed by the general committee where it was perfectly clear that such licences were not wanted. The committees act on the general principle that licences should not be granted where they are not wanted. It fills me with amazement to find the existing provisions as to confirmation of licences and appeals wanting in the present measure. There is one argument which is always brought forward upon this subject; that is, the mischief alleged to be done by grocers' licences. Some people seem to think that these licences lead to a special form of drunkenness; but the Committee which formerly sat on the subject found, after careful investigation, that grocers' licences were not any special source of drunkenness. That being so, what is the argument in favour of abolishing them? It is extremely hard that any one who wants a bottle of beer or spirits should be compelled to go to a public-house in order to procure it, or to purchase so many dozen bottles from a wholesale merchant. People who required spirits for cooking purposes or under the orders of a medical man, should not be driven to the public-house to get them. Another consideration is that persons who frequent public-houses are more open to fall into temptation. The matter must be kept as a whole; and, on the whole, I am convinced that grocers' licences are not prejudicial to temperance, and Parliament could not make a more fatal mistake than to entirely abolish them as is proposed by this Bill. There are many other provisions in the Bill which are deserving of notice. My noble Friend who has just spoken has called attention to the plan of compensating the owners or occupiers of the public-houses which are to be gradually abolished. I am not sure that I appreciate the operation of the proposed provisions of the Bill as to compensation, but I conclude that my noble Friend opposite is right in saying that the licenced houses that remain are to be charged with an additional sum to provide compensation, based on the entirely groundless idea that they necessarily benefit from the closing of other houses. In a large parish a house that is closed may be at a distance of six or seven miles from one that remains open. Can anybody believe that the latter would benefit from the closing of the former? I have touched on one or two points which occur to me, and I will only now refer to one other. The Bill provides that after a certain period there shall be Sunday closing.

*THE BISHOP OF LONDON: Sunday closing subject to the power of the Licensing Authority to allow the houses to be open under special circumstances.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY : I have voted in this House in favour of Sunday closing in particular districts, but I am convinced that if you attempt by a special provision of this kind to close all licensed houses on Sunday you will give rise to very strong and dangerous opposition in certain localities. I do not think that would be a prudent step to take without making more provision for consulting the wishes of the inhabitants than is made by this Bill. In disapproving of the Bill I will only add this. Everyone admits the principle that it is desirable by some means to reduce the amount of drinking in this country, but at the same time I should not be disposed to be a party to a Bill of this kind. With all respect to the right rev. Prelate, I do not think that this Bill is a well-considered one, or that in many of its details it would work in the manner in which the right rev. Prelate would desire it to work, and I do not think that it would be right for us to agree to a measure which would not form a sound basis for the reform of our Licensing Laws. The subject is a very difficult one, and I am not prepared to dogmatise at all upon it. I would only say that we should not commit ourselves to a scheme of this kind, however desirous we may be of promoting temperance, because I think it is a scheme which, as regards some of its main provisions, would not work in the manner the right rev. Prelate desires, and certainly not in a manner satisfactory to the country at large.

THE EARL OF CRANBROOK : As I understand, the Licensing Authority as at present existing is not changed under this Bill?

THE BISHOP OF LONDON : No.

THE EARL OF CRANBROOK : Then the appeal to the confirming authority remains the same?

THE BISHOP OF LONDON : No.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY : Sub-section 3 of Clause 2 deals with it.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK said, he also was not in favour of temperance legislation generally; but this Bill seemed to be one of the most reasonable and least objectionable measures of the same character that had been brought before the House in recent years. Although what he had said upon this subject had brought down upon his head the severe rebuke of the Temperance Party, he thought that there was good ground for legislation with regard to it. Publicans enjoyed the privilege of keeping their houses open on Sundays, which was denied to other shops, and therefore their trade ought to be subjected to greater control than others. This Bill was by no means excessive in the restraints that it proposed to place upon the publican, and it was for that reason, and because its general principles were sound, that he felt bound to give it his support. It appeared to him that there were too many licensed houses in existence and that the licences were not very carefully granted. He happened to know that in his late diocese the proportion of public-houses was one to every 70 of the population, which was undoubtedly excessive. If a working man with his wages in his pocket had to pass 10 or 12 public-houses on his way home it would be a far more severe trial to his moral strength to avoid entering some of them than if he had to pass only one or two. The proposal to close the public-houses for a longer period on Sunday, so that they should only be open for one hour in the morning and one hour in the evening, would effect a reform which he had long advocated, and would go very far to remedy the evil of Sunday drinking among working men, while it would enable them to get whatever dinner or supper beer they required. With the other provision contained in the Bill that nothing should be consumed on the premises, the measure would go far to remedy the evil of Sunday drinking, which in some districts was very great among those who lived by manual labour. In his opinion, there was nothing in the provisions of the Bill which was unduly stringent. He most earnestly asked their Lordships to allow this Bill to go before a Committee. Their Lordships must never forget that, whatever their opinions with regard to this subject might be, there was a very strong opinion among the working classes in favour of temperance legislation. It would, in his opinion, be unwise to reject altogether a Bill of this kind, which it was possible to amend in such a way as to make it a workable and useful measure in Committee.

The Bishop of London

*THE EARL OF MEATH said, in asking their Lordships to read this Bill a second time, he wished it to be understood that he did so in no fanatical spirit. He was not a teetotaler, and he did not believe in forcing temperance upon anybody by means of legislation. At the same time, there was a large class of moderate men who saw plainly that much of the misery, suffering, and crime of this country was due to the temptations which were placed in the way of working men to a far greater degree than was necessary. On the principle that something should be done to stem the tide of drink it would, in his opinion, be advisable to read this Bill a second time in order that it might be amended in Committee in any way that was thought desirable. He was pleased on this occasion to find that this important subject was not to be dealt with simply in two speeches, but was being thoroughly discussed in a fuller House than previously, and with a fair show of right rev. Prelates upon their Bench, because those of their Lordships who were laymen generally looked to that Bench for guidance and advice on all questions concerning the spiritual and moral welfare of the people. The temperance movement affected not only the people of this country, but also that large portion of the world where our colonies were situated. It had been urged as a reproach against our commercial enterprise in uncivilised regions that it was accompanied by broken bottles, broken hearts, and broken heads; and he was in favour of any action that would remove that stain from the British name. If this Bill was not the right one he would urge the Government of the day, whatever its politics might be, whether Liberal or Conservative, never to cease their efforts until some legislation of this character was carried out. He was glad to be able to say that temperance had made great strides of late years in this country. There was a large number of total abstainers in the Army and the Navy, and moderate as against excessive drinking prevailed generally among all classes. He was sorry to say, however, that the drink bill of the country was still very large, having risen to £140,866,000 in 1892 from £105,000,000 in 1865; and he agreed with the observation of the late Lord Shaftesbury, that it would be impossible to do anything to relieve the poverty and misery of the country until they had got rid of the curse of excessive drinking. He did not believe that it was possible to make men moral by legislation, but he believed that it was possible to assist them in becoming more moral by removing the temptations to immorality.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY : On the present occasion I must appear in the unaccustomed character of a follower of Her Majesty's Government. I do not know that I should have challenged a Division if nothing had been said against the Bill, but I cannot express my approval of this measure in all its details, founded, as it seems to me it is, upon a principle that is radically false. The noble Lord who has just sat down, and who spoke with such great sincerity, urged us never to be satisfied until we had introduced a Bill that would effect the reformation of the British people in the matter of temperance. I venture to think that that is a good deal beyond the power of any Government, Liberal or Conservative, or of any Legislature to effect. There is one power, and one power alone, that can reform the British people in this respect, and that is the power which has already reformed the upper and middle classes—namely, the power of public opinion. If you will allow that public opinion to grow it will do the work which you are powerless to effect, but you must allow it to grow, and you must not throw artificial obstacles in its way. What you are now proposing to do is by the force of an Act of Parliament and by the interference of the Police and Licensing Authorities to compel the working man to consume less of intoxicating liquor than he himself is desirous of doing. When he finds that all these obstacles are placed in his way he will know that they are placed there by law. The right rev. Prelate proposes that there shall be only one public-house to every 600 people. I have been thinking of a parish of which I know something where the result of this proposal would be that most of the inhabitants would have to go three-quarters of a mile for their beer. Do you think that if these people knew that this would be the result of this legislation they would accept it with enthusiasm or even with patience? By making such proposals you are placing on the side of those whose drinking tendencies you wish to overcome a reason for that feeling against compulsion and of resistance to unjust legislation which has always been a very powerful motive with all classes of men, and which I think is more powerful with the race which inhabits this country than with any others. If you wish public opinion to operate you must leave it unhampered by the sinister and dangerous alliance of motives which is created by legislation of this kind. I believe that in taking that course you would be basing your legislation upon a false principle. But I wish to ask this. On what ground do you maintain that the abundance of public-houses creates drunkenness? It is assumed, I know, but I have never seen a vestige proof of it, and I know not by what process of reasoning the conclusion is arrived at. In regard to other things, the facility for obtaining what you want does not so largely increase the temptation. What would stand with women in the same position as love of drink with men is, I suppose, the love of finery, and I have never heard that the multiplication of the number of haberdashers' shops increases the tendency of women to spend their money in finery. When the passion which has been so eloquently portrayed by the right rev. Prelate gets hold of a man it is undoubtedly one of the most dangerous masters he can select for himself. It is a demon far too powerful to care for the difficulty created by your remedy of making him go a quarter or half a mile to find a public-house. The man who gives way to drink will satisfy his desire whatever the distance may be he has to go to obtain it. All you will effect by legislation of this kind is to hinder the existence of that which you seem persistently to forget—the legitimate demand for the consumption of these liquors. You must remember that to a large number of people these things are necessary, and that to a still larger number they are a perfectly salutary and legitimate indulgence. You pay no heed to these people; you disregard their rights entirely by this legislation, and you do not mind how many they may be. In fact, you do not care how you hinder them in their natural liberty. There is a provision in this Bill which enacts that, unless there be a special order, there shall be no liquor sold on Sundays in any part of the country. The amount of inconvenience and the dissatisfaction which that would cause in large parts of the country would be very great indeed; in fact, I do not think the promoters of the Bill realise the nature of the opposition they would meet. I entreat noble Lords opposite to give up appealing to this vain and empty alliance. Do carry into execution that exhortation which you are perpetually addressing to us—"Put your trust in the people." Do have confidence that the influences which up to this time have, with steady and unflagging pace, effected a reform in this one of the most dangerous liabilities to evil to which human nature is heir, will go on doing their blessed work. I would appeal to the right rev. Prelates to increase the force of those influences which are at your command and which no one can exercise in greater force than you can. But do not appeal to the law for that which the law can never do lest you find that instead of a friend you have created an adversary.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord HERSCHELL): My Lords, although I entirely agree with the view expressed by my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs and with some of the remarks made by the noble Marquess, there are certain points of difference. I quite agree with the noble Marquess that the great hope of reform in the drinking habits of the people must rest upon change of opinion in those classes among whom excessive drinking chiefly prevails, just as change of opinion has produced great effect in other classes of society. But I do not think it is inconsistent with a firm conviction to that effect that one should desire to see some change in the Licensing Laws of this country. I know that it is a matter difficult of proof that the existence of an excessive number of public-houses tends to excessive drinking. One forms one's own opinion upon it, and I confess that the opinion I have formed is that it does so. The noble Marquess compared the passion for drink to the passion of women for finery. The comparison certainly is a perfectly safe one. I am not aware of the habits of women as regards the purchase of goods of the same description at different shops—whether a woman who loves finery goes from one haberdasher's shop to another making purchases, or whether she satisfies herself by making the whole of her purchases at one shop; but this I am certain of: that the habit of visiting one public-house after another does exist to a very great extent indeed, and that the existence of so many public-houses exposes men to very great temptation. This has been deeply impressed on my mind from the evidence I have heard over and over again in Courts of Justice. During my early years of practice at the Bar I was a constant attendant in the Criminal Courts, listening to the evidence, and sometimes taking part myself in criminal cases. Not a day passed in which it was not necessary to inquire of a witness as to his sobriety and ability to identify the prisoner, and how he had spent his evening, and it frequently turned out that he had spent it, not in one, but in a number of public-houses, and I confess I then formed a very strong opinion that if some of these public-houses had not been open to the man on his way home, he very likely would, on leaving the first public-house, have gone straight home a much soberer man. I have a strong conviction that in many parts of the country the number of licensed houses is excessive, and that if there were fewer public-houses there would be less drunkenness. Therefore, I do not think it would be any interference with personal liberty or individual rights if a considerable step were taken in the direction proposed by the right rev. Prelate; but to my mind it is absolutely essential, if anything of the kind is to be done, that it should be done in accordance with the wishes and desires of the people in the districts affected—that there should be popular control, and that it should not be done by the Magistrates, who are themselves often personally concerned, and who are dealing with the matter perhaps strongly contrary to the wishes of the people of the district over which they are the Licensing Authority. I have the strong opinion that you will never have a successful change of system in the direction desired, unless it comes from and through the people of the district who are concerned. I, therefore, feel myself constrained, with every sympathy with the right rev. Prelate, to abstain from supporting the Second Reading of this Bill.

LOCOMOTIVE THRESHING ENGINES BILL.—(No. 124.)

COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order).

VISCOUNT CROSS explained that some slight amendment would have to be made in the Standing Committee.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, this Bill rather alarmed some of them who had had experience of the great danger there might be on roads close to which threshing machines were allowed to work. He should like to hear some explanation of the Bill.

VISCOUNT CROSS said, he thought he explained what the object of the Bill was on the occasion of the Second Reading. A threshing machine was never to be used unless there was a person stationed on the road to give warning, and unless the threshing engine was, where necessary, immediately stopped. He believed the measure had the approval of the Local Government Board. He was quite aware that the Bill as it was brought up from the other House was rather confused in the last clause; he had been in communication with the Lord Chancellor on the subject, and in the Standing Committee he would take care that was altered.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I think the noble Lord wishes to force us to have the haystack precisely where nobody can get at it. That is the result of the present system of threshing.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I am the possessor of a good many stacks, and with us they are placed in the fields.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Away from the road?

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: Yes, always.

Bill reported without Amendment; and re-committed to the Standing Committee.

NOTICE OF ACCIDENTS BILL.—(No. 145.)

Amendments reported (according to Order).

LORD ASHBOURNE said, he had a small Amendment to the first sub-section of Clause 3. The certifying surgeons, who there performed a very important and useful office, desired to have their status and usefulness recognised more in the Bill. Their wishes in this direction were discussed in the Standing Committee, but he believed the noble Lord in charge of the Bill did not see his way to put in any Amendment. He did not propose to go over the ground again for accepting the Amendment which he now moved, but he would suggest that whilst it possibly did not add to the efficacy of the Bill to recognise in a direct and express way the status and position of these surgeons, and also of the medical profession generally, such a recognition could not in any way detract from the usefulness of the Bill. The way the clause read at present was as follows :—

“The Board may appoint competent persons to hold an investigation, and may appoint a person possessing legal or special knowledge to act as assessor upon such investigation.”

It was possible that that would enable medical or other experts to act as well as lawyers, but as lawyers were mentioned he did not think it could do harm to mention the medical profession as well, and he accordingly moved the addition of words so as to include the members of such profession. He hoped the Amendment would be accepted.

LORD PLAYFAIR: There is no objection on the part of the Government to the Amendment which the noble Lord has proposed.

Amendment agreed to.

OUTDOOR RELIEF (FRIENDLY SOCIETIES) BILL.—(No. 146.)

Amendment reported (according to Order).

*LORD NORTON said, this Bill was a violation of the fundamental principle of the new Poor Law, and that was defended on the ground that such a violation was recognised as a matter of discretionary action in special cases on the part of the Board of Guardians. But this Bill legalised that discretionary action. It was quite clear to his mind that if a Bill recognised generally that which was done by special discretion, it would be taken by the country at large as the law, and the relief of persons having property in Friendly Societies to any amount would be not an exceptional act, but the treatment of all such cases throughout the Kingdom. The discretion worked very satisfactorily, but as a legal practice it was a distinct invasion on the part of Parliament of the fundamental principle of the new Poor Law—namely, the test of destitution to relief. They knew perfectly well by the experience of the old Poor Law what would be the result of the abolition of such a test. The old Poor Law was on the brink of ruining property, and there were parishes in which the poor rates amounted to 20s. in the £1. He regarded the proposal in this Bill as the first step to reviving the mischief that then existed. He was perfectly sure that if their Lordships would only consider the danger of this step, and the perfectly satisfactory treatment of cases by the discretion of the Boards of Guardians as at present, they would shrink from passing this Bill.

Bill to be read 3^a To-morrow.

BISHOPRIC OF BRISTOL ACT (1884) AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 147.)

Amendments reported (according to Order).

*EARL STANHOPE moved the re-insertion of the Preamble of this Bill, which he thought must have been accidentally omitted in passing through the Standing Committee. The omission of the Preamble would send the Bill down to another place, and considering the congested state of business in the other House he hoped their Lordships would assent to the re-insertion of the Preamble.

VISCOUNT CROSS should be very glad to see the Preamble re-inserted. It was not struck out by mistake, but the Lord Chancellor objected to all Preambles. He thought that perhaps the Preamble was necessary in this case to explain the object of the Bill, and he hoped there would be no objection to its re-insertion.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord HERSCHELL) said, he was not going to object to the re-insertion of the Preamble, because it was desired that the Bill should not go down to another place. He thought that the occasions on which a Preamble was necessary were very rare indeed. He did not deny that occasionally it might be desirable, but there seemed to be a fashion for Preambles among those who drafted Bills. The Preamble simply recited that it was desirable to do what Parliament was going to do if it passed the Bill. What was the sense of such a proceeding he never understood; and if any exhortation of his could reach the draftsmen of Bills, he would urge them to consider, before they put in a Preamble, whether it was of any possible use. If it was, let them put it in; if it was not, then let them abstain, and the Statute Book would come into smaller compass, there would not be such a great quantity of useless Preambles for the Statute Law Revision Committee to repeal, and the Statutes would not then be made more expensive than they otherwise would be.

The re-insertion of the Preamble was then agreed to, the word "Therefore" being added, on the Motion of Viscount Cross, to the first clause as a necessary addition consequent on the re-insertion of the Preamble.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

LONDON STREETS AND BUILDINGS BILL (by Order).

*MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty) moved—

His object, he said, was to protect householders against unscrupulous builders. As matters stood at present, it was quite competent for any unscrupulous person to take a quantity of swampy land and build a number of houses upon it with utter disregard to the safety or comfort of the occupiers. The district surveyors could not be entirely trusted to, as he was afraid they were inclined to wink at the bad work of builders.

MR. A. C. MORTON (Peterborough) seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. STUART-WORTLEY (Sheffield, Hallam) said, he hoped the House would not accept this mandatory Resolution. It would mean the laying upon the Committee of very considerable labour. The Committee had already sat for many days considering the Bill, which consolidated and amended a large number of Statutes, and they hoped by heroic exertions to finish it to-morrow. But the hon. Member's proposal would overload the measure, and would lay upon a Committee which had already done a great deal of useful work a labour which it could not possibly be expected to discharge.

MR. J. STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton) said, he did not at that moment intend to go into the merits of the point raised, but he would point out that the present Bill was already extremely heavy, and to further weight it as proposed by the introduction of this large question would probably mean the loss of it. The Committee had expended a great amount of labour on the Bill, and the investigation was just drawing to a conclusion. He, therefore, on behalf of the London County Council, opposed the Instruction.

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.) said, he also would appeal to his hon. Friend to withdraw his Motion. He certainly could not support the proposal to re-commit the Bill. While convinced of the necessity for better drainage in connection with London buildings, he thought the question should be raised in connection with a Public Health Bill. If the hon. Member for Ross-shire, who was a Member of the London County Council, had been on the alert when the Bill was before that body, he might have been able to attain the object he had in view. He hoped the course of the present Bill would not be interfered with by the adoption of the Instruction.

MR. A. C. MORTON (Peterborough) thought that if the Bill was at all overloaded it was due to the introduction of fresh matters in Committee. His experience of 31 years in London administration told him that building Bills were the proper place in which to deal with these matters. He was aware that in London in the past there had been a great neglect of these very important questions, with the result that many unhealthy houses had been erected, and he was sorry, therefore, the London County Council opposed this Instruction.

QUESTIONS.

DESTITUTE CRIMEAN VETERANS.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been called to the following cases of soldiers who served in the Crimea: A. Pinkerton, Welsh Fusiliers and 56th Regiment, at Inkermann and Sebastopol, has a medal, 11 years' service, over 61 years of age, broken down and can do no work, has no pension but receives a parish allowance; Benjamin Soley, 17th Lancers, in the Balaklava charge and wounded in three places, has Crimean medal but no pension, breaks stones and does other odd work on the roads, but can do little, as he has a Russian bullet in his leg; and whether he will consider the necessity of enlarging the sum allowed for these cases, so as to give immediate relief to all who need it?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Stirling, &c.): I have caused inquiry to be made into these cases. As regards their Army service, the facts are fairly stated in the question, except that we have no record of the bullet in Soley's leg. Both men have been registered for several months as eligible, if destitute, for special pensions; but as there is a large number of applicants so registered with claims equally good and urgent, it is impossible to say when their turn for a pension may come. The selection rests with the Chelsea Commissioners. Soley is eligible for a Balaklava pension when a vacancy occurs, and applied last month, but neglected to reply to questions put to him as to his private earnings. A considerable additional sum would be required if relief were given immediately to all applicants who had had Crimean or Indian Mutiny service and had served in all for the requisite period of 10 years.

MR. BARTLEY : Cannot the Secretary of State take in hand the question of making some permanent arrangement for these old soldiers, so that they shall be enabled to get a living without the scandal of compelling them to go into the workhouse ?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : It must be remembered that the men referred to have no claim to a pension as of right, inasmuch as they did not complete the necessary period of service before they retired. There is, however, a compassionate pension given so as to avoid the scandal mentioned by the hon. Member. I can understand a general system of giving a pension to all old soldiers who have qualified up to a certain standard of service after they had reached a certain age, but I do not think there is the same necessity for a large and general system of relief such as the hon. Gentleman suggests.

MR. BARTLEY : Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that Pinkerton is completely unfitted for work, and that his only means of living is outdoor relief and the kindness of friends ?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : These cases do not come before me, the selection of the recipients resting with the Chelsea Commissioners. There are a great many things to be considered, as, for example, whether a man's condition is not, in some case, attributable to his own conduct.

SIR D. MACFARLANE (Argyll) : Is the capital of the Patriotic Fund still intact, and was it not for the benefit of Crimean soldiers that that fund was started ?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : That is a fund over which I have no control.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) : Does this man satisfy the requirements as to the grant of these pensions ? I have known men rejected because, for instance, they have not served 10 years.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : I am informed by the Chelsea Commissioners that this man, being destitute, has been registered for several months as eligible for a pension.

EXAMINATIONS FOR TELEGRAPH CLERKS.

MR. BUTCHER (York) : I beg to ask the Postmaster General will he explain why, for the first time since the transfer of the telegraphs to the State, a technical scientific examination has recently been imposed upon telegraph clerks recommended for promotion to the senior class ; whether any facilities are given to enable the clerks to acquire the knowledge necessary for this examination ; whether, having regard to the nature of their duties and the hours of their employment, telegraph clerks are practically precluded from attending scientific lectures ; and whether it is the intention of the Postmaster General to refuse promotion to clerks with 15 to 22 years' service in case they fail to pass this newly-instituted examination ?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. A. MORLEY, Nottingham, E.) : The examination in question is imposed in the interest of the efficiency of the Service. I am glad to say that a large number of telegraphists already possess the necessary knowledge, and have proved that they are not without facilities for acquiring it. The answer to the third paragraph is in the negative. I am glad to be able to say that many telegraphists attend classes established by themselves or by the Science and Art Department in various parts of the country. I do not think it likely that any intelligent and industrious officer is likely to be deprived of promotion owing to the introduction of the examination.

THE CAMPDEN TRUST.

MAJOR DARWIN (Staffordshire, Lichfield) : I beg to ask the Parliamentary Charity Commissioner how many of the scholars, appointed under the Campden Trust Scheme, are aliens, and how many are British subjects ?

THE PARLIAMENTARY CHARITY COMMISSIONER (Mr. F. S. STEVENSON, Suffolk, Eye) : The Charity Commissioners, in answer to an inquiry on the subject, are informed by the clerk to the trustees of the Campden Charities (1) that during the last 10 years 90 scholars from public elementary schools have been awarded exhibitions maintained out of the income of the charities ; and (2) that, according to English law, all such scholars have been British subjects.

MAJOR DARWIN: Are there included as British subjects children of alien parents who were born in England?

MR. F. S. STEVENSON: I can only reply that all those who have been awarded exhibitions out of the trust are, according to English law, British subjects.

GREAT NORTH OF SCOTLAND RAILWAY GOODS RATES.

MR. SEYMOUR KEAY (Elgin and Nairn): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the Board has now received information of the very large increase in the rates charged by the Great North of Scotland Railway Company on merchandise passing over their lines as compared with those charged in 1892, whereby 13s. 4d. per single ton is now levied on barley, pease, &c., from Aberdeen to Elgin, as against 10s. per single ton in 1892; and whereby 4s. 2d. per single ton is now charged for barley, pease, flour, &c., from Lossiemouth to Elgin, as against 1s. 4d. per single ton in 1892, being an increase of more than 200 per cent.; whether he is aware that the Lossiemouth Harbour has been successfully deepened at a cost of upwards of £20,000, and that this action of the Railway Company is now neutralising the advantages of this outlay; and what steps can be taken by the Government to prevent the trade of these districts from being seriously crippled by such charges?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. BRYCE, Aberdeen, S.): The Board of Trade have received from the Great North of Scotland Railway Company with reference to this question a communication which is too long to read to the House, but I shall be happy to show it to the hon. Member. The Company traverse the accuracy of the figures given, and deny that they are doing anything to neutralise the advantages which should follow from the deepening of Lossiemouth Harbour. The best step that the Board of Trade can take has been already taken in laying before the House the Railway and Canal Traffic Bill, which is framed to deal with rates increased since 1892, and I earnestly trust that it may be passed into law this Session.

Mr. F. S. Stevenson

THE PROTECTION OF THE SHETLAND FISHERIES.

SIR L. LYELL (Orkney, &c.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether it is true, as reported, that the Admiral Superintendent of Naval Reserves has sent notice that the twin screw first-class gunboats employed as coastguard cruisers will take part in the manoeuvres this year; whether this notice, sent out on June 22, covers the case of the Niger gunboat; and whether the Niger, temporarily withdrawn for the usual repairs, will be returned at once to Shetland for the protection of the fisheries as soon as the repairs are completed?

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Sir U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH, Lancashire, Clitheroe): The answer to the first two paragraphs is in the affirmative. The Niger is now in dock at Leith for a few days; she will return to Shetland for the protection of the fisheries as soon as the repairs are completed.

THE "COSTA RICA PACKET."

MR. T. CURRAN (Kilkenny): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he is aware that a largely-attended meeting of the citizens of Sydney was held on Friday under the presidency of the Mayor, at which resolutions were adopted declaring that the compensation demanded from the Netherlands Government, in the case of the Costa Rica Packet, was wholly inadequate; that the losses sustained by the owners and crew constituted an inseparable part of the international injury perpetrated, and should therefore be included in the claim for compensation; and that the decision of the Imperial Government was calculated to weaken the belief that wherever a British citizen might travel the protection afforded by the British flag was a perfect safeguard; and whether Her Majesty's Government will reconsider their decision not to put forward any claims of the owners and crew in view of this emphatic expression of opinion on the part of the colonists chiefly concerned?

MR. HOGAN (Tipperary, Mid): At the same time, I will ask the hon. Baronet whether he is now in a position to state the purport of the latest Despatch from the Netherlands Government with respect to the claim for compensation submitted on behalf of the captain of the Costa Rica Packet?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir E. GREY, Northumberland, Berwick): I have not seen the account of this meeting, but Her Majesty's Government are aware that strong opinions similar to those quoted in the question have been expressed in the colony. The last reply of the Netherlands Government is still under consideration, and till we have decided what answer is to be returned to it I cannot add anything to previous statements.

BOARD OF IRISH LIGHTS.

MR. O'KEEFFE (Limerick): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he is in a position to reply to the Memorial of the Limerick Harbour Commissioners, having regard to their expenditure and interest in the lighting of the River Shannon, that their request for direct representation on the proposed Board of Irish Lights will be acceded?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. J. MORLEY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne): The Memorial in question has been received and forwarded to the Board of Trade, which is the Department more immediately concerned with the Irish Lights Board. As I have already stated to the House, I am quite aware of the desirability of having a representative element introduced on that Board, and the matter is now under consideration.

GREYSTOKE SCHOOL, CUMBERLAND.

MR. J. W. LOWTHER (Cumberland, Penrith): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether his attention has been called to the great expense to which the managers of the Greystoke School, Cumberland, will be placed if the Education Department insist upon their particular plan for the structural alteration of the schools being carried out; whether the proposed structural alterations suggested by the managers will not be as effectual whilst they are less costly than those of the Department; and whether, under these circumstances, he will accept the suggestions of the managers, or come to some reasonable arrangement with them?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Mr. ACLAND, York, W.R., Rotherham): The managers of this school, which has hitherto been conducted in two separate departments for boys and girls, recently proposed to reorganise it as a mixed school under a single certificated teacher, making certain structural alterations for that purpose. It was pointed out to them that larger alterations than they proposed would be necessary if this plan were carried out, and that the building, which was originally erected for use as two separate schools, could not be converted into a single school without serious expense. It was suggested to them that much of this expense might be saved if a certificated teacher were appointed as assistant mistress. Any further proposals which the managers make will be carefully considered with the view of coming to some reasonable arrangement.

CHINA AND JAPAN.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT (Sheffield, Ecclesall): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government will tender their good offices of mediation to China and Japan, in order to prevent a war between those countries which would be prejudicial to British interests? I should like further to ask if it is a fact that China has applied to the Government of Russia to mediate?

SIR E. GREY: I cannot answer the further question without notice. Her Majesty's Government have already addressed communications to the Governments of China and Japan in the interests of peace, and every effort which can properly be made by us will be used to bring about a friendly arrangement of the differences which have arisen between them.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: Have any British men-of-war been sent to Korea?

SIR E. GREY: I cannot say what the latest movements are there, but, as I stated a month ago, the commander-in-chief of the China Squadron was at the northern part of the station with a sufficient force at his command.

CAVALRY HORSES.

MR. BROOKFIELD (Sussex, Rye): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the number of horses reckoned as part of the effective strength of a cavalry regiment on a peace footing includes any horses of such immature age as to preclude their being made available for fighting purposes; whether he can state what is the proportion of horses of five years old and under in the cavalry regiments included in the First Army Corps; and whether any regulation exists as to the age under which young horses may or may not be sent on active service?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The horse establishment of a cavalry regiment includes its remounts, and, therefore, a small though varying number of four-year-old horses, but none of younger age. There are no regulations as to which young horses should take the field for active service; but the Inspector General of Remounts would decide at the moment, taking into account the nature of the country in which the regiment was to operate. At present there are 68 four-year-old horses in the six regiments of the higher strength, being about $2\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. of their establishment. About 9 per cent. are five-year-olds.

FORRES POLICE ACCOUNT AUDITORSHIP.

MR. BEITH (Inverness, &c.): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland if he has seen The Forres, Elgin, and Nairn Gazette, of 13th June, containing report of a meeting of the Town Council of the Royal burgh of Forres; if he has received the Petition from the Provost and Magistrates referred to in that report, in which it is stated that the Sheriff of Inverness, Elgin, and Nairn, upon his son, Mr. James Ivory, chartered accountant, Edinburgh, declining to accept the office of auditor of the police accounts because of the protest of the Police Commissioners, issued an interlocutor in which he refused to appoint as auditor any duly qualified professional gentleman residing in the locality, and nominated, in room of his son, Mr. T. P. Laird, chartered accountant, Edinburgh; that the Sheriff justified this proceeding by reflecting unfavourably upon the administration of the Police Commissioners of Forres and upon their accounting and audits; is he aware that Sheriff Ivory had made no inquiry or investigation, and had no knowledge of the burgh accounts, when he issued his interlocutor; and if, in view of Sheriff Ivory having officially aspersed the good name of the Royal burgh of Forres, he will cause an investigation to be made into the past accounts of the burgh, and will grant the prayer of the said Petition by calling upon Sheriff Ivory to state the grounds of his reflections upon the good name of the burgh, and will also take steps to determine responsibility otherwise than at present, as to the auditing of municipal accounts in Scotland?

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Sir G. TREVELYAN, Glasgow, Bridgeton): I have seen the papers referred to by the hon. Member, which he fairly and accurately describes, but am not aware whether Sheriff Ivory had made inquiry or investigation, or whether he had any knowledge of the burgh accounts when he issued his interlocutor. The Secretary for Scotland has no power to interfere in the matter, as it now stands, but in view of what has taken place I will consider whether the nomination of auditor in such cases should be vested in some authority other than the Sheriff.

THE ACCOUNTANT GENERAL'S DEPARTMENT.

MR. THORNTON (Clapham): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty when he expects to receive the Report of the Committee on the Accountant General's Department; and whether the result will be promptly communicated to those concerned?

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: The Committee appointed to consider the normal clerical establishment of the Accountant General's Department are, I understand, likely to report shortly. Their recommendations will then be considered by the Board of Admiralty and the Treasury. Any decisions affecting the future of the staff will be made known to them as early as practicable.

THE CLYDE FISHERIES.

MR. BIRKMYRE (Ayr, &c.): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland if he is in a position to indicate the probable date at which the new steam cruiser for the protection of the fishery interests in the Clyde waters will be put upon the station?

SIR G. TREVELYAN : I am glad to be able to inform the hon. Member that the Fishery Board assure me that the new steam cruiser may be expected on the Clyde by the end of this week.

THE ALBION COLLIERY.

MR. PRITCHARD - MORGAN (Merthyr Tydfil) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the manuscript of the Report of Mr. Henry Hall, one of Her Majesty's Inspectors of Mines, dated 20th August, 1893, on Explosions from Coal Dust in Mines, or a copy thereof, was sent to or received by the Home Office, or came to the knowledge of the Home Office before being sent to the printers; whether he is aware that the print of the Report was circulated to Members, and was available to the public until the 12th of February last; why such printed Report was not received by or came to the knowledge of the Home Office until the 26th of May last; whether, when the Report came to the knowledge of the Home Office, any special or indeed any instructions were given to the Inspector of Mines for Glamorganshire, calling the attention of the Inspector to the fact that Mr. Hall reported that, of all the dusts tested, that from the Albion Colliery, Glamorgan (the colliery in which so many men lost their lives a fortnight since), excelled all others in violence and sensitiveness to explosion, and this seam has the worst history of any in the Kingdom, upwards of 1,600 persons having been killed in it by explosions since 1845, and whether, following such Report, any steps were taken by the Home Office or any of the Inspectors with a view of minimising the danger in this particular colliery; and whether such colliery will be allowed to resume work without considering Mr. Hall's Report?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. ASQUITH, Fife, E.) : There is, I think, some confusion between two documents, Mr. Hall's annual Report, and Mr. Hall's Report of his third set of experiments, both of which contain the same statement as to the dust from the Albion Colliery. My hon. Friend's first question, put on June 28, referred to Mr. Hall's annual Report for last year. This Report was, as stated by me in my answer, received from the printers, and published on May 26, 1894. His present question refers to Mr. Hall's Report of his third set of experiments, made for the Royal Commission on Coal Dust. This Report was made in August, 1893, and was presented to Parliament on February 12, 1894. A copy of this Report was sent to every one of the Inspectors, with a view to discussion by them at their annual meeting, which was held this spring. A copy was also sent to every person who had supplied Mr. Hall with a sample of coal dust for experiment, amongst others to the owners of the Albion Colliery. The attention of the owners of the Albion Colliery was thus specially called to the character of the dust in their colliery. The dangerous nature of this seam has long been known to the Inspectors, and they have taken special precautions in view of it. The Albion Colliery was visited four times during the past year by Mr. Sims, who, in answer to special inquiries, was assured by the managers that blasting has only been permitted in the rock and that the dust was well watered in cases where the Mines Act requires it at the time of shots being fired; also, that, apart from shot firing, the dustiest portions of the roadways were watered. After receiving a copy of Mr. Hall's Report on his experiments the owners at once proceeded to adopt a system of pipes and sprays (as is done in some other collieries in the district); at the time of the explosion about a mile of pipes had been laid, but sprays had not been fixed to them, and thus the watering of the roadways by this means was not yet in operation. Whether or not the explosion was due to coal dust is a matter now under investigation. Mr. Hall's Report represents his individual opinion founded on the careful experiments made by him; but he informs me, and I agree with him, that it would have been premature for the Home Office to have recommended any particular mode of dealing with the danger pending the Report of the Coal Dust Commission. The matter is one upon which there is considerable difference of opinion among experts. I expect that Report will be sent in very shortly. It will then be seen what precautions they recommend, and it will be for Parliament to give effect to them by legislation.

MR. PRITCHARD - MORGAN : May I ask why the sprays were not laid, seeing that the Report was made in August last?

MR. ASQUITH : That is a matter to be explained by the owners. It is now under judicial investigation. The owners inform me that immediately they received the Report they at once began to lay the pipes, and that they were about to fix the sprays when the accident occurred.

MR. PRITCHARD - MORGAN : What steps does the right hon. Gentleman propose to take in the matter? What explosives were used in the mine?

MR. ASQUITH : It remains to be seen whether there has been any violation of the law by the owners. The question as to what explosives were used in the mine is being investigated. It is, of course, essential that in such a mine only explosives of a high order should be used. As to the sensitiveness of coal dust, I should be glad to know what opinion has been formed by the Coal Dust Commission, which has been sitting for three years and has taken an enormous mass of evidence on this subject.

MR. PRITCHARD-MORGAN : Were no special instructions sent by the Home Office to the Inspector for South Wales on receipt of the Report?

MR. ASQUITH : No, Sir. It is not to be understood that special instructions were sent by the Home Office to the Inspector on the receipt of Mr. Hall's Report; but the Report was communicated at once to the owners, and they proceeded to do what I have described.

MR. D. THOMAS (Merthyr Tydfil) : When may we expect to have the Report of the Coal Dust Commission?

MR. ASQUITH : I am informed by the Chairman of the Coal Dust Commission that its Report has been adopted and will be presented in the course of the present week.

WORKING HOURS IN NAVAL ESTABLISHMENTS.

MR. D. THOMAS : I beg to ask the Civil Lord of the Admiralty the maximum number of hours (including meal-times) worked in any one day under the arrangement of hours introduced in the Naval establishments on Monday last; and what percentage of the hours previously worked the present weekly reduction constitutes?

THE CIVIL LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. E. ROBERTSON, Dundee) : The maximum number of working hours at all the yards is nine on five days a week and five hours on Saturday throughout the year, while the minimum number of hours worked is seven and a quarter for five days of the week. There is one meal hour (one and a-half hours) each day excepting Saturdays, when work ceases about noon. The present weekly reduction of working hours is 4.63 per cent. less than those previously worked.

SIR G. BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale) : Do these figures cover overtime?

MR. E. ROBERTSON : No, Sir.

MR. D. THOMAS : Do they include the meal-time?

MR. E. ROBERTSON : No, Sir.

MR. D. THOMAS : So that from the time a man commences till he finishes it is 10½ hours?

MR. E. ROBERTSON : The hon. Member can make his own calculation.

THE WELSH DISESTABLISHMENT BILL

MR. D. THOMAS : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he proposes to take the Second Reading of the Established Church (Wales) Bill?

MR. ASQUITH : I must ask my hon. Friend to defer this question until the Leader of the House returns to his place.

THE REPORT OF SEA FISHERIES.

SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.) : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if and when it is intended to propose legislation in pursuance of the Report of the Committee on Sea Fisheries; and whether any communications have been opened with Foreign Governments with a view to International Conventions?

MR. BRYCE : I cannot hold out any hopes of being able to introduce this Session a Bill dealing with matters of such intricacy as those referred to in the Report of the Select Committee. With regard to the second part of the question, I am still engaged in obtaining information with reference to the action of Foreign Powers on questions connected with the subject.

GRANTS TO UNIVERSITY COLLEGES.

SIR A. ROLLIT: I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether the Departmental Committee on the subject of grants to University Colleges will be likely to make its Report; and whether, and when, the latter will be laid upon the Table?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. T. HIBBERT, Oldham): The Committee has already made its Report, and I have to-day moved for a copy of the same, and of the Treasury Minute thereon.

GOVERNMENT LAND GRANTS IN WALES.

MR. PRITCHARD-MORGAN: I beg to ask the Attorney General whether he has yet had an opportunity of perusing the grants to Sir William Herbert of certain lands in the counties of Glamorgan and Monmouth and the schedules and particulars appended thereto; whether he is aware that in all the manors granted to Sir William Herbert all woods, underwoods, wardships, marriages, mines, quarries, and other royalties are reserved to the Crown; whether copies of the grants referred to will be laid upon the Table of the House; whether the Government intend to instruct experts acquainted with the country fully to examine all grants of lands made in the counties of Glamorgan and Monmouth with a view of giving information to Parliament as to the rights of the Crown; and whether the royalties in the counties referred to amount to about £500,000 sterling per annum?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir J. RIGBY, Forfar): I have perused the documents. The words of reservation referred to in the question are contained in the description of certain leases on which different parts of the property were held by the tenants. There is no reservation whatever of the nature referred to in the question. I am informed that all the grants were in the same form, and no such reservation was contained in any of them. The grants are accessible in the Public Record Office, and I do not see any reason why they should be laid on the Table of the House. I am told that such an examination as is asked for would occupy a large staff years, and would therefore involve a great and unnecessary expense.

MR. PRITCHARD-MORGAN: Is the hon. and learned Gentleman certain it would be an unnecessary expense to examine the title of the Crown to mineral rights?

SIR J. RIGBY: Such an inquiry as is here suggested would be unnecessary. The Office of Woods and Land Revenue always keeps on hand copies of grants of land in which the Crown is supposed to be interested. To go back for centuries and to investigate all the grants during those centuries would be an enormous business, occupying many years.

MR. PRITCHARD-MORGAN: What is meant by the words "excepting all minerals, woods, mines," &c.?

SIR J. RIGBY: When application is made to the Crown for a lease it is necessary to give particulars, in relation to the parcels of property to be granted, of the income that is being received by the Crown; and, of course, all the lettings have to be dealt with separately. In each one of these cases a particular piece of property has been let for agricultural or industrial purposes at a certain rent. In these lettings there are reservations to the Crown. They are perfectly operative as between the Crown and the Crown tenant, but they have nothing to do with the Crown and the Crown grantee, and the whole purpose of the particulars is to show what the income of the Crown is.

MR. PRITCHARD-MORGAN: Did the mines and minerals in these particular manors actually pass to the grantee under the particulars?

SIR J. RIGBY: They passed undoubtedly, so far as I have seen. The particulars have nothing to do with it. I cannot make it stronger than that.

MINISTRY OF MINES.

MR. PRITCHARD-MORGAN: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, having regard to the frequent strikes and locks-out of miners, and of the explosions and loss of life continually taking place in coal mines, and to the doubt which exists as to the title of the Crown to various mines and minerals, Her Majesty's Government will consider the advisability of creating a Department of Mines to be presided over by a Minister of the Crown?

MR. ASQUITH: The Chancellor of the Exchequer desires me to say that the Government have no intention of proposing to create a Department of Mines.

MR. PRITCHARD-MORGAN: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the Miners' Federation, representing 600,000 men, in conference have deliberately passed a resolution declaring that such a Department is necessary in the interests of the men?

MR. ASQUITH: Yes, Sir; I am aware of it.

THE UGANDA VOTE.

SIR A. ROLLIT: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when it is proposed to take Report of Supply [1st June, Uganda]?

MR. J. MORLEY (who replied) said: It is impossible to say at this moment, but it will not be taken to-morrow.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

SIR C. W. DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean) asked what Business was to be taken that evening?

MR. J. MORLEY: We intend to go on with the Army Estimates. To-morrow we intend to move to report Progress at 11 o'clock so as to take the Parochial Electors (Registration Acceleration) Bill. I may now answer a question put to me last night by the right hon. Member for Bristol (Sir M. Hicks-Beach) as to the Amendments to the Finance Bill. I understand from the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Sir W. Harcourt) that the bulk of the Amendments to the Finance Bill will be put down to-night, but the Government must reserve to themselves the right to put down a few more at some later date. My right hon. Friend will take care that that date is as early a one as possible.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (Manchester, E.): May I point out to the Government that it is absolutely necessary, I think, for the Opposition to have a clear day at least in which to consider the Amendments put down by the Government? We not only desire to know what is the import of those Amendments, but we may desire to put down Amendments to the Amendments. I hope that, as the Government have not been able, as we anticipated they would be, to put down their Amendments on Wednesday, they will defer the consideration of the Finance Bill till Tuesday. I think that is absolutely necessary. I have no objection to make to the proposal that Progress shall be reported at 11 o'clock to-morrow night for the consideration of the Parochial Elections Bill, but I cannot assure the Government that it will be concluded to-morrow night, and I should have thought it would have been more convenient for them to have put the Bill down as the first Order to-morrow night.

MR. J. MORLEY: I differ from the right hon. Gentleman on that point, and I think the adoption of the proposal he makes would not be likely to accelerate the progress of the Bill. As to the Government Amendments to the Finance Bill, I understand that most of them, and certainly the important ones, will be printed to-morrow morning. There will, therefore, be ample time to consider them. Of course, the question of the postponement of the Report stage is one for the decision of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the House.

SIR G. BADEN-POWELL asked whether time would be given to hon. Members before the Report stage to put down Amendments to the Government Amendments if that were thought necessary?

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) inquired whether the Government had considered the practical difficulty in which Members would be placed if they were not allowed sufficient time to consider the Government Amendments and to put down Amendments to them?

MR. J. MORLEY: I am informed that the bulk of the Amendments, including those of the most substantial importance, will be handed in to-night, so that Members will have access to them to-morrow. Of course, as hon. Members know, the new clauses are taken first on the Report stage.

MR. R. G. WEBSTER (St. Pancras, E.) asked whether the Equalisation of Rates (London) Bill would be proceeded with this Session and, if so, whether the House would have due notice of the day on which it would be taken?

MR. J. MORLEY: No doubt before any considerable interval of time has elapsed, a statement will be made by the Leader of the House as to the measures he proposes to go on with.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: May I ask what business will be taken to-morrow? The Government have changed their views as to the course of business so often in the course of the week that we do not know where we are. There is much inconvenience in these rapid changes of policy.

MR. J. MORLEY: These changes of policy, which the right hon. Gentleman calls rapid, are due to unexpected developments on the part of those who have carried on the Debate on the Army Estimates—developments which have prevented us getting through business which we thought might possibly take two Sittings, and which we thought could not unreasonably have been got through in one. As to the practical question of the right hon. Gentleman, we shall go on with the Army Estimates till they are concluded, and devote what time is left to proceeding with Class II. in the order in which the Votes stand.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES asked whether the right hon. Gentleman would consider the expediency of taking the Parochial Electors Bill to-morrow at half-past 10 instead of 11, so as to give a better chance of getting it through?

MR. J. MORLEY: Of course, if we took it at half-past 9 that would give us a still better chance. Considering that a large portion of time was devoted to the Bill on Tuesday we think that another hour ought to be amply sufficient for disposing of it.

SIR D. MACFARLANE (Argyll) asked whether the right hon. Gentleman, in order to ensure the passage of the Bill, would suspend the Twelve o'Clock Rule to-morrow?

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) inquired whether it was intended to go on seriously with the Post Office Savings Banks Consolidation Bill?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. A. MORLEY, Nottingham, E.): Yes, but there is another Bill, and I want to see whether I can pass that Bill first, because it would then be incorporated with the Consolidation Bill.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) said, that complaint had very often been made with regard to the misleading advertisements which the Secretary for War (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) allowed to appear in country and other newspapers. Last year he had to complain of the advertisements appearing in The Staffordshire Advertiser with regard to the food and clothing of the men, and it was then admitted that those advertisements were of a most misleading character. Another advertisement now appeared in that paper which was almost as misleading, and he thought a protest ought to be raised against anything being put into local newspapers which was not absolutely fair, and which did not disclose everything that ought to be disclosed. The advertisement he referred to was headed "Employment for those out of work," and went on to say, "good food, good clothes, good lodgings, and money to spend every day." He was only going to comment upon one of those misleading statements, that, namely, with regard to good clothes; the others he must reserve for other Votes. He asked would not any man of the recruit class reading statements of this kind suppose that the War Office was going to clothe him? As a matter of fact, all that happened was that the recruit got a free kit. He got what were called his public clothes, whilst he practically had to buy necessities for himself. When he enlisted he received two flannel shirts and three pairs of socks. Of course, in taking these articles he supposed that after a decent interval he would get a fresh supply, but no—if the man remained in the Army for 40 years he got no more. This advertisement would be called a false prospectus if it were issued by a company. He thought the Secretary for War was fully entitled to praise for the action he had taken with regard to the issue of clothing in other respects.

As far as he was able to make out, the right hon. Gentleman in the first place gave the private soldier his outfit on enlistment, which was in itself a great gain. Before the present Regulation came into force if the recruit joined at any but one particular period of the year he received worn-out clothing which had been used by somebody else. The fine clothes of the soldier were frequently an inducement to a man to join the Army, and when such a man found that he had to wait for some months before he got his ordinary kit he was terribly disgusted. He (Mr. Hanbury) thought the right hon. Gentleman was certainly entitled to praise for having made this distinction. Then the right hon. Gentleman gave compensation for articles not worn out by a given time. Of course, under the old system there was no inducement to thrift with regard to clothing. Now if at the end of the period for which a man's clothes had to last the clothes were in a condition to last for three months longer their value was put down to the man's benefit, and the money was only drawn out as new clothes were required. This was, of course, a great inducement to soldiers to make their clothes last as long as possible, and it also had the indirect effect of punishing men who were not careful with their clothes. Then also men had been given the power of selling a certain portion of their clothing. On this point he (Mr. Hanbury) did not think the soldier was quite fairly treated, because if his clothes were not sold when they were put up to auction he was bound to sell them at what were called contractors' prices. If those prices were anything like good prices there would be no objection to raise, but he was afraid that the system against which he had had to protest year after year was still in existence, under which the disused clothing of the troops was sold for three years in advance, although some of it had not even been made at the time of the sale. The whole of this disused clothing was put into one lot and offered to certain contractors. There were 350 kinds of articles comprised in the lot; and, to show what an enormous purchase it meant, he might say that there were 420,000 pairs of trousers alone in it. Of course, the purchase was a sheer speculation. A Jew bought these things not knowing what he was buying, and the result was that he gave a ridiculous price for them. He (Mr. Hanbury) did not see why the clothes should not be put up to auction after they had been used instead of before some of them were made. One change that had been made by the Secretary for War seemed so ridiculous that perhaps the construction he put upon the Regulations was wrong. Under the old system a soldier who was discharged had a set of clothes given to him, whilst now he was to have the magnificent present of 5s. instead. He should think there were few places where a soldier would be able to get a suit of clothes for 5s. The non-commissioned officer's suit was 7s. 6d., and the warrant officer's 15s. Recruits had a great deal of extra work to do during their first year, and he did not think the Government properly clothed them. This affected the English Vote; but he should like to ask what had been done in regard to Indian clothing. Under the old system when a soldier reached India he (Mr. Hanbury) fancied he had to buy the whole of the Indian clothing for himself. That, of course, was a great hardship. The soldier had been relieved of the cost of his sea-kit, and he did not know why he should not also be relieved of the cost of his outfit for India. As to the Indian clothing he (Mr. Hanbury) was afraid that the supply of cloth clothing to the soldier in India was too large. The man only wore it a dozen or 20 times in the course of a year. Great economy might be effected in not issuing so much cloth clothing in India. Each issue might be made to last longer.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, this subject did not arise under the Vote.

MR. HANBURY said, the clothes he was referring to came out of the Pimlico stores.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: But not out of our Estimates.

MR. HANBURY said, the inspection of them was paid for under this Vote. It should be recollected that one of his complaints was that a great deal of receiving and inspecting work was done at Pimlico at the cost of the War Office for other Departments. It was done under a Treasury Minute, which said the War Office was not to charge the various Departments for the work so done. He did not know whether India came under that Minute, but the Post Office and Telegraph Departments did, and the Irish Constabulary, the Customs House, the Board of Trade, the Convict Service, the Prisons Board, the Office of Works, and the Royal Courts of Justice. The work was done for these Departments under the Army Vote without a penny of repayment coming from them. He was rather inclined to say, in spite of the Treasury Minute, that these War Office Estimates ought to be for War Office purposes alone. Probably they spent quite enough on the Army, but they did not get enough for their money, and they ought to be careful that they did not spend money intended for the Army for the benefit of other Departments. There was another point he desired to deal with. Under the old system all the clothing for the Infantry was made up at Pimlico in assorted sizes, then sent down to the different battalions, and after a great deal of trouble in cutting and stitching, made to fit the man. That had always struck him as being a rather expensive process, and, besides that, the men were not as proud as of their dress as they would be if they were properly fitted. A different system had prevailed in the cavalry regiments. In their case a certain amount of cloth was sent down and they made it up themselves. In these days, when there were so many married women attached to regiments, he wondered why something was not done to find them employment in connection with the clothing of the Army. He objected to centralisation at Pimlico, and he did so in the interests of these women. There was no such centralised system in Germany, the whole of the clothing being done by the regiments themselves to be made up. He did not propose to revert to the system of clothing colonels, but he could not say—having seen a great many German soldiers—that our men were smarter looking or better dressed than those of Germany, or that their clothing was better fitted or more serviceable for a campaign. Still, there was no comparison between the cost of uniforms in Germany and England. According to the figures laid before the Committee, which had inquired into the Estimates—and he should like to see another such Committee appointed, for such a great deal of valuable information had been gathered at that inquiry leading to such repeated changes, and to so many useful reforms, that the report was by this time almost obsolete—an English cavalry uniform cost £4 17s. 11d. and a German £2 18s.; an English infantry uniform £3 3s. 8d. and a German £2 10s. 8d. The cost of the German uniforms was less than that of the English by £2 and £1 respectively. That, he thought, showed that we were spending too much on dress at the present moment. Yesterday the hon. Member for Bristol had talked about the positive danger there would be in time of war in a broad distinction between the dress of our Regular Forces and Volunteers. The right hon. Gentleman opposite had used the argument of expense in opposition to the proposal to alter the existing state of things, and had pointed out that the Volunteers had refused to change their uniform at the time that the territorial system was adopted. But that argument did not apply to the distinction made between the uniform of our officers and private soldiers. He was told that in the field British officers, particularly staff officers, were a clear mark for the enemy because their dress, even down to that of the humblest subaltern, was so distinguishable from the dress of the men. It might be possible, he should think, to have some dress to distinguish on their own side the officers from the men, but not so distinguishable as a mark for the bullet of the enemy. And this led to a further question. He should like to know whether, in view of the different conditions under which battles would be fought in future, owing to the long range of the new rifle, the question had been thoroughly gone into in order to see whether red was the best colour for the uniform of the British Army? Personally, he was inclined to think that it was, so far as he had discussed the question with people who had studied it; still, he did notice that in the Service newspapers a strong impression prevailed that, in view of the long range of the present rifle, red for the uniforms was too conspicuous a colour. Sir William Butler, for example, writing in The United Service Magazine only a few months ago, spoke strongly against the red of the British uniform, saying that it was so easily distinguishable at a considerable distance; and scientific men with whom he had discussed the subject said that at a distance it was not the best colour, though it was better than dark blue or green. As to red being the best colour for comfort considering the variety of climates in which the British soldier had to fight, he was told what was contrary to the general opinion—namely, that in cold weather white was the coolest thing one could wear. That did not seem to be the opinion of the hon. Member for King's Lynn (Mr. Gibson Bowles), who sat beside him occasionally and was fond of wearing white in summer. His (Mr. Hanbury's) information was that dark clothing was the coolest in summer. Red would appear to be the happy mean between white and black, so that there was nothing on the whole better for the British troops or more adaptable to the various climates in which they had to fight. No doubt the War Office had gone thoroughly into the subject, and he hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would assure the Committee that red was the nearest colour approaching to invisibility at a long distance they could get, as well as the most suitable for the various climates in which our soldiers had to live. Another subject to which he wished to direct attention was that of sweating. The House of Lords Committee had reported on the gross amount of sweating that prevailed in making uniforms and shirts, especially in Pimlico. This subject needed to be watched. He was told that the old system of sweating was reviving, especially in the manufacture of soldiers' shirts. Ordinary Service shirts were paid for at the rate of 7½d., and it took a skilled needlewoman eight or nine hours to make it, and a soldier's widow could make six shirts a week by dint of application. He mentioned this particular case because he had got evidence on the point. There was no doubt that the evil did exist as to the making of shirts. The right hon. Gentleman opposite had an idea that sometimes he (Mr. Hanbury) was a little too much inclined to find fault with the War Office, but all the statements he made here were founded on the Report of some Committee. The facts were not capable of being denied. The Report of the Lords Committee showed that the sweating that went on in connection with the manufacture of soldiers' clothing was a disgrace to the War Office itself. He asked that the Secretary for War would steadily keep his eye on this matter, and on the Director of Contracts, to see that the contracts given out outside Pimlico were given on such fair terms that those who took them would be able to make a decent thing out of them.

CAPTAIN BAGOT (Westmoreland, Kendal) said, he should like to know whether any of the material from which soldiers' and non-commissioned officers' shirts were made was sent out, under any circumstances, to civilians, or whether it was all given to soldiers' wives—or, at all events, whether the choice of that work was first given to soldiers' wives? He asked the question for the reason that recently he had heard complaints in connection with the Home District Association for providing work for soldiers' wives to the effect that there had not been a sufficient amount of work obtained from Pimlico. He was not aware whether or not that was really the case.

MR. WEBSTER (St. Pancras, E.) said, that in the valuable remarks of the hon. Member for Preston there was nothing which appeared to him to have more weight than the fact that at the present time the officers and men in Her Majesty's Army were so dissimilarly clothed. There were such arms of precision nowadays that officers wearing a dress which easily distinguished them from the men could be easily picked off by an enemy's sharpshooters. He found when on a visit to the West Indies two or three years ago that the soldiers there were clothed in what was called a Zouave uniform, whereas the officers were dressed in the uniform of the Line. Officers in such circumstances would become easy marks for the enemy's bullets. Why was it not possible to have a universal uniform in the British Army—one in which men could be sent out immediately on active service? No doubt for reviews, and so forth, it was desirable to have a red coat; but to the mind of every expert in colours, it was doubtful whether red was the best uniform for active service, especially in India and similar climates. On looking through the Estimates he was struck by the fact that whereas in 1894-5 the material for clothing cost £212,000, in 1893-4 it was £286,000 or a larger amount by £73,000. But he found that the amount spent on ready-made clothing in 1894-5 was £445,520, whereas in 1893-4 it was only £388,000 or more by £57,000. He certainly thought that the observations of the hon. Member for Preston ought to have some weight. Why was there this decrease in the amount of material made up at Pimlico and elsewhere, and why this increase in expenditure on clothing bought ready-made? This ready-made clothing was obtained through sub-contractors, and probably the War Office took no cognizance of the fact as to whether the articles were manufactured in England, in Germany, or elsewhere. He did not suppose there was single article marked "manufactured in England." He thought we ought to adopt the Prussian system of dressing all our soldiers of the Line alike, or nearly so.

COLONEL LOCKWOOD (Essex, Epping) said, the argument of the Secretary for War was mostly lack of money when pressure was put upon him to adopt reforms. If, however, Parliament had accepted that argument, the Army would have been left in statu quo a long time ago. Our soldiers should certainly be allowed a free kit; and if largely-increased expenditure was thus occasioned, the money required should be saved on other Votes. Important details of this kind ought not to be neglected. He could not help thinking that the recruit was hardly treated. The lad had constant drills and fatigue duty, and ought to be served with a fatigue dress of brown holland or something of that sort, such as they found in foreign barracks for such work as coal carrying and fatigue duty. He hoped the Secretary of State would not listen to any proposal to change the colour of the uniform. But the public and the Army would, he believed, regret any such change.

MR. HANBURY: I said red was the best.

COLONEL LOCKWOOD said, he was aware of that, but the hon. Member also said that he had noticed letters in various Service papers saying that there was a difference of opinion on the subject. In regard to distinguishing officers by their uniform, he did not think it would be possible to disguise the officer in such a way that, to the enemy's marksmen, he would be undistinguishable from his men. There must always be some distinguishing mark upon him. If they stripped the General Officer of his gold lace and sash, he would still have his cocked hat. ["No, no!"] But something, no doubt, might be done to make the dress more simple. With regard to the employment of soldiers' wives in connection with the stores at Pimlico and elsewhere, there was no doubt that those who were married with leave were hard put to it to make a living, but the straits the women were put to who were married without leave and the misery they had to endure was appalling, especially in towns like London. But for the regimental assistance sometimes given out to them they would frequently be left to starve. He should like to hear that there was a prospect of more work being given to these women from Pimlico. Another thing he should like to hear about was as to the reserve of clothing which he spoke of last year in connection with the Estimates. He believed that the reserve of clothing at Pimlico was totally inadequate, and that on this account the Reserves, if called out, would be perfectly useless. Furthermore, he questioned the propriety of keeping the whole of the stores at Pimlico. It was doubtful whether, in the case of rapid mobilisation, the whole of the stores could be got out of the doors of the central dépôt and despatched to the various colonels without confusion and mistake. He should like to know whether, in the case of the reserve clothing at Pimlico, it was properly labelled and all means were taken to secure its immediate delivery, without mistake, to the various stations for which it was destined? If this was not the case, and if any fault arose, probably the whole system would break down at once.

MR. FREEMAN-MITFORD (Warwick, Stratford) said, he had been requested to bring forward the question of sweating at the Pimlico Factory, which had been touched on by the hon. Member for Preston. The Secretary of State for War shook his head, but surely the right hon. Gentleman knew that there had been such charges made. There was a very widespread opinion abroad that such irregularities had occurred, and that opinion was founded not upon fancy, but upon the Report of the Lords' Committee which sat two years ago, and unless something radical had since been done the nation was open to the grave charge of setting an example in sweating which had been universally condemned. What did the Report say? Here was a statement from the Director of Army Contracts—

“The evidence given before your Lordships has tended to show that our Army contracts have been used for some years as a vehicle for sweating, and that the whole of the sweating business has been carried out almost under the protection of the War Office.”

The Committee added—

“Great irregularities have occurred in the furnishing of Government contracts. That is open to no doubt, and the Committee is strongly of opinion that greater vigilance should be exercised over the placing of contracts.”

Though the right hon. Gentleman opposite seemed to dissent, there was no doubt that great irregularities had occurred. If anything had lately been done to prevent irregularities, he (Mr. Freeman-Mitford) apologised for bringing the matter forward.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, that his gesture of dissent only had reference to sweating in the Army Clothing Establishment at Pimlico. The accusations of sweating had reference not to the Government factory, but to War Office contracts executed outside.

MR. FREEMAN-MITFORD said, that no doubt the way he had worded his remarks left them open to misconstruction. He was alluding to what took place in connection with contracts placed out. He was certain, however, from the kindly spirit in which the right hon. Gentleman had received his remarks, that the War Office would not close its eyes to a matter which the public thought reflected very great discredit upon the country.

SIR A. ACLAND-HOOD (Somerset, Wellington) said, the troops at Aden, which formed part of the Bombay command, considered it a great grievance that they only received European pay while, owing to the climate, they had to provide themselves with tropical clothing. He had not been at Aden now for two years, but when he was there this was a very serious grievance.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War did not dispute that a certain amount of sweating had existed in the outside districts.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : No; I said that the Committee stated that.

Mr. Freeman-Mitford

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, it was not for him to question the statement of the Committee. If the right hon. Gentleman did it it was another matter. But the fact that sweating took place in connection with contract-made clothing did not prevent the right hon. Gentleman and his advisers from increasing the amount of such clothing used in the Army. He (Mr. Bowles) found that, whereas clothing to the value of £293,000 was supplied at Pimlico, the value of the ready-made clothing supplied was £445,000. The latter was as four to three. He thought the moment had arrived when the whole theory of Army clothing ought to be reconsidered. The clothes of the Army were made upon traditions inherited from Frederick the Great and from Germany. The hard, stiff, regimental model was followed. The black stock, it was true, had disappeared, but the German theory of clothing, which began with the stiff pasteboard cap, intended to make a man look two feet more than he was, was still adhered to. This stiff, hard, tight clothing—this traditional military clothing—should be overhauled and the advice and experience of men who had served on the field should be taken as to the best and most useful uniform. They should have a loose uniform. It had always been said that they could not get recruits unless they made the clothing extremely ornamental—in fact, that they must clothe the troops not for the enemy, but for the servant-girl. [“No, no!”] Yes; that was the argument—unless they had the uniform extremely ornamental, and the pride of the servant-girls, who were the soldier’s public, and the only critics whose opinions he valued, they would not get recruits. The average cost of the British uniform of all classes, as he worked it out, was £4 10s. 7½d. The cost of the Life Guards’ dress was £7 4s., whilst that of the West Indian regiments was only £2 10s. No doubt the Life Guards ought to be magnificent. They were intended for display—[“No, no!”]—and not work. But so far as the other regiments were concerned, the prices for this ornamental uniform varied considerably, and he contended that for a very much less figure than they were paying now they could get sufficient ornamentation and a very much better article for the purposes which a uniform had to serve. His belief was that if they had the best uniforms for actual service they would look handsomer than the merely ornamental uniforms for parade. The result of having this enormously ornamented uniform was that when men went on active service it had to be discarded and another uniform adopted. Why should they have one uniform for the servant-maid and another for the enemy? It seemed to him that one uniform ought to suffice, and it might be ornamented in such a way as to be suitable for parade purposes, and even to satisfy the aspirations of the servant-maids. That was the system that prevailed in the Navy, and the cost of the naval uniform was as nothing compared with the lowest of the military uniforms. One reason for that was that the sailors made their own clothes, and he did not see why the soldiers should not do the same. The naval uniform cost about one-third of the military uniform, and with the extraordinary result that instead of having greater difficulty in getting recruits for the Navy there was far less than was experienced with regard to the Army. That disposed of the argument that they must have an unduly ornamented uniform in order to get recruits for the Army. He believed that the advantages and adventures of the military life would be quite sufficient to men to join the Army without this undue ornamentation of the uniform. He, therefore, suggested to the right hon. Gentleman that the appropriate moment had arrived when they should really reconsider the whole theory of military uniforms and ask themselves whether they could not adopt a real working campaigning dress with a fair amount of ornamentation which would serve equally for a campaign and for service abroad, and which would, at the same time, be adequately ornamental for the purposes of the parade-ground. He believed they had gone wrong up to this time only because they had slavishly followed the traditions of Frederick the Great. He hoped they would have the courage to depart from these traditions and adopt a dress that experience in campaigning in all parts of the world had proved the most advantageous.

MR. BROMLEY-DAVENPORT (Cheshire, Macclesfield) said, the hon. Member for Preston had quoted an advertisement from a provincial newspaper giving a highly-coloured picture of the inducements which were offered to recruits to join the Army. He suspected that the Committee were not quite aware of the manner in which these advertisements were offered to the newspapers. A considerable sum of money was expended upon them; but they were given, not to the newspapers which had the largest circulation, but rather to those newspapers that happened to support the Government, whatever might be the extent of their circulation. That might be a rough-and-ready method of stating the fact, but it was the fact nevertheless; and the right hon. Gentleman had practically, in smoother and more delicate terms, admitted that such was the case, because in answer to a question which he put some time ago the right hon. Gentleman told him that the guiding principle was the amount of the circulation of the newspapers, but that he would discover, if he made further inquiries, that the extent of the circulation was apt to vary with the particular Government in Office. That meant that the right hon. Gentleman was only doing what his predecessors had done before him. It could not be a right and proper system. The answer of the right hon. Gentleman might have been humorous, but it was certainly not satisfactory, and he trusted the right hon. Gentleman would make an alteration in that respect in the future. It might be proper to spend this money, but they had a right to see that full service was obtained for the public in respect of the money which was authorised to be spent on their behalf, and if it was necessary that these advertisements should go forth, then they ought to be given, without respect to political colour, to those newspapers only which had the largest circulation. He knew of a newspaper which circulated largely throughout a whole county which had had these advertisements for 30 years, but which in the year 1892 had them taken away and they were given to another newspaper with no circulation at all, the only possible reason being that the latter newspaper happened to support the politics of the Government in Office. Such a system amounted to a public scandal, and if continued would lead to jobbery which might even be extended in other directions. They had a right to protest against such a system and to prevent, as far as possible, public funds being made use of for the purpose of subsidising Party organs.

*MR. WOODALL said, that with regard to the question of advertisements he rather thought the force of the observations of the hon. Member who had spoken referred rather to the past than to the present. Pressure undoubtedly was brought on a new Government on taking Office to extend their advertising favours to papers which presumably were neglected by their predecessors in Office, but, honestly, he could say that, so far as his Department exercised any influence, they endeavoured to have regard to the primary purpose for which the advertisement was designed, the paper being selected which had the largest circulation. He hoped to see an agreement come to between opposite sides of the House to take this matter entirely out of patronage lines, and deal with it on the common-sense principles that business-men would apply. The hon. Member for Preston had read an advertisement, from a provincial newspaper, addressed to recruits. It so happened that he read the same advertisement in the same paper, and after some of the censure which had fallen from the hon. Gentleman on former occasions, he was very much relieved to find that either with regard to the accuracy or the fairness of the instance the hon. Member had quoted he did not observe anything to which exception could be taken. Good clothing was promised to the soldier, and he got it, including, in the first instance, a complete outfit of socks and under-clothing, but there were obvious difficulties in the way of providing a continuous public supply of clothing of that kind. It was gratifying to find that the new system of furnishing the soldier with clothing which was to be his own property had been a success. He was rather astonished to find the hon. Member for Preston speaking in favour of the old system of making up clothing regimentally. That system had been found to work so badly that it was, with general consent, abandoned. A good deal had been said about sweating, and reference had been made to certain passages in the Report of the Committee which charged sweating in the factories of certain contractors.

Mr. Bromley-Davenport

MR. HANBURY (interposing) said, that not only was it alleged in the case of certain contractors, but it was also said to have occurred at Pimlico. This appeared in the evidence before the Committee on Sweating. There were cross-allegations, in one case that the wages paid by the out-contractors were higher than those paid at the factory, and in another case that the wages paid at the factory were higher than those paid by the outside sweaters. The Committee in their Report referred to the case of a man who took a contract for great-coats at a low rate, and when he was spoken to about it by the Director of Contracts he said that the wages he paid were double those paid to women employed at the Government factory in shirtmaking, and that was the conclusion of the Committee.

*MR. WOODALL remarked that it was rather curious to note how vague a term "sweating" was. He found it applied by a number of people to anything in the nature of economy of production, to subdivision of labour, and to the introduction of improved methods of manufacture. What the Government had to look to was that their people in their factories worked under wholesome sanitary conditions, earned fair wages, were happy and contented in their employment, and so far as the Government could judge by constant inspection and constant inquiry into the circumstances they felt that the term "sweating," as it was properly applied, was wholly inapplicable to any department in their employment. In fact, nothing could be more gratifying to his right hon. Friend and himself than for Members of this House to pay a visit to the factory at Pimlico, where they would see the provision which had been made for the convenience and comfort and everything that could contribute to the healthy conditions of employment. In fact, he ventured to say that nothing whatever was lacking that could reasonably be expected from the good employer.

COLONEL LOCKWOOD: Are the sanitary arrangements good?

MR. WOODALL had certainly heard no complaints to the contrary. The electric lighting had been extended; the hours were 48 a week; there had been an increase in the minimum wages; and he thought the Government had got a fairly satisfied and happy number of work-people in their service. He had no doubt at all that in times past there had been some justification for the statement that work given out to contractors had been executed under conditions very different from those which now applied. Whatever might have been the case in the past he ventured to think that no such charge lay against them at the present time. Work was only given out to those contractors who were able to execute it under the best system of factory inspection, and those factories in which the work was done were inspected from time to time, as occasion arose, under the direction of the Director of Contracts, who reported that these factories compared very favourably indeed with the Government factories. A case was alluded to only a few months ago with regard to sweating, which seemed to come home to one of their contractors. He had that charge very carefully investigated. The allegation as far as it went was true, but only true in that it was fairly brought home to the contractor who was occasionally employed by the Government, but it was conclusively established that the sweating in question, which consisted of giving out work to be done in unsanitary homes, was not practised upon any work-people doing work for the Government. Some hon. Members seemed to apprehend that under the term manufactured articles of clothing or "ready made," the Government would be able to acquire clothing made under unfavourable conditions. If hon. Members would turn to page 51 of the Estimates before them they would see how various were the articles included in the term "ready made." Of these, boots and shoes were in the largest quantities, and means were taken to ensure in regard to other equipments the best possible conditions for the workmen engaged. As to obtaining any supplies from foreign countries, he might claim credit for the present Government for having done something to encourage home manufactures. In certain classes of silk articles it was reported to the Government up to a very recent date that their requirements could be met only by German manufactures. He brought the matter under the notice of the Silk

Association, with the result that they were satisfactorily supplying what was required, although, he was sorry to say, at a considerably higher price than was formerly paid. Something had been said in regard to shirt-making. In answer to a question which was put to him some time ago on this matter, he made a statement which he would now repeat. Various charitable benevolent associations or societies had been formed in London and Devonport and other parts of the country who had endeavoured to find work for soldiers' wives and widows. They had made strong appeals from time to time to have work of this kind furnished to them. The Government had responded to these appeals; they had supplied these materials cut out in the proper form, and they had paid 40 per cent. to these benevolent agencies higher than the market prices at which the work could be done, and he believed the workers so employed had been able to earn quite as large a wage as, at any rate, their skill entitled them to receive. The Government had satisfied themselves that this particular kind of provision had enabled money to circulate among a class of people who were very necessitous and who had claims upon the State.

MR. R. G. WEBSTER: Where are these benevolent agencies? Are they in London or the Provinces?

MR. WOODALL said, they were located in London, Devonport, and, he believed, in various parts of the country, especially where soldiers were to be found. As he had said, the work had been fairly done, although not cheaply done, but it had found employment which had assisted in the maintenance of very decent people. He hoped that his hon. Friends who had asked them to show greater diligence in the placing of contracts would be satisfied with the explanation that he had given. He could assure them that from the moment the Report of the Sweating Committee had been brought under the consideration of his right hon. Friend the greatest care had been exercised, not merely in the placing of these contracts, but in carrying out the system of inspection after the contract had been made. If complaint had reached the Government at any time it had immediately been followed by a surprise inspection, and penalties were enforced against any contractor to whom in any way could be traced any violation of the conditions of the contract. Reference had been made to the importance of providing suitable clothing for those in hot climates. That was rather a matter for the Indian Government. There had been a good deal said as to the suitability of the colour and design of soldiers' clothing. Upon that matter he had no doubt* that the observations which had fallen from hon. Members who had given consideration to this subject would receive every consideration from his right hon. Friend and those who were responsible for advising him. As to the question of providing a requisite reserve of clothing, he could assure hon. Members that this was a matter which was receiving the most careful consideration.

MR. FREEMAN-MITFORD (Warwick, Stratford) said, everyone would recognise the courteous manner in which the Financial Secretary to the War Office had given his reply, but still he ventured to say that the answer of the hon. Gentleman was not altogether satisfactory. The hon. Gentleman had drawn a picture of the Department at Pimlico being under the paternal care of the War Office, watched over by able officers, periodically inspected, and in every way excellent in its sanitary arrangements. But that did not at all tally with the investigations of the Committee which sat to consider this very matter in 1892. Mr. Ramsey, the Director of the Clothing Department, when asked before that Committee whose business it was to see that the provisions of the Factory Act were observed at Pimlico, replied—

"I do not know that we consider it anybody's business to see whether it is complied with."

And Mr. de Quincey, another official, said—

"At present no one is responsible for the discharge of that duty."

That left the matter in a very unsatisfactory condition unless some substantial action had been taken in the meantime by the War Office to see that the requirements of the Factory Act were complied with at Pimlico. The Financial Secretary had said that the War Office were giving out the making of the Army shirts to soldiers' wives, and were paying 40 per cent. more than the current prices for the work. But what could a poor soldier's wife earn by making shirts, toiling night and day? The Westminster Gazette, in a recent article, stated that to make an ordinary Service shirt it took a skilled needlewoman eight or nine hours; and that as she was paid only 7½d. for each shirt, as she had to pay a halfpenny for machining the front of the shirt, and had to provide her own needles and cotton, she earned by working long hours and six days a week the starvation wage of 3s. per week. Were they, he asked, at the end of the 19th century to listen to Hood's "Song of the Shirt," sung under the auspices of the English War Office?

*MR. BRODRICK (Guildford, Surrey) said, his hon. Friend, who had drawn a picture of the soldier's wife at shirt-making with such oratorical skill as to win the sympathy of everybody, was hardly aware of the circumstances under which this work was given out. But he should not have interfered between his hon. Friend and the Financial Secretary to the War Office on the question were it not that the late Mr. Stanhope was, as Secretary for War in the late Conservative Government, responsible for the large amount of shirt-making that was now done by soldiers' wives. Hon. Members who made attacks on the way those contracts were given out could not be aware of the enormous difficulty of dealing with the question so that justice might be done between the country and those who carried out the contracts. The House of Commons had decided that the wages to be paid in Government contracts were the wages current in the district, and surely the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War had more than carried out his obligation to the House by paying 40 per cent. more than the prices at which he could get the shirt-making otherwise done. The question of sweating had occupied a great deal of the time of the War Office under the late Government; and he would give the Committee his experience on that question with regard to two classes of clothing supplied by contract. One class was the civilian suits given to soldiers on being discharged. There could not be a better made suit; it was precisely the same class of suit which would be seen on a man-servant in any establishment in the morning, and which cost from £2 10s. to £4 10s. Yet contractors were actually elbowing each other at the doors of the War Office to get the contract for those suits at 12s. 6d. to 13s. each. Those were the prices current in the district for that class of work, but the War Office took the course, which had been upheld by the present Government, of forcing every contractor to publish in his factory the price he was going to pay for the making of the suits; and by that means they ran up the price of the suit by a little over 1s., but they more than doubled what the workman got for making it. The other class of clothing was the great-coat which invalid soldiers were required to get and pay for. Those coats were supplied to the War Office at 13s. 6d. each. He bought one, and showed it to two tailors whom he usually employed, and asked them what they would make him such a coat for. One said £3 10s. and the other £4 5s., and he had not the slightest belief that they intended to cheat him. It was an excellent coat. He walked down Bond Street on one occasion wearing it to prove it was a coat that any gentleman might wear; and the lady who walked with him did not detect any difference between it and the ordinary great-coat of the fashion. In the case of that article of clothing also the War Office under the late Government forced the contractor to put up in his factory the exact price he was going to pay the workman for making the coat. But he did not believe that those prices would satisfy Members of the House, though they were much in excess of the wages ordinarily paid; and he mentioned the circumstances in order to point out how extraordinarily difficult it was to stop sweating when there were thousands of persons willing to undertake the work at very low terms. If the present Secretary for War saw his way to giving the soldiers' wives better terms for the making of shirts he should be very glad; but he knew that under the late Government the great anxiety was to get the work at the old terms, and when the War Office took the work away from the contractors and gave it to the soldiers' wives they were told they had done a thing that was very popular. With regard to Pimlico, he should say he thought there was reason for congratulation in the fact that so little complaint was heard nowadays about the factory. He was sure that if his hon.

Friends would only inspect the factory themselves they would find it very satisfactory and that work was carried on there under admirable conditions. The Financial Secretary, in answering a question in reference to the stock of Army clothing in reserve, was only able to give a sort of general assurance that the stock would be increased. The matter was, he thought, very important. Seeing the great number which the Army Reserve had now reached, it must be obvious that it was necessary to keep a larger stock of suits of clothes in reserve in case of war than had heretofore been the case, and he would like to know how the right hon. Gentleman hoped to be able to do that without having asked for any increase of the Vote for that particular purpose?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: With regard to the question of the wages of soldiers' wives, I think we must bear in mind that, although paid at possibly a much higher rate than is common in the trade, the soldier's wife is often a very inexpert person at the machine, and therefore cannot earn so much as an expert person would. But we cannot help that. We cannot be expected to pay such a rate for the work done as that an inexpert woman would earn as much as an expert woman.

MR. FREEMAN-MITFORD: The woman I alluded to was an expert woman, and one who could use a machine.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: As regards the general question, the hon. Member quoted from the evidence given before a Committee in 1892. But the Nonconformist conscience and other consciences have since been aroused—the universal conscience has been aroused; we have changed all our manners and methods; the House of Commons itself has taken a new line in the matter, and hon. Members may depend upon it that the direction of the House in the matter of wages will be most earnestly enforced by any Government which may be in the War Office. I can assure the hon. Member for Warwickshire if, as the result of his raising this matter evidence, is produced to show that what he has described is now going on, and if he furnishes me with it I will have a speedy inquiry, and, what is more, a speedy remedy applied. I may add that the time of several high officials in the War Office is considerably taken up trying to investigate cases of the kind which the hon. Member has brought before us. With regard to the reserve of clothing, I have to say that we are trying to put it on a business basis. The principle that has been approved of by my military advisers and myself is that we should maintain clothing for an Army Reserve of 35,000 men, and that the Militia should possess such clothing at their depôts as would enable them to come out when called upon. There may be a little delay; but it will not be long, I hope, before those results are achieved. I pass to the question of the colour of the uniform of the Army, which has been so often discussed before. The invisibility of the colour of the uniform depends on the natural characteristics of the country in which the Army is operating; but however that may be, and though we may be obliged to send uniforms of a certain colour with men going to serve in certain climes, I believe the British nation will stand by the old "thin red line"—by the old red colour which has so often been illustrated in the operations of war. The hon. Member for Lynn Regis referred to the nature of the Army clothing—its tightness and its slackness. Does the hon. Member imagine that I or my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary lay down what the uniforms of the Army shall be? Why, the men who determine the changes, or who resist changes in the uniform of the Army, are men who have had the largest experience in actual warfare; and, therefore, no higher authority on the subject could be obtained. The hon. Member for Macclesfield, who, after discharging his dart, has gone away—and I do not wonder at it, considering the heat—called my attention to the system under which the War Office and other Departmental advertisements are inserted in the newspapers. The hon. Member said that in this matter the Government should not be actuated by such a wretched consideration as political feeling. I cannot help admiring the virtuous sentiments which, no doubt, everyone shares. There was a Debate on this question a year or two ago, and the House declared that there ought to be a stereotyped list of newspapers maintained at headquarters, and that politics should have nothing to do with the distribution of advertisements. We all agreed to that, and everybody was satisfied. But when we came into Office we looked at the newspapers which had been placed on this stereotyped list, and I will confide to the Committee the fact that there was a most extraordinary absence from it of all those Liberal newspapers which one would naturally think ought to find a place on it.

MR. BRODRICK: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will permit me to say that in selecting the newspapers we went on the principle of the largest circulation.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: No doubt that was the principle, but it is a significant fact that the papers which had the largest circulation were always papers which gave support to the late Government. That was the state of things we found when we came into Office, and we were obliged in common decency to insert here and there in the list a newspaper which was not of the same political complexion as the newspapers selected by hon. Gentlemen opposite.

SIR J. GORST (Cambridge University): I wish to say a few words on the subject of sweating, on which I had some little personal experience lately, not that I doubt the benevolent intentions of the Secretary of State for War in the matter, but because I think it desirable to clear up what is the precise meaning of the Resolution the House of Commons passed on the subject, and what the Government must be prepared to do if they intend to carry it out. If you are only going to pay for the making of Army clothing—whether suits or great coats, or shirts—the current rate of wages for the same kind of labour, I have no hesitation whatever in saying that the Government will become sweaters, and will employ and continue to employ, people at starvation wages. I say that because the result of the great competition, particularly amongst women, for work of this kind, is that the current rate of wages is undoubtedly a wage on which it is impossible for a human being to live. As I understand the determination of the House of Commons, it is this—that all those persons working for the Government, and therefore for the community itself, should be paid, not the current rate of wages, but that they should be paid—to use a handy phrase, now in vogue—“a living wage.” If, in shirt-making for the Army, an expert workwoman, working eight hours a day six days a week, can earn only 3s. a week, then undoubtedly the Government for whom those shirts are made at such a price is guilty of the economic offence of sweating; and if you mean to carry out in its spirit the Resolution of the House of Commons, you must make up your mind to pay not the current rate of wages for the making of the articles you are having made for our soldiers, but a sum very considerably in advance of the current wages. On the subject of the wages in the dockyards, which was discussed here not long since, I understood the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War, speaking for the Government, to repudiate the idea that the Government of the country ought ever to take advantage of the low rate to which competition had forced down the wages of labour in the open market, in order to have Government work done at that reduced rate; and, further, that a fair wage should in all cases be paid by the Government for all work done in the service of the Government. If to that principle the right hon. Gentleman intends to adhere I can assure him that he has my most cordial support. I know there are great difficulties in the way of acting universally on this principle in all the Government Departments. It is not many years ago since it was thought desirable to get all the articles required in the service of the Government at the cheapest rate which the competition in the market would allow, and it is not possible that a system of that kind could be changed in a day. But I hope I am justified in saying that the principle I have described is the principle to which the present Government intend to adhere, which to a certain extent was carried out by the late Government, and which I hope all future Governments will be obliged to continue—namely, the principle of paying those who work for the community a fair living wage.

MR. FREEMAN-MITFORD hoped the right hon. Gentleman would consider the propriety of paying a special wage to soldiers' wives when employed as needlewomen. It appeared to him that what they were now receiving was a starvation wage.

*COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central) said, he wished to congratulate his right hon. Friend on the efforts he had made to get the clothing from home manufacturers instead of abroad, in which he was following in the footsteps of his predecessor, the late Mr. Edward Stanhope. But he found that up to the 31st of March, 1893-4, silk braid and cloth to the value of £477 was obtained from abroad. He granted that was not a very large amount, and he admitted that the War Office had set a good example to the Admiralty; but in the current year he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would be able to do a good deal more for the encouragement of home manufactures, and that he would obtain his silk braid and cloth from England instead of a foreign country, and that this item of £477 would not appear in the Return for the year ending on the 31st of March next. Another matter he wished to call attention to was this—namely, what steps were being taken to see that the Resolution passed by the House of Commons in 1891 was carried it out? The Return of contracts with foreigners only applied to contracts with persons outside the United Kingdom, and no steps were taken by the War Department to secure that the articles which the Government ordered should be made at home and not abroad. It was no use printing on specifications the Resolution of the House of Commons of 1891—which was called the Fair Contract Resolution and was designed more especially to meet the evil of sweating—unless steps were taken to ensure that the articles contracted for should be made in the home factories and under the operation of the Factory Laws and the wholesome agency of the Trades Unions and not abroad. Unless steps were taken to ensure that the contracts placed with home manufacturers and home merchants should be made in this country, he submitted that the Resolution of 1891 was practically a farce. He should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether in the specification for tenders for Government work, especially for clothing, the manufacturers were required to set up the rates of wages which they pay and the hours of labour? There was no difficulty in that, as it was done in the County Council contracts, and he held such a specification in his hand, which he would be glad to place in the hands of his hon. Friend. On this each contractor was required to set out in alphabetical or other order the names of the several trades he would employ in or about the execution of the contract, the rates of wages paid, and the hours of labour for all work done within a radius of 20 miles of Charing Cross. In two other columns the contractor had to set out the work done elsewhere, and this enabled the Committee before whom the tenders came to judge whether the price paid for wages was such as was in the spirit of the House of Commons Resolution, which had been practically adopted by the London County Council, and what difference there was if the work was done outside a radius of 20 miles of Charing Cross. He did not mean to suggest that the War Office should adopt the radius of 20 miles from Charing Cross, but he would suggest the extreme desirability of requiring this information to be furnished upon the tenders to enable the hon. Gentleman and the officials working under his Department to judge whether the articles would be made at home at fair rates or made abroad. If that information was in the possession of his hon. Friend such evils as had been referred to in the case of shirt-making could not possibly occur. He only raised these points for the consideration of his hon. Friend, who he was sure would give them his best attention, but he would again direct his notice more particularly to the fact that nearly £500 worth of foreign silk braid and cloth was obtained last year from contractors outside the United Kingdom, and express an earnest hope that no such item might appear in the Return ending the 31st March, 1894-95.

COLONEL GUNTER (York, W.R., Barkstone Ash) asked for some information regarding the clothing of cavalry regiments. Within a very short period—within a year or so—the clothing of the Hussars had been taken away from the regimental clothing shops, and he wished to know the reason for that. He knew what ought to be the reason, and probably he should be told that it was so—namely, because the work could not be done when the regiment was out on service. The question he really wished to ask was this, did the officers commanding the regiment approve of the change? The great complaint in cavalry regiments was the want of employment, and employment in the tailors' shop was very considerable. If the men who were tailors could obtain employment in these shops it kept them steadily at work. Again, when the regiment was on service the tailors were of immense value to make up things and in the repairing of various articles, and his object in rising was to know whether the commanding officers approved of the change?

SIR R. TEMPLE (Surrey, Kingston) said, that Item H in this Vote represented a large sum of money, nearly £500,000, as the value of certain clothing in stock, and he wished to ask, in regard to this very large quantity of stock in hand, whether there were now any satisfactory arrangements made for periodical stock-taking? He presumed that these stores were drawn upon for various purposes, and consequently there would be a large remainder of which account should periodically be taken. His experiences in the Committee upstairs led him to suppose that not long ago the arrangements for stock-taking in the Army Clothing Department were very defective, and one remarkable instance came to their notice of losses of stores; not very large, but still losses owing to the defective stock-taking. Not long ago he understood that the stock-taking was every three years, but he was under the impression that now, by a new arrangement, it was annually. When he mentioned that to some of his colleagues upstairs they threw doubt upon it, and seemed to consider there had been no improvement made. He was not sure he ought to ask this question without notice, but possibly the right hon. Gentleman, or his deputy beside him, might have the ready information on the tips of their well-informed tongues, and might acquaint the Committee how the matter stood.

MR. HANBURY said, he wished to make a few remarks on the subject of sweating. Within his own knowledge, four or five years ago a good deal of the work was actually done in the French military prisons. There was no doubt about it, because it was brought before him, and he brought it before the authorities. That was about five years ago, and Mr. Stanhope was perfectly unaware of what was going on, and the hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Brodrick) was unaware of it, and it was just possible that it was even going on now. There were two military prisons on the north coast of France, and the convicts there executed the order that had been given on contract by the English Government for helmets. He found this out by accident, and got it stopped; but when they were found out and brought forward, it was no use to treat the matter with a waive of the hand, as though it was impossible for it to happen under any Government. He did not say these things were being done now, as he had no evidence on the question brought before him since, but he called attention to this subject, because unless it was put in the contract where the goods were to be manufactured there was no doubt that the contractors would get the work done in places where it was never intended it should be done when the contract was given out. When the hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Brodrick) talked about the current rate of wages he did not think the hon. Gentleman was correct, because the history of a good deal of the Army clothing had been that it had been given out to the cheapest market. A good deal of it was given to Limerick, because that was a cheap market, and then it was withdrawn and given to the East End of London, because that was a still cheaper market. He hoped that the suggestion of his hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge University (Sir J. Gorst) would be carried out. He said that the Government ought to set a good example as a model employer of labour, and should not be satisfied with work done at sweating prices. They had not yet had an answer to the question put by his hon. Friend behind him as to who was responsible for seeing that the Resolution was carried out with respect to these contracts. At the time of the Lords' Committee, Mr. Nepean admitted there was no one responsible, that there was no one under him to see that the clause which the House of Commons Resolution required to be inserted in all contracts was properly carried out. Another point he wished to raise was that of inspection by the ordinary Home Office Inspectors. He did not say that the explosion at Waltham Abbey would have been prevented if there had been such an inspection, but at all events they would do their best to have these factories inspected and perhaps prevent these accidents from occurring. He could not see why Government factories should not be placed under precisely similar inspection to private factories. He believed that no Government Inspector visited the Pimlico factory or any Government factory. No doubt the War Office had its own Inspector to look after these matters, but that did not meet the case; what they wanted was someone to see that the Government factories were carried on with the same regard for the health, safety, and protection of the workmen as was enforced in all private factories. Then, with regard to Pimlico, it was not sufficient to say the wages were about the same as those paid by private firms, because the question with regard to Pimlico was a peculiar one. He would not go into the question as to the desirability of keeping the factory at Pimlico at all. The factory itself was built upon land that was extremely valuable, and was about the very worst site that could be chosen for it. He ventured to say that, standing where it did, the site would run to hundreds of thousands of pounds, and, as far as the War Department was concerned, it was about the worst place in which a factory could be erected. The result was that the workpeople had to live away from their work; they had either to pay excessively high rents in consequence of living in the neighbourhood, or else they had to live at a great distance from their work. Therefore, though the wages might be reasonable, considerable deductions had to be made on account of the excessive rents that had to be paid for house accommodation.

*MR. WOODALL said that, with regard to the observations of the hon. Member as to the inspection of Government factories, he could assure him that the Government factories were subject to the Factory Acts just as private undertakings were ; and though it might be that the Home Office did not recognise the obligation to make the inspection as rigid and as constant as in the case of private factories, the responsibility rested with that Department. The War Office interposed no difficulty, and every suggestion made by those charged with the administration of the Factory Acts received the most respectful and deferential attention. He would remind the right hon. Member for Cambridge University (Sir J. Gorst) that the House of Commons' Resolution dealt not merely with the current rate of wages, but with the question of sweating, with the practice of sub-letting work contracted for, and in placing contracts the Government must have regard to all these points. The Director of Contracts was responsible for seeing that the Resolution was carried out, and he had a staff who investigated the subject of every complaint and saw that justice was done. With regard to the question of shirt-making, they knew that people employed under proper conditions in the factory could make a shirt at a given price and earn good wages. An appeal had been made to them to distribute a certain amount of the work among people who executed it in their own homes. They paid a higher price for this being done by way of a meritorious charity, and therefore it was very hard to have it thrown in their teeth that their work was done under conditions that enabled people to earn only the small wages that had been quoted. It must be remembered that the women who did this work did not devote their whole time to it. They did it at their convenience and in the intervals between their ordinary domestic duties. But he would go very carefully into the matter and would consider everything that had been said with regard to the reproach of having the work done under conditions that did not yield fair wages to the workers. At the same time, he believed they were paying prices which under the ordinary commercial conditions of doing this kind of work were proved to be adequate for the service done. With regard to the cost of uniforms, of course it varied, but if they took the average and compared it with the cost to their continental competitors it could not be said that they were extravagant.

Mr. Woodall

COLONEL GUNTER said, that was not the question he asked; his question was whether the officers commanding approved of the removal of the military tailoring shops from the regiments, where they formed an excellent employment for many soldiers in the regiment.

*MR. WOODALL said, he was not quite sure; all they knew was that the responsible Minister took the view that the change was an improvement. They were satisfied that under the old system it had been shown conclusively there were opportunities for fraud for which the soldier very often suffered, and that it was very difficult of identification and control. The hon. and gallant Gentleman knew that although the clothes were made up in certain sizes, every regiment had its tailor, so that any suit that required it could be adjusted. The hon. Baronet asked him some questions as to the stock-taking, and he would tell him that it had been found that the stock-keeping at provincial depôts had been done under circumstances that had not been satisfactory, and under it there had been losses. But a system had been devised and approved of, and was now being brought into operation, by which a certain number of officers, specially selected for their fitness, were employed for the purpose of visiting the depôts from time to time and testing the stocks, so that they were not dependent now upon mere stock-taking and examination. It had been found that the stock-taking at provincial depôts had been done under circumstances which were not satisfactory; but a system had been devised and approved of, and was now being brought into operation, by which a certain number of specially selected officers would be employed for the purpose of visiting the depôts from time to time. He had heard the old story which his hon. Friend the Member for Preston had revived with regard to contracts and prison-made goods a good many times, and he could only assure his hon. Friend that he had very carefully inquired into the matter and had ascertained that, whatever might have occurred in bygone days, nothing of the kind was possible under the present system.

MR. HANBURY: But I stated the whole of the facts up to only five years ago.

MR. WOODALL: As I have said, I have made every possible inquiry, and I repeat that the hon. Member may, at any rate, be perfectly sure that whatever was done under the old system of inspection, nothing of the kind is possible under the present system. I think I have now answered all questions, and that we ought now to be allowed to take the Vote.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT: I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it is a fact that the colours of the British regiments are obtained in foreign countries?

MR. WOODALL: I should like to answer this question upon the Vote for Warlike Stores. I may say, however, that it is perfectly true that the silk employed in making the colours is sometimes of foreign manufacture, but the cost of the material is insignificant when compared with the embroidery and other work expended on it. With regard to the braid and silk dressing, I think I may say that the arrangements now made have rendered the system of purchase more satisfactory than hitherto.

COLONEL KENYON-SLANEY (Shropshire, Newport) said, he noticed that there was a certain measure of congratulation going on between the two Front Benches. They had heard a good deal about the excellence of the materials served out to the soldiers. He must say he thought little of the suits served out to the soldiers on leaving barracks, and unless there had been some marvellous change in the material and manufacture he did not think that any self-respecting soldier would ever accept one of them unless, upon going out of barracks for the last time, he wanted to look like a convict. He very much doubted whether the soldiers ought to be asked to wear these suits. The soldier who put a great-coat over one of the suits would, at all events, exhibit a considerable amount of discretion. The right hon. Gentleman opposite had received and deserved a certain amount of credit for the experiments which, under his presidency, had been adopted at the larger factories and workshops connected with the Army. If the Government had had the courage to initiate shorter hours, surely they might have the courage to make an experiment in laying down what was a fair rate of wage to be paid for work done for them. If they would be bold enough to take up the same attitude in regard to women's wages in the factories as they had taken in regard to the men's hours, they would receive and deserve their thanks and congratulations. The House of Commons did not wish that the work doled out from Government factories should be regulated by the prices in the district round about. He hoped that one issue of the Debate would be to obtain some advance in the direction of a fair wage. If so, some good work would have been done.

MR. BROMLEY - DAVENPORT said, he understood from the Financial Secretary that he would see that advertisements were given to those newspapers which had the largest circulation and that there would be some understanding to that effect, so that whichever Party was in power a distribution of advertisements would be made upon the basis of circulation only, and without regard to the fact as to whether the papers selected did or did not support the Government of the day. He hoped that this arrangement would be carried out in the Provinces notwithstanding the fact that the Provincial Press was largely Liberal and would in any circumstances probably obtain the benefit of the giving of advertisements on non-political lines. On the other hand, he could give instances in which certain newspapers of small circulation were preferred to Conservative papers, and he was desirous that the War Office should see that this injustice was remedied.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, the principle which the War Office had tried to follow was to establish a list of newspapers depending not upon politics, but upon circulation. That principle was acted upon by the last Liberal Government; but when the change of Government took place, it was discovered that by some extraordinary means a larger selection of papers had been made in the constituencies which supported the Government which had been last in power. That fact rendered him very doubtful whether under any Government they would find that rigid impartiality which they all of them desired to see. He could assure the hon. Member that he would, at all events, see that no newspaper was in the future added to the list without sufficient justification.

MR. BROMLEY - DAVENPORT said, he was afraid he must ask the right hon. Gentleman to give him some more satisfactory assurance than that which he had just made. Nothing would be satisfactory short of an actual arrangement that should be arrived at with regard to the placing of papers on the advertising list. The present system under which advertisements were given out amounted to a public scandal.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN was understood to say that in view of the applications made by the Conservative papers hon. Members should be modest in their demands.

*MR. BRODRICK said, that for seven years—from 1880 to 1887—the Party to which he had the honour to belong had had no chance of revising the list of newspapers to which advertisements were given, as the arrangements were made early in the year. They had always gone upon the principle of giving advertisements to the newspapers with the largest circulations. There was a consensus of opinion that the papers selected were the best, and he was sorry to find that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War had thought it necessary to make any change. He hoped that whatever was done the system would not be adopted of spreading the advertisements over two papers in the same district, because that was a wasteful plan, inasmuch as in any given district one paper was usually much superior to the other.

MR. HANBURY: The hon. Member for Hanley had told them that the matter would be put right, but neither he nor the Secretary for War had any power over it. The distribution of advertisements rested entirely with the Patronage Secretary, and was managed solely as a Party matter. The House must have been under a complete delusion on this point up to the present time, and he thought all would agree that this system of dealing with advertisement sought at once to be put an end to.

THE CHAIRMAN: That does not arise on this Vote.

MR. HANBURY admitted that it only arose indirectly, but the fact remained that a large number of advertisements were issued in connection with the Clothing Vote.

THE CHAIRMAN: That may be but the cost does not fall on this Vote.

Vote agreed to.

2. £1,807,000, Warlike and other Stores: Supply and Repair.

CAPTAIN BOWLES (Middlesex, Enfield) said, he wished to call the attention of the Committee to a matter in connection with the Ordnance Factory at Enfield, which had created a great deal of interest among his constituents. The men at the factory had for a long time been working short time, and they were put on short hours on the understanding that certain of their fellow-workmen should not be dismissed. Of course, that was only intended to be a temporary arrangement. The men had willingly worked shorter hours in order that others might not lose their employment; but 18 months had elapsed since the arrangement was made, and he thought the time had arrived when some announcement of increased work for the factory should be made by the Government. Surely the men would not have been put on short time unless there was a likelihood of an increase of work for the factory. Another question he had to allude to was the recent issue of an order which prevented the employés making known their grievances otherwise than through their superior officers. The men felt this restriction to be unnecessarily severe, as it prevented them communicating with either their superior officers or others who interested themselves in their welfare. Personally, he felt certain that the recent order had been misrepresented. However that might be, men in private employ had a perfect right to meet and discuss their grievances, and he thought the Government did not desire to place itself in a higher or better position than such employers. He wished also to touch upon a matter connected with the neighbouring factory of Waltham. He had received an immense number of letters as to the inadequacy of the payment made to the widows and other relatives of the men killed in the explosions which had unfortunately occurred there, and he hoped that something would be done by the War Office to help these poor people. There was a Treasury Warrant laying down the exact terms upon which payments were to be made to these people, but it was within the power of the War Office itself to recommend the Treasury to increase the allowances. He was aware that to make an appeal to the Treasury for money was like attempting to draw blood from a stone, but he did hope that the War Office would act as he had suggested in view of the unfairness which these sufferers had had dealt out to them.

THE CHAIRMAN: This question should be discussed on Vote 16.

CAPTAIN BOWLES said, he, of course, bowed to the Chairman's ruling. He had mentioned the matter under the impression that, as the Vote for the Small Arms Factories was taken without any discussion, the subject could be dealt with on the present Vote. One other point on which he had to ask for information was as to why Colonel M'Clintock, the superintendent of the factory, had retired from his post. It might be said that it was a voluntary act on his part, but the feeling in the locality was that the resignation had been sent in under the pressure of the Government. He next came to the Report of the Comptroller and Auditor General, several items in which had proved very puzzling to the public. It set forth it was anticipated that the stock-taking made on the 31st March, 1892, would have produced a satisfactory starting point for future transactions at the Royal Gun Factory at Woolwich, but it had since been found that in the case of the finished articles issued during 1892-93 numerous discrepancies had been discovered, and investigation had failed to show how the discrepancies in stock had arisen. In order to balance the account an addition had been made to the number of articles, while the total cost of production remained unchanged, and thus the average price had been reduced. Further than that, the effect had been that while for articles supplied in one year to one portion of the Service a certain price was paid, a higher price had to be paid for similar articles supplied in another year to another portion of the Service. There had been a keen controversy between Enfield and Birmingham as to the price at which rifles could be manufactured, and it had been asserted that rifles returned as manufactured at Birmingham were not made there, and this led to inquiry. The Report of the Comptroller and Auditor General pointed out that the year's production voucher under the head of "Iron Projectiles" gave a value of £56,198 odd, and under the head "Steel Projectiles" £99,705, or a total of £155,903. But if £14,851 were transferred from the sum for iron projectiles to that for steel it was obvious that the transfer would tend to cheapen the cost of the steel articles at the expense of those made of iron. Some such transaction, he believed, had taken place, and he hoped the Financial Secretary to the War Office would be able to give a satisfactory explanation. Was it the fact that the articles made at Woolwich cost more than they ought to, and that the transference was arranged in order to make it appear to the general public that they were produced at the same or lower rates than they would be by private manufacturers? These were questions of vital interest to the Ordnance Factories, and on all the points he had raised he hoped he would get satisfactory explanations. At the present time there was an immense amount of machinery lying idle at Enfield, and that being so he did not think the work turned out at the factory ought to be surcharged with a capital sum in respect of the idle machinery, as such a process unduly swelled the price of the rifles manufactured. It was only natural he should wish to see the rifles made by his constituents proved to be the cheapest possible in point of cost of manufacture as compared with the produce of other factories, and though he did not wish to unduly press the matter of the divergence of price, he did think that if comparisons of costs were to continue to be made public, Enfield should have every advantage allowable with fairness and justice.

MR. WOODALL said, he thought that the hon. and gallant Member would admit that the men employed at Enfield had been treated with a very large amount of consideration during the past year or so. The Government had been compelled to choose between diminishing the number of men employed there or reducing the hours all round, and, in adopting the latter course, the Government were following a strongly expressed desire by the workpeople themselves. Lately, when confronted with a similar question, the Government had thought it desirable to avoid taking on a larger number of men, desiring to avoid discharges hereafter. There had been some most exaggerated statements current as to the diminution of work, arising no doubt from the fact that the Government came to the conclusion not to go on manufacturing a weapon in excess of their requirements. When the time came for the distribution of work to the different factories, a difficulty arose with regard to a particular pattern, and that led to some diminution of the work, but the men had nevertheless been kept on. They had, however, now turned the corner. The new patterns had been approved, and the new carbine was in course of manufacture. He hoped, therefore, that in the course of a week or a fortnight they would be able to put on full time all the men at present employed at Enfield. As to another point alluded to by the hon. Member, there was not the smallest desire on the part of those charged with the administration to interfere with the fullest opportunities the men might choose to exercise in discussing their personal grievances. The authorities did, however, object to the men taking part in public meetings called to discuss the policy of the War Office or the distribution of work in the different factories. The Committee would, he thought, recognise the difference between the two. The War Office were charged with the expenditure of money voted by Parliament, and it was their duty to see that it was distributed as fairly as possible. They had, he maintained, been actuated, in dealing with all the matters which had been alluded to by the hon. and gallant Member, by regard to the best interests of the Service of the State. He must sympathise with his hon. and gallant Friend in the excursion he had made into the Report of the Comptroller and Auditor General. But he might point out that whenever any point was raised either by a Member of the Public Accounts Committee or by the Comptroller and Auditor General the individual officer charged with the responsibility for the particular factory involved was subjected to a searching examination, and he thought these matters might safely be left to the Committee. But he did wish to protest against the assumption which seemed to underlie the remarks of the hon. Member that the figures of cost had not been fairly stated. This was a very old controversy between Sparkbrook and Enfield, but he would point out that the difference between the two was comparatively small, and was dependent upon the proportion which the output bore to the full capacity of the factories respectively.

*MR. BARROW (Southwark, Bermondsey) said, he had to call attention to a matter which seriously affected his constituency. About seven years ago an Army contracting firm carrying on business at Bermondsey was, in consequence of the action of the House, struck off the list of contractors. He was not going to speak lightly of the offence with which they were charged, but he did think it was made to appear a great deal worse than the merits really demanded, and he was sorry there were no experts in the House at the time, so that the question might have been properly dealt with. Concerned as he was in a kindred trade to that carried on by the firm in question he was bound to say he had no doubt that Messrs. Ross and Company had been very hardly dealt with. For every crime there should be a punishment; but surely there ought to be some limit to the punishment, even for the offence of submitting to the Government goods which were inferior to sample. The samples on which the firm tendered were in themselves extremely faulty. In further excuse for the firm he would like to say that at the time this trouble arose the head of the firm was a young man recently home from College and without any practical experience in the trade. One of the principal partners took the matter so much to heart—for the firm had always borne a very high reputation in the trade—that he died soon after, and another partner retired from the firm. The complaint made was that the hides supplied by Messrs. Ross and Company contained an undue proportion of glucose. But he did not think the firm were alone in the use of glucose for leather-dressing at that time, although its use had since been discarded. But all this happened seven years ago ; the firm had ever since been kept off the contractors' list, and the punishment had, of course, been extended to a great many innocent families in Bermondsey. Certainly the firm had not lost all its trade, because it supplied a specialty which the Government could not do without, but the authorities declined to recognise Messrs. Ross and Company, who consequently lost part of their fairly earned profits, and were at the same time deprived of all credit for the goods which they did supply. Did not the right hon. Gentleman think that the firm had, under the circumstances, been sufficiently punished? The trade of Bermondsey had long been languishing. Could not the work now again be given to Messrs. Ross and Company? The decision of the authorities in 1888 was that they should not be invited to tender "until further notice." He submitted that justice had now been satisfied, and that the period "until further notice" had fully matured. The firm had suffered a sufficient penalty, and he made a personal appeal to the Secretary of State for War to reinstate them in the list of contractors, and thus confer a benefit on numbers of poor workpeople in Bermondsey who had been innocent sufferers.

SIR PHILIP MANFIELD (Northampton) said, he should like to support the appeal of his hon. Friend. He had, he said, dealt with the firm in question for a great number of years, and knew them to be an honourable firm, saving only the instance for which they should now be taken to have purged their offence. He could never understand how a firm so straightforward in its dealings could have been led into such an offence as it evidently was led into. It had suffered very severely in its reputation in consequence, and many of their workpeople had been thrown out of employment. He hoped the Committee and the Government would consider that the time had now arrived when the firm should be restored to the list.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.) said, that as he was one of the Members who drew attention to the quality of the leather supplied for cavalry saddles, and as he went down and saw the manner in which the article was produced, he hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would not accede to the appeal of the two hon. Members who had last spoken. A repetition of the perished leather, which was doctored with glucose, was not wanted. As to the appeal made on behalf of the workpeople of Bermondsey, he might point out that when work was displaced it went elsewhere. In this instance it went from Bermondsey to Walsall, where it was satisfactorily turned out. Neither the Government nor the late Mr. Stanhope were to blame for the loss inflicted on the workpeople ; the fault was that of the firm, which sought to palm off on the authorities indifferent goods.

MR. HANBURY said, he also hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would not yield to the appeal. The firm lost its position not for a single, but for a long series of offences—of the very worst character that could have been committed by a contractor. He was sorry for the workpeople of Bermondsey, but there was no justification for depriving the people of Walsall of the work which had been transferred to them. If the work was being well done at Walsall it was monstrous that it should be taken away from them merely because the hon. Member opposite, who had a political connection with the locality, chose to make an appeal to the right hon. Gentleman in their favour from political motives.

*MR. BARROW (Southwark, Bermondsey) said, he thought that very unfair, and he was sure it arose from ignorance. He was sure the hon. Member for Preston did not wish to administer a personal affront, but, as a matter of fact, the only Member of this firm, Mr. Tomlin, was the Chairman of the Tory Association of Bermondsey, and therefore he could not be charged with having been influenced by political motives in bringing forward this matter. Mr. Tomlin was a man who stood extremely high in Bermondsey, both socially and commercially, notwithstanding the judgment passed on him by a Committee some seven years ago. He hoped the hon. Member would withdraw his accusation, seeing that Mr. Tomlin was his (Mr. Barrow's) most powerful antagonist.

MR. HANBURY said, that he had not meant his words to be taken in the sense in which the hon. Member had taken them. He was protesting against a Member using his political influence as a Member of the House.

MR. BARROW : Do not you ?

MR. HANBURY thought his complaint was a perfectly fair one. He did not think supporters of the Government should urge forward the interests of their own constituents in this way.

MR. BARROW : Who else is to represent them ? Who represents Preston ?

MR. HANBURY said, it was all very well for the hon. Member to say that Mr. Tomlin was Chairman of the Conservative Association in Bermondsey. He (Mr. Hanbury) also had been fortunate enough to get the support of the Chairman of the Radical Party in Preston, and no doubt gentlemen were often appreciated by their opponents, and sometimes got their votes. He objected to any hon. Member using his political influence in that House to bring pressure upon a particular Department. The hon. Member had pleaded that Mr. Tomlin was a young man when the difficulty occurred. That might be a good argument, but the hon. Member had gone on to say that the firm had for many years been deliberately evading the decision of the War Office by supplying goods to the Department through another firm.

MR. BARROW : No, no.

MR. HANBURY : Yes. The hon. Member said they had deprived Messrs. Ross—as he (Mr. Hanbury) used to call them—of half their profits, because they now had to send in their goods through another firm.

MR. BARROW : Not surreptitiously.

MR. HANBURY : Then the hon. Member meant to say that the War Office knew that they were receiving goods from Messrs. Ross through another firm. It came to this : that in spite of the ban put upon their goods the War Office, with their eyes open, allowed Messrs. Ross to supply articles through another firm. He could not believe it. It should be remembered that this firm had been punished deliberately, after careful inquiry in the House, and after an investigation had been made at Woolwich by the Judge Advocate General. The case against the firm was proved by men whom he had reason to believe had been very badly treated by the Military Authorities—by two faithful workmen who had discharged their duty loyally in opposition to their superiors. The firm had been detected in supplying goods made of bad leather to the War Office, and it should be remembered that the life of a soldier might depend upon the soundness of the articles which were served out to him. The life of the Prince Imperial was lost owing to the giving way of a bad stirrup. There had been men from Messrs. Ross's factory acting as Army Inspectors and passing the bad leather into the Service, and the fact was detected by faithful and patriotic workmen who had to fight their battle, not only against the War Office, but against the heads of Departments who tried to stifle their complaints. When it had been found possible for once in a way to detect a fraudulent contractor whose bad work might have led to the loss of hundreds or thousands of lives, were, they, forsooth, to throw away the advantage of being able to hold up this firm before the country, and indirectly to say to any contractor who liked to repeat such conduct :—" You have only got to be struck off the list for five or six years, and then a grateful country will condone the offence because that offence was detected before any damage was done" ? He was sure that the right hon. Gentleman had too great a regard for the safety of the men and too much respect for the honour of the Public Service to accede to such a proposal.

Mr. Hanbury

MR. CLOUGH (Portsmouth) said, the hon. Member for Preston had raised a very serious question—namely, that there were in the employ of the War Office men who passed material which was unfit for the Public Service. As a practical man of business he (Mr. Clough) put it to the Secretary for War that if this were so the fault was the fault of the War Office, inasmuch as the men employed in the War Office ought to have rejected the material which was not of proper quality. If the Government had not men in their service who could say whether the goods supplied were not of proper quality he did not see why the contractors should be particularly punished. The firm referred to sent home goods that were not suitable, but the goods were not refused. He wished to know was there to be no forgiveness for a firm who had supplied goods that had not been rejected by the War Office officials? If so, and such a system were to be carried out throughout the whole of the business world, life would become impossible. Under these circumstances, he joined in the appeal made by his hon. Friend the Member for Bermondsey (Mr. Barrow)—namely, that this firm might be restored to the list. It was the fault of the War Office if goods which were not suitable were passed, and this firm ought to have the opportunity of being again put on the list of tendering firms.

*MR. BRODRICK said, he could not allow the speech which had just been made to pass without protest. He thought the hon. Member could not be himself aware of the nature of the argument he had brought before the Committee, which was really that a contractor was justified in sending in any quantity of goods of bad quality.

MR. CLOUGH: I never said so. I said if a contractor does send in unsuitable goods it is the business of the Department to reject them.

*MR. BRODRICK said, that meant that the contractor was justified in sending in unsuitable goods, and that the onus lay on the Department of discovering those of bad quality. The hon. Member's suggestion was that the War Department was bound to keep so complete a check upon the goods supplied that if inferior goods were passed the War Office, and not the contractor, was to be regarded as primarily in fault. He did not think the hon. Member was a Member of the House at the time when this firm was struck off the list, or that he had read the observations of the Judge Advocate General on the case. Messrs. Ross were by far the largest contractors to the Army, and sent in more goods than all the other contractors put together. During the five years preceding the Judge Advocate General's statement they sent in 1,687,000 different articles, and the rejections amounted to nearly 9 per cent. of the whole of these articles. Yet after those rejections had taken place the gravest scandals had occurred with reference to some of the articles that had not been rejected.

MR. BARROW, interrupting, pointed out that at the present time there was a larger percentage of rejections on boots than the 9 per cent. mentioned by the hon. Gentleman.

MR. BRODRICK said, his point was that while the primary rejections amounted to 9 per cent., grave scandals occurred with reference to the articles that had been accepted. If business were to be carried on in the way advocated by the hon. Member it would be absolutely impossible to pursue the system of contracting without enormously increasing the cost for inspection. The Judge Advocate General made an impartial Report on this case. The late Government who dealt with the question was not the Government, as it happened, under whom the articles had been supplied, and, therefore, they came to the question with their minds absolutely free and unprejudiced. The hon. Member for Bermondsey did not put the question on a fair basis. The hon. Member had said that Mr. Tomlin did not know the amount of glucose that had been used. That, however, was not the only question. The Judge Advocate General reported with regard to pack-saddles that the complaint that their hardness had caused sore backs to the horses was made out, and he also reported that the saddles were filled with defective hair, which had been put in by Messrs. Ross's workmen. On the question of harness, the evidence of experts was that the goods supplied by Messrs. Ross and Co. were inferior both with regard to the leather outside and to the lining inside. The Judge Advocate General stated that he had several of the articles cut open for his personal inspection, and he saw in every case that the lining of those articles was inferior to that of the sealed sample. According to the hon. Member's contention, every article ought to have been cut open before it was passed by the War Office.

MR. CLOUGH said, his contention was that if the War Office were manned by proper and competent persons the goods referred to would never have entered the Department at all. At Pimlico a length of cloth was submitted to a specific test as to length, and to a chemical test as to colour, and if it did not stand the tests it was rejected.

*MR. BRODRICK said, he did not think the hon. Member had improved his case, or that he had acquainted himself with the history of Messrs. Ross's proceedings. He (Mr. Brodrick) had no animus against Messrs. Ross. His only desire was that justice should be done. Messrs. Ross were struck off the list not on the initiative of Her Majesty's Government, but because there was a feeling in the House of Commons that there had been a general demoralisation of the trade, and that in that demoralisation Messrs. Ross, who supplied more articles than all the other firms put together, and whose supplies had been over and over again found wanting, must be held to have taken a leading part. It was among their articles that there had been the largest number of rejections, and yet it was among their articles after they were passed that the largest number were found to be defective. The late Government could never by any possibility have obtained a majority in the House of Commons upon this question if they had not struck Messrs. Ross off the list. That step was thus forced upon them by the House of Commons and by public opinion, and it was entirely in accordance with their own views. The evils of the contract system were at times extremely great, and the provision of some better system exercised the minds of the War Office for several years. It had been suggested that Messrs. Ross had received a certain amount of employment by a back door. He believed that Messrs. Ross had supplied a certain amount of buff leather, which could be obtained from very few firms, to those who had contracts with the War Office. But as far as he knew, however, from the time the firm was struck off up to 1892 no single article of Messrs. Ross's manufacture was brought into the War Office. Of course, the Government were not responsible for where the Volunteers obtained their supplies. For all he knew, Messrs. Ross might have received employment from them; and it was possible that the cessation of the Volunteer orders, now that the fund voted by the House for the equipment of the Volunteers was exhausted, might be the reason of the distress referred to by the hon. Member for Bermondsey. It was, of course, for the present Secretary of State to decide whether the punishment Messrs. Ross had received was or was not sufficient. The late Government had felt that they would not be justified in putting them on the list again, but that it was better to build up a fresh system of contracting, so that there would be plenty of firms to fall back upon if an emergency occurred, and if the Secretary of State went back upon that decision he must necessarily accept the responsibility.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : I regret that, with the responsibility I have in this matter, it is impossible for me to adopt the view of my hon. Friends behind me. I cannot rise to the heroic height of the hon. Member for Preston, who rebuked the hon. Member for Bermondsey for bringing the matter forward because he was Member for Bermondsey; and yet, in a sentence immediately before, he had appealed to the Members for Walsall and Lichfield, asking whether they would not have something to say; and I am very much mistaken if the hon. Member himself, although he is Member for Preston, has not a close connection with the County of Stafford. Everyone of us may have little local sympathies or prepossessions and predilections, and my hon. Friend the Member for Bermondsey and others are not more open to rebuke on that ground than anyone else. Who was the last speaker before the subject was entered upon? It was the Member for Enfield, who discoursed on the various grievances of his constituents in the Enfield factory. That, of course, is a small matter, and I am not going to enter in any degree into the late quarrel between the War Office on the one hand and the Messrs. Ross and Co. on the other. I think it is quite possible that an ordinary contractor dealing with a commercial firm might consider that they had purged their offence by being kept off the list for seven years. Many excuses might be made for Messrs. Ross, and, if the matter were to be dealt with on ordinary commercial principles, it is quite natural for my hon. Friend to urge that the time has come when Messrs. Ross could be reinstated. But those who have to find supplies for the Government cannot deal with contractors on ordinary commercial principles; we have something more to consider. We have, in the first place, to consider the vital importance of obtaining sound articles of equipment, on which there might depend the success of military operations and the lives of our soldiers. It is not a question of receiving goods by contract for the purpose of resale and the making of profit; but it is a question in which the lives of men are concerned. When we find before us a flagrant case of the supply of inferior articles, however hard it may be upon the contractors—and, I believe it was done at a time when there was no very efficient control on the part of the Department—still we cannot regard that, but must act with a sense of the responsibility resting upon us. We have to remember that our responsibility is the greater because in a Government Department there is not the same constant personal stimulus and inducement to careful administration that there is where a man's own pocket is concerned. Therefore, in any Department, when we find a case like this occurring, we cannot afford to be so merciful as a person in private trade might be. We have also other contractors to consider, and we must not take any step which would tend to encourage laxity, either on their part or on that of our own officials. On these grounds, after giving the matter the fullest consideration, I cannot see my way to reinstate Messrs. Ross and Co. I am sorry for them, because I think there is much to be said in extenuation of their offence. I am very sorry for the people of Bermondsey, who may lose the labour that kept them in comfort owing to this action, not of ourselves but of Messrs. Ross and Company, but I cannot see my way to relieve them, much as I should wish to do so, at the cost of what I believe to be absolutely necessary for the security and the efficiency of the Public Service.

MAJOR DARWIN (Staffordshire, Lichfield) said, that as his name had been mentioned by the hon. Member for Preston in connection with the subject of the local placing of contracts, he would say one or two words with regard to it. It seemed to him perfectly legitimate and right that every Member should be allowed to see that his constituency got fair play in the distribution of the orders of the War Office, or any other Department. It was probably from that point of view that the Member for Preston mentioned his name in connection with this subject, but nobody, he was sure, desired to push anything of this sort further than was necessary to get fair play. With regard to the manner in which contracts were carried out, he quite agreed with the War Secretary that this was a question on which the lives of soldiers might depend. If contractors supplied bad material, it was hard to follow up all the disasters which might result from such a course. He must, whilst on this point, repudiate the doctrine that any laxity on the part of the War Office in regard to inspection could in any way palliate the breaches of a contractor. It seemed to him that if they once admitted that idea the consequences would be disastrous. The inspection of warlike stores was always extremely difficult. They must always trust to the honour of contractors to a considerable extent in respect to medical stores. For example, it was impossible to get proper inspection. He submitted, that when once they found that a contractor had supplied bad material they should strike his name off the list and keep it off—

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; Committee counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MAJOR DARWIN (resuming) said, there was in connection with this Vote a matter to which he wished specially to draw attention. He alluded to the supplying of boxes for the use of the soldiers to keep their little valuables and private property in. The soldiers in India, who had had their boxes supplied to them, found that they were extremely useful, and they missed them very much when they came back to England. He was sure that the Secretary of State for War, who was always anxious to look after the personal comfort of the soldier, would keep this subject before him. It was extremely important that they should look after these matters especially in the interests of recruiting. Regard for the comfort of the soldier in the barrack room was a point which affected recruiting more than any other. Only by attending to these details could they ensure that men would be attracted to the ranks of the Army. Boxes had been partially issued in the country, but he was informed that none whatever had been issued in the Western, the North-Western, and the Thames districts. He pressed this matter on the attention of the Secretary of State.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, that provision was made this year for a further supply of soldiers' boxes. The total number required would be 145,000, and up to the year 1893-94, about 40,000 had been supplied, and in 1894-95 20,000 more would be issued, and they hoped to complete the issue at an early date.

COLONEL NOLAN said, he should like to know from the right hon. Gentleman how many rifles and carbines were being manufactured this year? The Secretary for War had objected to state how many rifles were in the United Kingdom. But surely that could not be information of a very valuable or of a confidential character. He was not much enamoured of carbines, seeing that the new rifle was very short, but he should like to know if the carbines were going to be constructed in such a way that they would carry exactly the same ammunition as the Infantry rifle? This was an important matter. The other day it was stated that there was an abundance of small arms ammunition. It would be interesting to know what was the amount at present in store, what was the manufacturing capacity of the country to make that ammunition, and how much was to be made in the next year. He should also like to know how many Martini-Henry rifles they possessed capable of being changed into the Lee-Metford rifle? for they were told this was to be done. He would like to have an estimate as to how many hundred thousands it was thought would be changed in the next 12 months. He inquired whether the Government were still manufacturing black powder cartridges or were entirely manufacturing cordite? At what rate, he asked, did the present smokeless powder wear out the barrels of the rifles? He did not think much of a weapon the barrel of which was worn out after 2,000 rounds. That was a very short life for a rifle. Another point he should like to have information upon was as to how many breechloading field guns of the new pattern they had now.

Major Darwin

But the present pattern of field gun seemed to be a very good pattern, and he would like to know exactly how many of the guns there were in the hands of the Royal Artillery. Two years ago he was the only Member who stood up in the House against the proposed abolition of the Volunteer Field Artillery, because, it was said, the Volunteers could not work field artillery; but he was glad that the Volunteer batteries had since been re-established, and he would like to know how many guns the Volunteer Artillery had got?

SIR R. TEMPLE said that, like his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Lichfield, he would not refer particularly to the very painful case, which the Committee had just under consideration, except to congratulate, if he might do so with all respect, the Minister for War upon the firm and unassailable attitude he had taken up in the matter. But he desired to say a few words in regard to a note in the Estimates relating to the Vote before the Committee. The note set forth the value of the stores for which they were voting the money as £4,500,000, and the Vote showed an expense of £200,000 for testing and inspecting the stores. Of that sum £145,000 were for the cost of the establishment, and £60,000 for the cost of stores which had been used in experiments. It would appear, therefore, that the country was paying a very considerable sum—fully 5 per cent. of the total value of the stores—for providing a really trustworthy inspection of the stores; but he was sure the House would not grudge even a charge of something like £250,000 sterling per annum for the assurance that the Army did get really good stores of every kind, for upon the strength and serviceability of such stores the safety of our soldiers in war might depend. He would draw attention to the fact that out of the £140,000 paid for testing the stores, not less than £110,000 went in wages. One would have thought that the inspection and testing would be carried on by officials who were comparatively well paid, and one, therefore, did not understand why such a large proportion of the sum was required for wages. There was no doubt of the extreme importance of this establishment being in every way efficient. They had had that evening a melancholy instance of the cost to the country that would result from this establishment failing in any way in efficiency. But on that point he was anxious to confirm what had been said by his hon. Friend the Member for Guildford, that however efficient this establishment might be, it was impossible—even though the cost might be four times greater than it was—to provide that the stores were really good if contractors were ever to be allowed to offend with impunity. It had been suggested that if malpractices had been proved against a particular contractor, he might be absolved from the consequences of his malfeasance if only negligence against the War Office could be proved. Surely, no fault on the part of the War Office could excuse a breach of faith on the part of a contractor. The War Office might be to blame to any extent conceivable, but that could in no way justify immoral offence of the contractor in furnishing goods below specification. There was one plea he desired to submit to the Minister for War. The valuation of stores, as doubtless the right hon. Gentleman knew, had been very defective in past years, as had been proved to a Committee upstairs of which he was a Member. A Departmental Committee had been sitting on this subject for some time, under the very able presidency of Dr. Anderson, than whom a more accomplished officer was not to be found in our scientific service. But there had been great delay in the operations of that Departmental Committee; and that delay had furnished some cause of complaint to the Committee upstairs. No doubt there were many reasons why there should be some delay; but the delay was excessive, and was the cause of embarrassment to the accounts of this Department; and the request of the Committee upstairs was that the Minister for War should assist them in securing efficiency in the valuation of stores, economy in the prices and accuracy in the accounts, by expediting the work of the Departmental Committee under Dr. Anderson.

MR. W. SIDEBOTTOM commended the action of the right hon. Gentleman the Minister for War with reference to contractors found guilty of improper conduct in deciding that those contractors should not be employed by the War Office for some time to come. A grave offence having been committed, it was only proper that grave censure and punishment should be inflicted. A system of bribery appeared to have been inaugurated in the Government Departments which had led to the scandalous affairs to which attention had been called that evening. If any business firm tried to cheat any Member of the House in his private affairs, and bribed his servants to cheat him, surely he would never employ that firm again; and he thought they should apply in public life also the maxims which guided them in private life.

*MR. LOUGH (Islington, W.) called attention to the condition of Government labour in the Woolwich factory, in which the experiment of an eight hours day had been introduced in the past year. He wished to know whether all branches of the factory were now working on the eight hours system; whether, in the matter of wages and other respects, the men had been placed at any disadvantage by the change, and he was sure that, if the Minister for War had any information as to the effect of the change on the healthy condition of the men and their home comforts, the Committee would be glad to hear it. With regard to the manufacture of cordite, he had asked the right hon. Gentleman two months ago whether he could give the House an undertaking that the manufacture of cordite would be carried out by the Government themselves in proper factories, instead of by private contractors. He was sorry to say he got a very unsatisfactory answer on that occasion. The right hon. Gentleman then said he could not undertake to keep the manufacture of cordite in the hands of the Government; that, on the contrary, the Government were determined to place all they knew about the manufacture of cordite at the disposal of private firms, and to invite contracts for its supply. The reason given for this decision, which was really contrary to all modern notions, was that nearly 40 years ago, or about the time of the Crimean War, an understanding was come to that not more than half of any particular warlike stores should be manufactured in the Government workshops, and that the other half should go to private firms. He would ask the Minister for War to consider whether the time had not come for doing something towards modifying the action of his Department in this matter. The main reason which induced the Government to put contracts into private hands was that, previous to the time he had mentioned, private contractors used to supply almost everything to the nation, and that those firms had engaged large staffs and laid down machinery which would be perfectly useless to them if the Government undertook the entire manufacture of the articles themselves. But that reason did not apply in the present instance at all. No machinery had been put down by any private firm for the manufacture of cordite, and a perfectly free hand was left to the Government to take the action which he suggested. Great changes had taken place during the last 40 years. One was that the Government factories had been changed from the unbusinesslike institutions which they were then into real business establishments capable of competing with any private firm; and he heartily joined in the commendations of the excellent improvements which had been effected in the Woolwich factory under Dr. Anderson. This change had been brought about by the late Government, so that it was not a Party matter at all. Every section of the country rejoiced that they had got such an excellent factory and one under such good management. The Government had got a factory at which the work could, perhaps, be done better than it could by any private firm. He should like to know what the Government proposed to give for cordite. There was a general belief that they proposed to pay nearly twice as much as they could manufacture it for themselves, and if that were the case it would be a waste of money. Some information should be afforded the Committee as to the relative cost of manufacture in private hands and in Government factories. If the Government undertook this on their own account it would promote the good work to which they were already committed of trying to improve the conditions of labour in Government workshops. Whenever contracts for Government work were given out to private firms, it was difficult to prevent sweating, whereas the treatment of the men in Government factories came under the cognizance of the House of Commons. He wished they had more complete details as to the wages paid than were obtainable under the present system; but, at any rate, Members could see that men were treated properly in Government factories, and that sweating was repressed. When contracts were placed in private hands it led to great fluctuations of labour, and nothing caused more distress than fluctuations of work from one part of the country to another on short notice. If work went to a private firm for the manufacture of cordite, say in Leeds, or Birmingham, or Newcastle, 500 or 600 hands might be put on. Many of these people would come from a distance; they would all require houses, which would have to be rented, and some newly-built. In a year or two the Government would apply for new contracts, the orders would fall into different hands, and desolation would come upon the little village that had been formed, and 500 or 600 people would have to travel from one end of the country to the other. He would suggest that these fluctuations would be best avoided by manufacturing all the cordite required at Government factories. Besides the manufactory at Waltham Abbey, another at Pitsea, which had water communication with Waltham Abbey—might be established. Two or three factories might be set going, so as to be prepared for accidents such as those which had occurred at Waltham Abbey recently. Was it too late to prevent the issue of these contracts for the manufacture of cordite? If so, would the right hon. Gentleman give them information of the price he was going to pay, and inform them from time to time of what was being done?

*MR. WOODALL said, he was glad to avail himself of the opportunity of saying a few words, though he was not able as yet to speak with confidence as to the result of the experiments made in regard to the hours of labour for workmen. The country had been assured by the Secretary for War that the decision to adopt an eight hours working day had only been arrived at after very careful investigation, not merely at Government factories, but also at those private works throughout the country at which the experiment had been tried. They had not entered on this very important change without considerable anxiety and a full sense of responsibility, and he was happy to inform the House that as far as they had gone the experiment had more than justified expectations. The breakfast hour had been abolished, which necessitated the taking of the early meal before starting for work. They had had from time to time to make certain re-adjustments of piecework rates, but these had been rather in the direction of a reduction and never once in the direction of an increase. He found that the average wages worked out for a period before change at an average of 3ls. 5·3d., and after the change at 3ls. 8d., showing that in the shorter time and under the new Regulations the men had been able to earn a larger wage than in the longer time and under the old conditions. Returns showed that, by working under more favourable conditions, workmen were able to do more than recoup any loss to which they might have been exposed by the shortening of the hours. It was found that the piecework men set the pace of the work, and this pace had been fully maintained by the day-wage men; and the consequence was a satisfactory result all round. Although the experiment had been made chiefly in the summer months, there was every reason for believing that certain economies that had been realised would be more than maintained in the winter months. In some departments there had been difficulty in accommodating the occupation of men to a statutory eight hours; in such cases as attending to the railway accommodation and waiting for the casting furnaces the service was not continuous work; but, with these exceptions, the Director General was encouraged by the experience they had had to make a regular 48 hour week either by shortening the hours on six days a week or by suspending work on Saturdays and devoting the time saved to the necessary repairs, which could be done only when work was suspended, and which heretofore had required that the men should be employed in overtime. The variety of work in all the various diversities of our great factory system required that there should be a certain elasticity in the adoption of a principle.

In the building department, for instance, the men worked different hours in summer to those they worked in winter. He was bound to express his satisfaction with the cordial and hearty manner in which those charged with the responsibility of the experiment had co-operated in carrying it out; and they frankly stated their satisfaction with the results. The Director General, who gave his consent after careful consideration, had been cordially supported by the managers and the foremen of works; and all concurred in stating that the success of the experiment had been complete. There had been ground for hesitancy, and there were some men who were a little timid at accepting a change that would disturb the habits of a lifetime—who were doubtful of the means of conveyance to the factory, the hours of the train service, and so on. There was a little friction to be expected at first, but after that had worn off it might be taken for granted that the system would be recognised by all those brought under it as giving fairer conditions under which work could be done. A larger amount of leisure had been obtained without any sacrifice of wages or any loss of service to the State. Incidentally the women appreciated the fact that their husbands could now take breakfast with them and with the children before going to school. The outcome was one of undoubted advantage to all concerned without any additional expenditure. With reference to cordite, it was recognised, and had always been recognised by successive Governments, as important that there should be sources of supply and means of manufacture outside those under the control of the Government, so as to enable them to go through any possible ordeal. The difficulties which had presented themselves in past times had always shown how extremely important it was that they should have in different parts of the country sources of supply ready for emergencies. Therefore, private manufacturers had been encouraged to invest capital; and in certain cases plant had been put down and the machinery provided for large production. The Government had done their best to stimulate them in these enterprises. Capital had been invested and plant had been provided, and facilities for production had been secured which, in dull times like these, must have put the manufacturers in serious difficulty. But his hon. Friend had pointed out that that which might have been true of weapons and powder did not apply to the new cordite ammunition. It was quite true that up to the present the Government had depended upon its own factories, but that was because the use of cordite was experimental. They had been going through the initiative stage when it was impossible for anyone to speak with anything like confidence. They had gone on from one invention to another, and he would be a rash man who would say that cordite would not at some time be superseded. But at present, at all events, it was increasing in favour for both small arms and quick-firing guns, and the demand was growing rapidly. The power of production had been paralyzed for some time by the explosion at Waltham; but the Government had considered their responsibility for meeting future demands, and had determined to throw themselves to some extent upon private enterprise. The demand for this material would become enormous, and he could not imagine any responsible Ministry accepting the responsibility for the production of the whole supply in Government factories. They were glad to think they were able to induce private firms to come to their aid and make a sufficient quantity of cordite to satisfy the Government demand. He was not prepared to say—and he was sure he was speaking in the name of his right hon. Friend—what rules would be laid down as to the proportions of the explosive to be made in the Government and the private factories. They, at any rate, felt that it would be neither expedient nor just to limit the power of production to a Government factory. It was a curious fact which would be realised by Members of the Committee that, whereas a few years ago Government had to satisfy the House of Commons that they were doing justice to the private trade, a change had now come over public sentiment, and a tide had now set in favour of the Government establishments. He recognised in this a tribute to the fairness and wisdom with which Government factories were being administered. The Ordnance factories were now managed as nearly as possible as independent factories, and were no longer exclusively a branch of the War Office. This arrangement had been made in accordance with the recommendation of the Committee appointed by his right hon. Friend, over which Lord Morley presided and on which he (Mr. Woodall) had himself had the honour of serving. Under that system the Ordnance factories were practically managed as a commercial undertaking, producing in competition with the ordinary trade, the results of their work being submitted to an independent inspection precisely as the products of an ordinary manufacturer. They felt it would not do to carry the principle of Government factories too far, and that it was of the extremest importance, and must, in the event of any kind of emergency be even of vital importance, that they should keep alive sources of private supply. The hon. Member said that if contracts were given out they caused fluctuations in work. But that was true equally of Government factories. There was no more painful duty than that of having to effect a necessary diminution in the number of men called in upon an emergency and for whom work could no longer be provided. Men dismissed under these circumstances had to find employment in places already overcrowded. He could assure the hon. Member that the Government looked on this matter sympathetically and were not blind to the circumstances mentioned. He hoped he had succeeded in satisfying his hon. Friend.

*MR. LOUGH asked what was the difference in the cost of cordite made by private firms and that made in the Government factory?

MR. WOODALL said, he could not give that. He was willing to admit, however, that the Government would have to pay for the first contracts a higher price than the cost of their own production at the present time. A remarkable circumstance was that the cost of their production had now fallen to about one-half of what it was in the earlier years, and the prices of private firms might also be expected to fall after a few years' experience.

MR. HANBURY said, that one result of the Debate had been to draw forth two valuable speeches to which the Committee had listened—from the Secretary for War and the hon. Member who had just sat down. With regard to the first subject, the Government ought to have looked after their Inspectors better than they seemed to have done, and it was to be hoped they were now making certain that nothing of the kind of which complaint had originally been made would occur again. It should be remembered that the viewers and Inspectors who had to pass goods received from contractors into the Service were men in receipt of small wages. A great deal of responsibility attached to their position, and perhaps the Government did not pay them in proportion to the responsibility they placed on their shoulders. It was a point well worth considering whether it would not pay this country to have, not a higher class of men, but men who would be placed by the remuneration given to them even more than above suspicion, and the chance of being “got at” by a contractor. Then he heartily congratulated the Government on the introduction of the eight hours working day. The Government factories were factories into which no foreign competition entered, therefore the system could be tried a great deal more easily there than anywhere else. The Government ought to set an example to other employers of labour. He had often said the Government ought to be model employers of labour; and certainly it would be easier for a Government to retrace its steps if the experiment proved a failure than it would be for a private firm to do so. He did not think there was any chance of their having to retrace their steps, although, no doubt, the men during the first year or two of the change would make a spurt to get through their work with expedition. He was glad, however, to find that the experiment with the Government factories bore out the experiment made by the hon. Member for Salford. As he was talking about the Government being model employers of labour, he should like to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office if it was proposed that War Office factories should be submitted to Home Office or independent inspection? As he understood the hon. Member with regard to Pimlico, he was willing that it should be subjected to outside inspection; but did that apply to Woolwich and Waltham Abbey?

*MR. WOODALL: Woolwich is under such inspection and so is Pimlico. I have said nothing about Waltham Abbey; as we are not on that Vote.

MR. HANBURY: Everything manufactured at Waltham Abbey is paid for under this Vote. If there was ever an opportunity for giving an opinion on the matter now is the time.

MR. CAMPBELL-RANNERMAN: There will be other things to say about Waltham Abbey, and it will be convenient to deal with all the cases together.

MR. HANBURY said, he hoped Waltham Abbey would be put under inspection, as they had had one or two lessons there which they would not like to have repeated. He wished to ask for information with regard to the dismissal of Colonel M'Clintock from the Waltham factory—a matter about which he had put a question to the Secretary for War a few days ago. Colonel M'Clintock was in a different position to most artillery officers who were sent to Government factories. As a rule, they went back to their regiments in five years' time just when they had learnt their work at the factory. It was 20 years since Colonel M'Clintock left his regiment, and so he was well versed in manufacturing questions. He (Mr. Hanbury) had asked whether the dismissal of Colonel M'Clintock from the Waltham factory was on account of the remonstrances of that officer to the re-erection of the houses on the same sites as those which were destroyed by the explosion. The information which had reached him, and which was a matter of common rumour, was that Colonel M'Clintock was dismissed for that reason. The answer which the right hon. Gentleman had given was that Colonel M'Clintock had acquiesced in the buildings being re-erected on the same sites. It was a very serious question as to whether these buildings ought to be rebuilt. He had no hesitation in saying that Colonel M'Clintock never acquiesced in the buildings being placed on these sites. However, the buildings were being replaced in a great hurry. Colonel M'Clintock was the one person who could speak with authority as to the advisability of that step, but without consulting him the Government decided upon the re-construction of the buildings. Colonel M'Clintock refused to be responsible for the lives of the workmen, and made a communication to that effect, the result of which was that he was notified that the work must be gone on with, and that if he did not approve of it he must resign. The effect of the Government decision was that because the greatest expert who could be consulted would not acquiesce in the re-construction of these buildings he was called upon to resign his post. He altogether objected to the proposal that a larger amount of work should be given to the various Government factories on the ground that if that course were adopted a very large amount of work would have to be done in those factories at one time, while a very small amount would have to be done in them at another, and, consequently, large numbers of men who were taken on when there was a press of work would be dismissed and thrown out of employment when the amount of work to be done was reduced. In his opinion, only such an amount of work should be given to the Government factories as would enable a certain number of men to be continuously employed. The rest of the work should be given to private factories. He should like to obtain an assurance from the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War that the fact that the machinery for the manufacture of cordite had been patented by Dr. Anderson would not prevent orders for that article being given to private firms. Of course, he supposed that royalties would have to be paid to Dr. Anderson—

MR. WOODALL: No; Dr. Anderson has no personal interest in cordite machinery.

MR. HANBURY: No; but he is associated with those who have a personal interest in it.

MR. WOODALL said, the War Office found it essential that some quantity of cordite should be manufactured by private firms, and every facility was given to those private firms who tendered.

MR. HANBURY said, he should like to know definitely whether he was to understand that tenders had been sent out to and accepted by private firms?

Mr. Hanbury

*MR. WOODALL replied, that invitations to tender had been sent out, and had been responded to by several private firms.

MR. HANBURY said, he feared that the litigation which had occurred had involved the country in considerable risk, because while, on the one hand, private firms would not tender, the Government factories were, on the other, closed.

MR. WOODALL: We have got some tenders before us now, and we are going to deal with them.

MR. HANBURY said, he was afraid that, because of the pending lawsuit, the tenders needed would not be forthcoming. The manufacturers did not know but what they might be subjecting themselves to all sorts of pains and penalties. This litigation, in fact, ran the country into all manner of risk, and he did not know what we should do in case of war. This experience ought to be a warning that the manufacture of an explosive should not be given to one place alone, but ought to be shared by manufactories in Scotland and the Midlands. It was a very dangerous thing to have all your eggs in one basket.

[Mr. M'ARTHUR at this point imparted some information to Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, amid loud Ministerial cheers.]

MR. HANBURY, continuing, said, that when the right hon. Gentleman had indulged his jubilation with reference to the election intelligence which seemed to have been handed to him he would venture to ask him what guns had been tried with cordite powder. He believed it had been tested with satisfactory results in the case of small guns, but he understood that Colonel Nobel had said he had some doubt as to the use of cordite in the larger guns. He would also like to know whether any experiments had been made to ascertain the highest temperature to which cordite might be exposed. He knew that it had been sent out to India in troopships, but it would have been more satisfactory as a test had it been sent in the magazines of warships, because Dr. Anderson had suggested that the explosive would not stand the heat of the magazines, and that the magazines would have to be removed to cooler parts of the vessels. Then he was told, again, that cordite had been exposed to no higher a temperature than 80 degrees, so that perhaps the Secretary for War would let him know exactly what experiments had been made. Next, he should like to know what order had been given to Enfield as to the supply of magazine rifles to the Navy during the present year? Again, there was the question of the cost of the patent for Mr. Brennan's torpedo. It seemed to him that they had spent a very large sum of money upon Mr. Brennan and his colleagues—about £7,000 a year. Surely it was better to put down a sum once for all and to have done with it. He should much like to know whether this payment was to go on for an indefinite period, and whether it was not a part of the contract that there should be a competent person to impart the method of making the torpedo to the workmen in our factories? Yet another point to which he wished to call attention was the class of material issued to our soldiers. He had specimens which he should like to show to any hon. Gentleman interested. The sheeting served out to paupers in the workhouse was three times as good as that which the British soldier had. He thought that a soldier ought to be put upon a footing at least as good as that of the pauper. His sheeting was nothing more or less than common sacking.

*MR. BRODRICK said, that as the Secretary of State for War had been good enough to say that he would discuss the question of ammunition upon this Vote, he should like to ask for information with regard to the present reserve of ammunition in store, although he did not wish the right hon. Gentleman to give them any particulars which, in the interest of the Public Service, he did not think ought to be divulged. He would also like to hear something about the further issue of the magazine rifle. With reference to the ammunition, it had been stated on several occasions that the proper equipment of ammunition was 500 rounds for each rifle, in which case the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War ought to have in store 80,000,000 rounds of .303 bore ammunition for the rifles already issued to the Army and Army Reserve. If that reserve was not on hand, it was obviously necessary that some steps should be immediately taken in order to increase it. He did not think, from his own experience at the War Office, that a less reserve than one of 80,000,000 rounds could be considered sufficient for the full equipment of the Army, and a further provision was necessary for the Militia and Volunteers. From 1890 to 1892 the Government factories had produced as much cordite as they could, but it was anticipated that the trade would be largely employed in building up a reserve. With regard to the equipment of the Volunteers with the magazine rifle, the Committee knew that the Secretary of State for War promised them yesterday that he would make a statement upon this Vote. He desired to get from the right hon. Gentleman all the information which could be given consistently with the public interest as to the amount of ammunition in store.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, he wanted to leave over some of the questions raised, because he wished, first, to make some observations to the Committee with reference to the manufacture of cordite. The hon. Gentleman opposite had asked them whether they were willing that the Government factory at Waltham should be placed under separate inspection. Well, they had no objection whatever to that. The Committee which inquired into the explosions which took place at Waltham recommended that the factory should be placed under some system of skilled inspection, and he had a strong predisposition in favour of independent skilled inspection of these factories by Home Office Inspectors. He now came to the personal question which the hon. Member had raised—the case of Colonel M'Clintock, with which he desired to deal with every frankness. He had every sympathy with Colonel M'Clintock, whom he had not had the pleasure of meeting, but who was spoken of affectionately and appreciatively by many of those who knew him. But it was the fact that Colonel M'Clintock was in no sense an expert in the business which was conducted at Waltham Abbey. He had had a long experience of the conduct of a factory, but it was of a powder factory. Although he would not say that Colonel M'Clintock had caused any laxity of discipline at Waltham, he certainly had not raised the standard of discipline.

Hon. Members would understand that he was casting no blame upon him, and wished to cast no blame upon him. He had resigned, and he retired with respect and gratitude for his past services—with, as he believed, the respect of all connected with the Department. At the same time, to put it quite plainly and frankly, it was shown on every page of the Report that Colonel M'Clintock was not precisely the man to be at the head of the factory. The particular circumstances that led to his services being dispensed with arose out of the unfortunate explosion in the nitro-glycerine department. It was necessary to take immediate steps to set the factory going again. The Committee sitting under the presidency of Lord Sandhurst had the advice of the two experts, Colonel Majendie and Sir F. Abel, and no more able experts could be found, he supposed, if they searched the country over. Not only that, but they had also the assistance of Dr. Anderson. He was informed, it was true, that Colonel M'Clintock did acquiesce in what was proposed at a meeting which took place between Dr. Anderson and Colonel Soye. The proceedings were reduced to writing, and a précis of what was agreed upon was drawn up. It was sent to Colonel M'Clintock, who made no objection for 10 days, and then wrote that he could be no party to the reconstruction proposed. But the case was urgent. They could not wait until Colonel M'Clintock was convinced. They had the opinion of experts, and they could not take the opinion of Colonel M'Clintock before theirs. It would have been impossible to have left him to superintend the reconstruction of the works on principles he dissented from. In these circumstances, he took the responsibility of dispensing with Colonel M'Clintock's services; and that was the whole story.

MR. HANBURY said, the site had never been mentioned before this time.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, he quite agreed with that.

MR. HANBURY said, he understood that what Colonel M'Clintock objected to was the site and the placing of the buildings so close together.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, whether it was a question of the site or one of the proposed reconstruction they had the approval of the highest authorities who could be consulted, and he could not go in opposition to them. Lord Sandhurst's Committee reported that the accumulation of explosives in a dangerous form should be avoided as far as possible; and that was the principle on which they were going. It was proposed to send all the cordite to the island and to restrict within moderate limits the quantity of nitro-glycerine in any of the houses at one time; and with these precautions they were assured that they might count upon a reasonable degree of safety. That was the advice of the experts, and the course intended to be taken was founded upon their advice. But the urgency at the moment was great, and it was necessary to act without any delay. The hon. Gentleman had referred to litigation which had been going on. It was not long since that the hon. Gentleman was pointing at him (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) and asking if there was to be a compromise. The appeal was now in the Lords, but the litigation had gone in favour of the Government, and he should like to know if the hon. Gentleman would again suggest compromise. Now that the restrictions had been removed, they were proceeding with every possible urgency and speed to restore the works at Waltham so as to manufacture the material themselves. Not content with that, they had called for tenders from more than one source, so that in case of emergency they would be able to fall back on those additional sources. He did not think he need say more with regard to Colonel M'Clintock. With regard to cordite, the experiments with guns, both large and small, had been entirely satisfactory. As to the Brennan torpedo, no doubt a large sum had been paid, but Mr. Brennan and his assistants had been most usefully and strenuously employed at Chatham. He thought that what Mr. Brennan received was £3,000 and not £7,000, but, of course, there would be a reduction in the future. But whatever arrangements were arrived at he could testify to the success of the torpedo and to the ingenuity of Mr. Brennan's inventions in regard to it, having himself witnessed last autumn a most interesting series of experiments.

MR. BRODRICK: Has the secret been kept?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Yes, the secret is to be kept. He would come now to some questions asked of him by the hon. and gallant Member for Galway. The number of Lee-Metford rifles which was to be supplied this year was 56,000. The ammunition would be the same for carbines and rifles. As to the supply in store of ammunition, he thought he could not, in the interests of the Public Service, state that. He did not profess to regard it as satisfactory. There had been exceptional delay, and they were behind what he should like to see in this matter. As to converting the Martini-Henry rifle into the Lee-Metford, they proposed to turn out 27,000 this year. He had also been asked how long the new rifle would last with the smokeless powder, and he thought he might say about 15 years. It was to be remembered, when considering the question of substituting cordite for black powder, that the change required that many experimental improvements should be tried. Besides taking time, these all cost money, and it was particularly unfortunate that the change should have occurred in a year like the present, when so much was being spent on another branch of our national armament.

COLONEL LOCKWOOD said, he had listened with interest to what had been said with regard to Colonel M'Clintock, but he could not help saying that there was a very unpleasant feeling abroad that that officer had been sacrificed in the supposed interests of economy. He gathered from what had been said that the Government intended to carry on their works at Waltham Abbey much in the same way as they did before the explosions occurred, and he thought that the inhabitants of Waltham were fully justified in the representations that they had made regarding the accidents, and he hoped that the Government would consider what were the proper steps to take at once without waiting to make any further inquiries into the matter. The question of the manufactory remaining there interested his constituents in two ways. It gave work to a great many, and for that reason they did not desire that it should be moved elsewhere; but, at the same time, they considered that not sufficient precautions were taken in the manufacture of the powder. He also wished to know when the Report of Colonel Majendie would be received?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said that, considering the extreme delicacy of the inquiry, he thought they could not say that there had been any undue delay in presenting the Report. Whatever delay had occurred was due to the great pressure of work that prevented Colonel Majendie devoting the whole of his time to the inquiry. He believed, however, that the Report would be received within a few days.

COLONEL LOCKWOOD said, that without having the Report of the Committee before them he did not feel justified in discussing the decision at which the War Office had arrived. He should like to know whether it was the determination of the War Office to erect the new buildings after the style of those that were blown down, and within the same distance from the town. He also inquired whether the men that would be employed in their erection would be under the control of the contractor, or whether they would be under the guidance of the War Office direct.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN replied that the War Office would employ their own workmen.

COLONEL LOCKWOOD said, he wished to say a word about the resignation of Colonel M'Clintock. He had had always understood that Colonel M'Clintock was a very able man. He understood that Colonel M'Clintock was getting about £900 a year. His general impression of the case was that there was a difference of opinion upon this question of reconstruction, and that Colonel M'Clintock's views did not happen to be on the side of economy. There was no question that Colonel M'Clintock interfered in the interests of safety, as was stated by the hon. Member who represented the district in which Waltham Abbey was situated. Anyone acquainted with factories knew that military discipline did not apply to those cases, and it would not do to apply military discipline to factories that were supposed to be on a civil footing. Two of the three persons were the inventor of the explosive and the inventor of the machines for producing it, Dr. Anderson and Sir Frederick Abel, so that two out of the three were closely connected with the invention. Anyone could make an explosive that would not give any smoke and that could be fired out of a gun, but the great difficulty was to get an explosive that was safe. Cordite was a tolerably safe article to use, but Colonel M'Clintock was thinking of the safety of Waltham Abbey and of the workmen, and he interfered on their behalf.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : There has been no explosion of cordite at all.

COLONEL NOLAN said, that all these explosives that were used for four or five years went on safely, and then developed faults arising from impurities, because when perfectly pure they were harmless, but after a time there was a certain amount of danger; still, as they must have the explosive, they incurred the danger. There was nothing more natural than that the two inventors should consider, on the whole, that nitro-glycerine was tolerably safe, and should be rather persistent in following their own opinions for its manufacture. He (Colonel Nolan) was on Lord Morley's Committee, and he thought the right hon. Gentleman would recollect that the Committee drew a considerable distinction between Waltham Abbey and other factories, and thought that it should be placed under the control of an artillery officer. The recommendations of the Committee pointed to a difference in the position of Waltham Abbey, and all other Government establishments. It was the profession of an artillery officer to understand explosives, whereas it was not the profession of a practical engineer. No doubt an engineer when placed in contact with explosives would come to understand their nature, but he could not be such an authority as an artillery officer whose profession it was to understand them. Colonel M'Clintock wrote a letter in which he insisted upon certain precautions being taken for the sake of safety. Perhaps he was wrong, but it was not a very great fault, and to be ordered to resign or be dismissed was a very heavy punishment. The Secretary of State for War might consider Colonel M'Clintock was not particularly suited for the post and might be better fitted for some other post, but to drive him away without compensating him in some way for the loss of his office would not only be to do a pretty hard thing, but would have the effect of preventing people in future from interfering on the side of safety.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT said, he had been very disappointed that neither the Financial Secretary nor the Secretary of State for War went more fully into the question of the division of work between the Government factories and private firms. It was a matter that received great attention at the hands of the late Mr. Stanhope and the Member for Guildford (Mr. Brodrick). This Vote involved an expenditure of some two millions of money, and it was necessary they should do what they could to spend as much of that in the country as they could. The Financial Secretary told them that encouragement had been offered to private firms to lay down plant to meet the Government requirements, and five large firms in Sheffield had laid out a sum of upwards of half a million sterling in direct response to the Government invitation, therefore it had been very disappointing to them on many occasions at finding the work in the arsenals was rather increasing than diminishing. He could not help thinking that the policy which had been pursued by the War Office in developing and extending the work in the Government establishments was rather detrimental than otherwise to the Public Service; for it prevented manufacturers and capitalists from putting their money into industrial enterprises which would be useful in producing warlike stores for the country. It should be clearly laid down by the War Department what proportion of work should be done in each year by private firms and in the Government factories. In another matter, that of the quick-firing machine gun, the results of recent operations in South Africa had shown these guns would be of enormous use in future warfare. The Maxim Company had laid out a very large sum of money, he believed £1,500,000, in plant, and were making every preparation to turn out quick-firing guns, believing they would be sure of a large number of orders at the hands of the Government; but, instead of that, they found that the Government were turning out quick-firing guns on their own account in the arsenals. He was disappointed also that the Financial Secretary did not take advantage of the opportunity this Vote gave him to tell the Committee the steps which the War Office had taken to ensure that all contracts that were placed with private firms should secure that the articles made should be produced in this country. In the Return he referred to earlier in the evening of contracts with foreigners, it was true they did not see any item for shell placed with France, and he thought it would be well if the Financial Secretary could take this opportunity to tell them that the expenditure of £19,520 up to the 28th of February of last year for shell, placed with a French firm instead of an English firm, was a mistake, and that so far as the War Department was concerned it should never occur again. He would not further trespass on the attention of the Committee, but he did earnestly hope that the Financial Secretary and the Secretary of State for War would bear in mind the enormous sums which private firms expended in plant, and how very discouraging it was when the orders that came in were so few and far between. If it was considered necessary for the safety of the country to have, so to speak, auxiliary arsenals for the supply of warlike materials, then everything should not be turned out from Woolwich Arsenal, a place which might be seized by an invader, in which case the Government of the country would be in a serious position. He hoped the Committee would get a fair and clear statement upon this question; that the Financial Secretary would tell them what portion of the orders for warlike stores required by the Government would be given to private firms, and that he would take the greatest care that no zeal—laudable zeal on the part of the Arsenal officials—should allow that margin and proportion on any ground to be exceeded.

GENERAL GOLDSWORTHY (Hammersmith) said, he had paid great attention to the Debate, so far as listening to it was concerned, and, so far as he could understand, Colonel M'Clintock was dismissed because he considered the proposal to rebuild Waltham Abbey upon the same site would probably give rise to some serious accidents.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, he wished to state clearly and distinctly that Colonel M'Clintock was dismissed because he dissented from the manner in which the buildings were to be constructed, having assented to it a short time before; and the matter being urgent it was obviously undesirable the reconstruction should be placed under the control of one who had, since he assented to it, disapproved of it.

GENERAL GOLDSWORTHY said, that what Colonel M'Clintock objected to also was the site, and it was only right that an officer in his position should represent his views to a Department like the War Office. He knew that the War Office did not like that; that when an order was given it should be carried out, but he thought that an officer was justified in representing his views where the lives of others were dependent upon him; whether he originally agreed with the others or not, if upon further reflection he thought the lives of the men would be jeopardised then it was his duty to report. As to Colonel M'Clintock's employment there, that was another matter. If the Government had no confidence in him he could not blame them for not retaining him, but at the same time he ought to be properly provided for in a suitable position. He knew it was easy to get along whilst they sailed with the stream, and that they must not make any representations to their superior officers that did not fall in with their views. He hoped that the fears formed by Colonel M'Clintock would not be justified; but if they were justified a very great responsibility would rest upon the Secretary of State for War and those who were his advisers.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, he thought he ought to add to what he had already said, that whilst this action, this expression of opinion of Colonel M'Clintock was the immediate cause of his being dismissed, they had come to the conclusion that he was not a fit officer for the post, not from anything that in the least degree detracted from his merits, but that he was not the right man in the right place.

*MR. BRODRICK said, he did not rise to continue the discussion, as he thought.

it was evident that a full discussion before the Report of the inquiry was before them was hardly possible; but he would like to say that before going to Waltham Abbey the name of Colonel M'Clintock was most favourably known in connection with the manufacture of rifles and his administration of the Sparkbrook Factory, and he should be very sorry if the services of Colonel M'Clintock were lost to the Public Service. He would urge, therefore, that under the circumstances it would only be reasonable to allow the Vote to be taken so that they might proceed to the next Vote, which was the Working Vote, and which raised some important questions.

Vote agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £832,600, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for the Royal Engineer Superintending Staff, and Expenditure for Royal Engineer Works, Buildings, and Repairs, at Home and Abroad (including Purchases), which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1895."

MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.) said, he wished, in connection with this Vote, to draw attention to a matter of considerable importance to the City of Dublin. He referred to the conduct of the Secretary of State for War in acting on the advice of the staff of the Sanitary Committee in the matter of the main drainage of the City of Dublin. He (Mr. Clancy) thought that a very brief retrospect would make the matter clear to the Committee. A Bill was passed after much effort and expense on the part of the Corporation of Dublin for the execution of a much needed main drainage scheme. Part of that scheme involved carrying part of the main drainage right under the Pigeon House Fort, which was a building used as a military stores, in the occupation of the Secretary of State for War. In the Act the Secretary of State for War was empowered to put a veto upon the project in case he and his advisers came to the conclusion that carrying the drainage under the Fort would be dangerous to the health of the troops, and he understood that a statement to that effect was made by the military sanitary staff, in consequence of which the right hon. Gentleman put his veto upon the construction. He (Mr. Clancy) did not intend to-night to discuss the question as to whether the right hon. Gentleman's advisers were correct in this matter, or whether the advisers of the Corporation were in the right, but he had to point out that at all events this might be said, that though the advisers of the right hon. Gentlemen were competent gentlemen in their way, the advisers of the Corporation were equally competent and justified the Corporation in pressing this matter on the attention of the Government at every available opportunity. It seemed to him the Government had acted in this matter with very unreasonable delay. He thought the right hon. Gentleman would not need to be told that the urgency of this scheme of main drainage had long since been admitted, and that the condition of the River Liffey, as nearly everyone said, was disgraceful, and it was certainly a very curious thing that the moment an Act of Parliament was passed for carrying out a scheme of main drainage—

THE CHAIRMAN: This matter is one that should come up upon Vote 12, and not upon this Vote.

MR. CLANCY said, he understood the Vote had reference to the engineering department, and with great respect to the Chairman he thought it would be as well to have the discussion upon this Vote.

THE CHAIRMAN: There is no money taken for it under this Vote.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.), upon a point of Order, said Item A referred to the Royal Engineering staff, and this Vote was what that staff was paid out of, and surely they might move to reduce their salaries for giving the Secretary of State for War bad advice?

THE CHAIRMAN: The matter was referred to the Sanitary Committee, and on that account it should come on Vote 12.

COLONEL NOLAN: The Military Sanitary Committee are paid out of this money.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The hon. Member can bring it on upon the War Office Vote, in which the Inspector General's salary comes, or upon my salary, or on Vote 12, which includes the payments for the Army Sanitary Committee, for whose advice this matter was referred.

MR. CLANCY said, there were so many courses open to him that he thought it might be just as convenient if he took the discussion upon this Vote, which was the Vote for paying the men who actually gave the advice.

THE CHAIRMAN: I am afraid that would be out of Order.

MR. CLANCY: I understand the right hon. Gentleman will afford me an opportunity of bringing this matter forward upon the Vote for his own salary?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: On Vote 12 or Vote 13.

SIR A. ACLAND-HOOD (Somerset, Wellington) said, he wished to move the reduction of the Vote, his object being to draw attention to the question of the drainage of the new barracks—

SIR A. HAYTER (Walsall), on a point of Order, said, he wished to ask a question on Sub-head D, and if a reduction of the Vote was moved he should be shut out?

THE CHAIRMAN; That would beso.

*SIR A. HAYTER said, he wished to ask for an explanation of the increase of £2,000 for the fencing and repairs of Government grounds which were let. The cost of fencing and repairs had stood at £3,000 for many years. He had supposed the increase was owing to the large increase in the lands let by Government; but he found that, on the contrary, the income had decreased from £31,500 a year to £26,000; therefore, he should be glad if the right hon. Gentleman would explain why the expense for fencing and repairs had increased this year from £3,000 to £5,000?

SIR A. ACLAND-HOOD said, his object in moving a reduction of the Vote was to draw attention to the question of the drainage of the barracks at the Wellington Lines, Aldershot. These lines had not been repaired since he was at Aldershot, and if a private person built a house, and soon afterwards found that it required to be remodelled in consequence of the defective drainage, he would either have a legal remedy against the builder or he would take care that neither he nor his friends employed the builder again. And this was not a solitary instance of want of intelligence and want of knowledge of ordinary drainage procedure on the part of the Royal Engineers, for it frequently happened that when the Royal Engineers took to building barracks the whole thing had to be re-done. Of course, it was an economy to the Public Service to employ military labour as far as they could, but when it resulted in an expenditure of £3,000 to re-model the drainage, instead of being an economy it became expensive. Another question he wished to call attention to was in regard to the barracks in London. Only so far back as last September a serious outbreak of diphtheria at Wellington Barracks, London, resulted in the loss of many lives. The medical officers in charge of those barracks reported upon the outbreak, and the commanding officer reported upon it again and again. The correspondence went on for three or four months, the medical officers reporting over and over again that the nuisance made the barracks unfit for occupation and the commanding officer also sending in complaints. The medical officers were unanimously of opinion that the drainage in this part of the barracks required entire reconstruction. During the correspondence a distinct undertaking was given that the matter should be temporarily attended to, and that the reconstruction of this part of the drainage should be put upon the Army Estimates of 1894-5. He could not see anywhere in the Estimates that provision was made for remedying the defects. As an owner of a certain amount of cottage and house property, he knew that if he allowed a nuisance of the sort to exist he would be compelled by the Rural Sanitary Authority to put the drains in proper order. He thought the War Office should be under a similar obligation. Nothing was more important than the health of our soldiers, and in London, where the men had fewer opportunities of getting fresh air than they had elsewhere, it was essential that the sanitary condition of the barracks should be made as good as possible. If the right hon. Gentleman would take into consideration, as he would have to do if he remained in Office long, the general condition of the Wellington Barracks he would find that he had a very expensive business to deal with. Only a few years ago a serious fire was caused by the way in which the barracks were built. There was a good deal of outcry in the Press at the time, but nothing had been done to remedy the structural defects. As he thought it was really time that some alteration was made, he moved the reduction which stood in his name.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That Item N (Barracks and Rifle Ranges) be reduced by £500."—(Sir A. Acland-Hood.)

MR. CAINE (Bradford, E.) said, he had a similar complaint to that just put forward to make with regard to the Bradford Barracks. The Government appeared to be spending vast sums of money on new barracks, whilst the old barracks that were still in use were allowed to fall into a very insanitary condition. Some time ago he went round the Bradford Barracks with the authorities there, and he therefore knew what their condition was. They were intended to accommodate 240 men, but they were always in a completely congested condition when they were used for dépôt work. At the time of the coal strike upwards of 400 men were crowded into them, and even the recreation rooms were used as sleeping quarters. The worst thing at the barracks was the hospital, which was antiquated and practically useless, as it could not be warmed in winter. Certainly if a soldier got bronchitis, or anything of that kind, it would be impossible to put him into the hospital. The old workshops were used as dormitories, and there were practically no workshops or quartermaster's store-rooms. The guard-room was very unhealthy, could not be ventilated, and was never used. The offices were crowded and congested and were altogether unfit for the use of the staff. The plumbing also was all out of order, and during the hard frosts of last winter there was no supply of water for five weeks except from a stand-pipe outside. There were no stables for the officers' chargers, which had consequently to be stabled at a liveryman's in the neighbourhood. One man, who said he had had 20 years' experience of barrack life, had told him that he had never been in such bad barracks as those at Bradford. He (Mr. Caine) hoped the right hon. Gentleman would put these barracks into decent order, and so get rid of the scandal which now existed.

SIR F. FITZWYGRAM (South Hants, Fareham) said, he wanted to make an inquiry respecting the proposal to re-model the drainage of the Wellington Lines at Aldershot. He wanted to know whether the engineer had forgotten to drain the lines or whether the work was badly done? Some years ago, when he was Inspector of Cavalry, the whole of the barracks at Windsor were pulled to pieces, and yet he saw that a large sum was now needed for reconstructing the drainage. He wanted to know what possible ingenuity on the part of the engineers, who had never been very cheap in the execution of their work, could render it necessary to re-model the drainage of perfectly new barracks? There was the case of the Government House at Portsmouth, which was built about 12 years ago and occupied for a year or two by Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar. When Sir George Willis went there with a young family they all got ill, and all the drainage had to be taken up. When the Duke of Connaught went there a few years afterwards Her Majesty sent down a special expert to report on the drainage. The expert condemned the whole system, and every single item was taken to pieces again. He wanted to know what the system of the Royal Engineers could be when it should be necessary to have three different drainage systems adopted in a single house in a period of 12 years? If he got a sensible answer to that question he should be very much surprised.

SIR H. FLETCHER (Sussex, Lewes) said, he wished to join in the appeal which had been made by the hon. and gallant Member for Somerset (Sir A. Acland-Hood) with regard to the Wellington Barracks. As an old Guardsman, he knew that for some time these barracks had been in a very unsatisfactory state. The health of the Guardsmen ought to be one of the first things to be considered by the War Office authorities. Their duties confined them to London during the greater part of the year, and it was well known that, owing to the night-work they had to do in the immediate neighbourhood of St. James's Park, they suffered more from pulmonary complaints than men in any other portion of the Army. He trusted that the Secretary for War should take immediate steps to put the Wellington Barracks into a proper sanitary condition.

MR. HANBURY said, the question of the drainage of public buildings was one that did not affect the War Office only, but it affected the War Office particularly, inasmuch as the House had recently voted very large sums of money to the War Office to enable them to put the barracks into proper order. He thought the time had come when the House should be informed what use had been made of that money. Lord Wolseley the other day said that the £4,000,000 that had been spent would be a mere drop in the bucket compared with the expenditure that would be necessary if the barracks generally were to be put into anything like a sanitary condition. The question was one of the greatest importance, inasmuch as the lives of our soldiers depended upon the sanitary state of the buildings in which they lived. Up to a few years ago the state of the barracks at Malta and Cape Town was worse than anything in this country. He knew that small sums had been spent upon those barracks year after year, but he thought that there ought to be some distinct assurance from the Secretary for War that they were at last in a sanitary condition. The hon. and gallant Gentleman (Sir F. FitzWygram) had rather blamed the engineers. He (Mr. Hanbury) believed the engineers were to blame, but there were others who were also to blame. He had never yet been able to ascertain who was the particular officer who was responsible for the drainage of the barracks. There appeared to be three sets of officers who were responsible. Under one paragraph of the Regulations the principal medical officer in a district was responsible for the whole of the arrangements in his district, but every medical officer who had to deal with any barracks had to report as to their sanitary condition. There was also a special sanitary officer whose precise title he did not remember, so that there were three sets of men who were responsible. But on whose shoulders could the blame be laid for the insanitary condition of any barracks? He was not sure that the blame could be laid on the medical officers. He was told that when new barracks had to be taken over by a Board of Officers, the engineer officer, who had possibly designed the building, sat on the board, but the medical officer was not allowed to have a seat upon it, although he would have to be responsible for the sanitation of the barracks. It seemed to him that there was a strange shirking of responsibility in the matter. He was certain that, unless some definite principle was arrived at of making the right person responsible in these matters, barracks would remain in an unsanitary condition. He hoped the Secretary of State would be able to assure the Committee that that would be done.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, that the drainage works in connection with the Wellington Lines would be undertaken at once. With regard to the married quarters, the recommendations of the commanding officer in respect to them had all been carried out. As to the Government House at Portsmouth, no doubt that was a somewhat remarkable building in many respects; but he would remind the Committee that there were experiences everyone underwent in their own houses. No sooner did they get the drainage re-modelled and arranged by one high authority than another declared it must be radically altered. They were working on in these sanitary improvements as well as they could, and this year the works at several barracks, including Belfast, Canterbury, and Windsor, would be taken in hand.

*SIR F. S. POWELL (Wigan) said that, as one who had been actively engaged on the Police and Sanitary Committee, he desired to impress on the right hon. Gentleman the necessity for attending in the most careful manner to the sanitary condition of the barracks. It was not long since they had grave complaints as to the condition of the barracks in Dublin, and he did not think the discredit had been removed as it ought to have been removed. He had the honour of the acquaintance of some of the military officers at Shoeburyness, and complaints had been made to him that the condition of the barracks owing to certain works in the neighbourhood was not favourable to the distinguished corps stationed there. He was also aware that the barracks at Bradford, where he spent part of the autumn, was not what it ought to be. He, therefore, hoped the right hon. Gentleman would give the matter his most earnest attention.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN appealed to the Committee to agree to the Vote now, and he would answer anything left unattended to on the Report stage.

GENERAL GOLDSWORTHY (Hammersmith) said, there were several Members still who wished to speak on various matters connected with the Vote.

*MR. WOODALL said, that it was of the extremest importance that the Vote should be obtained that night. There would be ample opportunity for discussion on Report.

CAPTAIN NAYLOR-LEYLAND (Colchester) rose to call attention to the condition of the barracks at Colchester, about which, as the right hon. Gentleman would recollect, he had asked a considerable amount of questions.

It being Midnight, the Chairman left the Chair to make his report to the House.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

*Friday, 6th July 1894.*LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDERS (No. 12) BILL.—(No. 122.)

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

THE CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES (The Earl of MORLEY) said, before the Bill went into Committee it would be convenient if the noble Lord in charge of the Bill would give some explanation with regard to it. He had no desire to oppose the Order; but as it was of a more than usually important character, the attention of the House should be called to it. The Order transferred to the London County Council certain powers under the Local Government Board Act, 1888, now vested in the Commissioners of Police, in reference to common lodging-houses in the Metropolis.

*LORD HAWKESBURY said, the Order was made under Section 10 of the Local Government Act, 1888, at the request of Her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for the Home Department, and it transferred to the London County Council the powers, duties, and liabilities of the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis, as the Local Authority for executing within the administrative County of London the provisions of the Common Lodging Houses Acts, 1851 and 1853. The Draft Order had, in accordance with the Act, received the approval of the Commissioner of Police. The Commissioner of Police for the Metropolis was originally the local authority for the execution of the Common Lodging-Houses Acts within the whole of the Metropolitan Police District, which included many Urban and Rural Districts outside the Metropolis. The Public Health Act, 1875, constituted all Urban and Rural Sanitary Authorities throughout the country the Local Authorities for executing its provisions relating to common lodging-houses. In order to ensure uniformity of administration it had been thought advisable to make the Chief Local Authority in London—i.e., the London County Council—the authority as regarded the common lodging-houses, instead of giving those powers to the Sanitary Authorities—i.e., the Vestries and District Boards. The right of free access by the police to common lodging-houses was preserved by the proviso to Article 3 of the Order.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: The only point which it occurs to me to notice about this remarkable Provisional Order is that among the unrepealed provisions of the Common Lodging Houses Act, 1851, there are some that are very important in reference to the compulsory taking of land and the building of lodging-houses by the Local Authorities. I do not say that those powers ought not to be lodged in the London County Council; but I think it would have been better if the matter could have been dealt with in some other form, so that it might have been brought before Parliament. It is a very considerable step. I do not know whether there is any mode of sending it to a Committee of this House. I certainly should have thought it would have been more in accordance with our duty to scrutinise such a transfer of powers very carefully, even if in the end we saw no objection to its being made. I see that my observations have created an amount of disturbance among noble Lords representing Her Majesty's Government, which would signify that they are not aware of what a large piece of legislation is before the House at this moment.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY AND LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (The Earl of ROSEBURY): My Lords, I confess I have not mastered the contents of all the Local Government Provisional Orders on your Lordships' Table at this moment, and I was not aware that this poison lurked within the Bill which the noble Marquess has indicated. For my own part, though I may be prejudiced in the matter, it seems a perfectly rational provision; but, of course, if the noble Marquess wishes with regard to future possibilities to refer it to a Committee, it is not possible for the Government to refuse it.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I think, on the whole, as our attention has only just been drawn to it by the noble Lord the Chairman of Committees, it would be better for the matter to be put off for a day or two. That would seem to be reasonable.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord HERSCHELL): It will be postponed to Thursday.

Committee put off to Thursday next.

ALIENS BILL.

BILL PRESENTED.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY, in drawing the attention of the House to the existing law with respect to aliens, and presenting a Bill, said: My Lords, I rise, not as an opponent of Her Majesty's Government, but in the capacity of a private Member of this House, to propose a Bill which is to vest more power in the hands of the Government. The powers I propose in this Bill to vest in the Government are not new or unknown. They are powers that are possessed by other countries, and which it appears to me, as time goes on, the exigencies of the present circumstances almost force the Government of England to assume. Of course, I do not imagine that if the Government do not approve of this proposal, that without their approval, especially at this time of the year, such a measure as this can pass. Still, I thought it better that a proposal of this kind should be made by an independent Member, because there is always a certain invidiousness attaching to a proposal on the part of the Government to take more powers themselves. My Lords, the Bill that I have to lay before the House is, then, a Bill dealing with the existing legislation as to aliens, and its purpose is to place more power in the hands of the Government with respect to aliens. It consists of two parts. The first part deals with a question which has been a great deal discussed of recent years—namely, the dealing with destitute aliens who are proposing to land upon our shores. Very much attention was drawn to this subject some years ago, and there was some Parliamentary discussion and a Committee of the House of Commons considered the question. That Committee fully recognised the injury which a large number of destitute aliens would inflict upon society, especially upon working class society, in this country. They spoke in somewhat strong terms of the effect of the immigration of such aliens, the fact being that the aliens who stay here are necessarily the least independent, and therefore, in some points of view, the least desirable of the immigrants, the better class of them having hitherto passed over to the United States. The Committee of the House of Commons in 1889 told us that the state of the parishes in the East End indicated that there was an increase of pauperism, due to the crowding out of English labour by foreign immigrants; that they believed that this foreign immigration had a deteriorating effect upon the moral, financial, and social conditions of the people; that the Whitechapel Guardians deplored the substitution of a foreign for the English population, and said that the result of such substitution was the lowering of the general condition of the people, and the Committee concluded by advising measures of prohibition. The Committee considered what those measures should be, and came to a rather remarkable conclusion. After a number of recommendations of a more modified kind, they added at the end—

“While your Committee see great difficulties in the way of enforcing laws similar to those in the United States and certain other countries against the importation of pauper and destitute aliens, and while they are not prepared to recommend such legislation at present, they contemplate the possibility of such legislation becoming necessary in the future, in view of the crowded condition of our great towns, the extreme pressure for existence among the poorer part of the population, and the tendency of destitute foreigners to reduce still lower the social and material condition of our own poor.”

After that recommendation, perhaps I shall be asked why I have thought that it is now necessary or desirable to introduce the prohibition in which the Committee saw great difficulty. Well, since that time five years have passed, and several circumstances have occurred which lead me to think that the time which the Committee foresaw has come, and that it is desirable that the power which the United States has taken to itself in so large a measure should be assumed in some degree by the Government of the Queen. In the first place, the flow of these alien immigrants continues unchecked, or is rather increasing. I find that in the six months ending June 30, 1891, the total number of alien immigrants who were not en route for

America—that is to say, who were to stay in this country—was 15,900. I have not been able to obtain the figures for the month of June just concluded, but the numbers for the month of May give 16,000 as the total number, and if, as is generally the case, June has a full proportion in comparison with other months, there would not be less than 20,000 in the last six months. That shows that the stream is growing rather than diminishing in force. Your Lordships will, of course, naturally say that 20,000 is not a large number compared with the population of this country, and if the aliens were spread evenly among the population of this country, I should say it would be a matter hardly worth considering. But that is not the case. They are concentrated in a comparatively few parishes, and I think there can be little doubt that they increase the necessity for poor relief and lower the standard of living of the population amongst whom they settle. We have a clear and special right to object to destitute aliens being sent over to this country, because we are the only nation who by law succour those who are in a state of destitution, and we have a right to say that we will confine our succour to those of our own people who fall into destitution, and we must decline to accept the destitution manufactured in our countries and to pay our money in order to succour them. But there is not only the increase, whatever it may be—it is difficult to find out—in the actual burden of the poor rate, produced by the necessity of succouring those destitute aliens; that may be small or large, but there is a much wider effect. It is, I believe, a well-known law in political economy that the fall of prices is affected by the low price of even a very small proportion of the total quantity offered for sale, and that prices will be generally lowered by the appearance in the market of even a very small amount of the goods which are under consideration. I believe the same thing applies to labour, and the fact that these destitute aliens offer their labour for prices which are wholly inconsistent with English habits and English notions of a livelihood does tend to drag down the wages of unskilled labour in the denser parts of the population, to increase their misery, to make it more difficult for them to obtain a living, and in the long run to add to the burdens which the ratepayers have to bear. So much unwisdom has been talked about the living wage that I hardly dare to refer to the subject, and I certainly would be very far indeed from advising any interference of Parliament artificially to raise wages in order to secure a living wage. However strong our views in that matter may be, it does not interfere with our feeling that it is a matter of the profoundest importance not only to the people themselves who suffer, but to the whole community, that as far as possible all men should have a wage sufficient to maintain them in decency and health. It may not be possible—very often it will not be possible—but it must always be a supreme object of hope and desire, and we may fairly protest against any artificial action which tends to lower wages, and therefore makes a living wage more difficult to obtain. This free immigration of destitute aliens is, to my mind, an interference of that kind. We have a right to say that our system of poor rate and our social system is for ourselves and that we will not receive a destitute population which will lower the standard of our own population and increase the burden of relief we have to bear. But this has become a much more clearly imperative question since the action of the American Government has become so much more decided. This policy is quite new with the United States. It was only in 1882 that they resolved that they would not admit into their territories persons likely to become a public charge; but since that time, year after year, new Acts have been passed, each exceeding the former in stringency, and in 1893 an Act of Congress was passed which imposed the severest precautions in order to prevent breach of the previous laws of the United States against the admission of paupers and persons likely to become a public charge. Of course, I am well aware that the United States have two very separate objects in view. One object has been to keep out contract labour, but that is a subject which belongs to Protectionist policy and is not a subject we can deal with in this country. But, besides that, they have taken great pains to exclude pauper and destitute aliens, and the fact that they have done so of course makes our liability to immigration of this kind much more pressing. We are in the position of being half-way down the drain, and if the drain is stopped at the bottom we have an overflow at our point. When the drain is open it does not matter so much how much passes through; but now I am afraid that the United States refusing to receive these people will make the pressure upon our shores more heavy, and make it more necessary that we should have the requisite power in order to prevent immigration of this kind. Immigration of this kind is to a certain extent desultory in its character. There is a steady flow, which I have shown your Lordships is increasing; but besides that there are, owing to famines and social misfortunes of other kinds, sometimes sudden rushes of immigration, which strain very severely the machinery of our Poor Law, and lessen still more the chances which the unskilled population have of obtaining necessary employment. Now, the advantage of powers of the kind I propose being placed in the hands of Her Majesty's Government is not necessarily that they should often be employed—I dare say that they will be very seldom employed; but if it is known that there are the same powers here as there are in the United States, there will not be the same tendency to direct streams of destitute alien immigration from various parts of the Continent to the shores of this country. I have, therefore, proposed here several provisions with regard to certain ports to be specified by Order in Council at which Inspectors of the Board of Trade may inspect immigrant passengers and may prohibit the landing of any alien—these words are taken from the American Act—who, in his opinion, is either an idiot, insane, a pauper, a person likely to become a public charge, or a person suffering from a dangerous or infectious disease. That law is now in force in the United States, and if it is necessary in the United States, where the outlets are so great and the opportunities of employment are so large, where the effect of any particular element of a qualifying character on the population is necessarily so comparatively small, surely these laws and powers ought still more to be in the hands of the Representatives of Her Majesty's Government in this country. That is the proposal which I wish to bring under your Lordships' consideration with respect to destitute aliens; but recent events have brought before our minds another class of aliens of which this country has for a long time past been unfortunately the resort. The world has been horrified by the tragic events that have taken place, and these tragic events have been merely, as it were, the culmination of a series of attempts, sometimes successful, sometimes unsuccessful, but which never could do anything but draw down upon them the denunciation and horror of all civilised men. The worst part of it is that these enterprises, so far as we can judge, are to a great extent prepared and organised on this soil. So far as we know much of the material products by which these crimes have been effected are manufactured here. We have had indications of that again and again in the discoveries which our police have made. We know there are large clubs of persons in this country, or there have been, in which these murderous plots have been hatched and brought to completion; so that now England is to a great extent the headquarters, the base, from which the Anarchist operations are conducted, the laboratory in which all their contrivances are perfected. We alone, I believe, among the nations of Europe do not give to our Government the power of removing aliens from our shores. Every other Government possesses it. We have always shrunk from it for a reason which is highly honourable to our history—namely, that we have always loved to consider this island as the asylum of those who are defeated in political struggles; and as the vicissitudes of political supremacy followed one after another, when Republic chased out King, and King chased out Republic, this island was always open to the defeated party as a City of Refuge, where their safety could be assured, and where they could rest from their danger and their fears. But, my Lords, the course of events has caused an entire change in that idea of the right of asylum. Those who reach our island now are not the men to whom we offered asylum in old times. You may agree with such men as Garibaldi or Kossuth or any other supporters of insurrectionary movements or not, but it is an insult to them to mention their names in the same breath as the men who raise our horror to-day. It is the mere clinging to a tradition, of which the bare pretence survives, to say that because we have always granted the right of asylum to patriots and rebels, however mistaken they may have been, therefore we should continue to grant the right of asylum to those who live in a perpetual conspiracy of assassination. My Lords, I do not mean to say the danger we incur is very great.—probably it is not—and I am not speaking so much of the convenience of our own country, though that has a right to be considered. I know that in foreign countries this weapon, this power of expelling aliens, is one of the principal resources on which they depend, because, not invariably, but very frequently, it is aliens who are guilty of these crimes; it is men who are separated from their country and home; men on whom the public opinion of their fellow countrymen has ceased to work; men who have no longer to regard the good esteem of their relations and friends; men on whom no check applied by neighbours, friends, relatives, or countrymen remains. I believe, therefore, that we ought to possess this power, even for our own convenience, and that if it were not for this tradition of the right of asylum we should have possessed it long ago. But there is a much stronger reason. It is impossible, while events of this kind succeed each other, that our allies and other nations upon the Continent should not look with indignation, if not with a stronger feeling, upon a country where enterprises of this kind can be and are safely organised, and should feel, each Government for itself, with its own danger before it, that the danger of this most odious attack on civilisation that history records is exaggerated to an enormous extent by the absolute immunity which we practically offer to the contrivers of these crimes who reach this country and assemble in this city. I feel that not for our own convenience only or mainly, but as part of our duty to the commonwealth of nations to which we belong, as part of our duty to that common civilisation which is attacked altogether wherever it is attacked at all, we owe it to them that we should not be behind them in the precautions which we take against the organisation of these atrocious crimes, that we should adopt the measures of safety which have commended themselves to all other nations, and should not allow the mere survival of a feeling, however estimable and noble it was in the past, to protect these enemies of the human race, whom no one among us would wish to defend. My Lords, I propose in this Bill to revive certain powers which were conferred on Her Majesty's Government in 1848 to a limited extent—that is to say, I propose that the Secretary of State shall have the power of expelling

If the foreigner refuses to go he will be liable to certain punishment—a month's imprisonment in the first place, and a year's imprisonment in the second. But the effect to which I should look forward in the possession of such a power is a great diminution in the audacity of the criminals, whom I am afraid we still harbour among us—at all events, a great increase in the care with which they would avoid the commission of any acts or organisation of any undertaking which would make us in any degree the accomplices or privy to the crimes they are levelling against other nations. I have, as I have said, brought this Bill forward because I think it is better brought forward by an independent Member. I do not affect to believe it could be carried against the Government of the Crown. We might carry it here; we certainly should not carry it elsewhere; and, therefore, if the Government of the Crown decline to accept these powers, I am not prepared to force the powers upon them, even if I possessed the ability to do so. But it seems to me that in the presence of the terrible events of which this year and some years past have been witness, the time has come when we must not allow it to be said that we offer special facilities and practically special assistance to assassins.

Bill to give certain powers in respect to aliens—Presented (The Marquess of Salisbury).

THE EARL OF ROSEBURY: The noble Marquess has brought before your Lordships two questions of singular interest—one, perhaps, more immediately pressing in its character than the other, but both of them problems which have, at all events, engaged the attention of all thinking politicians within the last few years. With regard to what he said about the exclusion of destitute aliens, I am not prepared to offer much objection. I myself have always thought that we are hampered too much by traditional watchwords about Great Britain being the asylum open to all nations and by arguments drawn from the immigration into this country after the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes and so forth, which are not practical issues in considering the question as it is forced upon us at this time. I myself do not think that it is appealing to us in so urgent a manner as the noble Marquess seems to think, and I am rather of opinion from what he said to-night that he has introduced the subject with a view to making his Bill with respect to aliens logically complete, rather than with any idea that there is any particular urgency for it. But what I do say is this: that if all nations adopt legislation—and I believe all nations have adopted some legislation—for keeping out immigrant aliens who may become chargeable or noxious to the State which harbours them, I cannot but foresee that with measures taken against particular classes in populous countries on the Continent of Europe the issue of these circumstances altogether might be that we should become the dunghill of the world with regard to the waste population shot upon our shores. That may seem a fanciful fear, but to my mind it is not at all fanciful. We have to regard the populations which it is desired in some countries to expel, we have to consider whither it is that these populations direct themselves, and what issue they can probably find for themselves. When we consider all these points together, we cannot but come to the conclusion that there is a possible, though not, as I believe, an immediate, danger of our country being flooded with an undesirable class which it would be to the interests of all persons in the nation to exclude. To that extent I go with the noble Marquess. I do not believe the case to be urgent, but I do not believe it to be one to be disregarded. Whether in any case at this period of the Session, or in the present condition of Parliamentary business, either side of the House can hope practically to deal with so large an issue it is not for me to say, but I can assure the noble Marquess on behalf of my colleagues, and myself that we will give his propositions, when we have an opportunity of seeing them in the Bill, our most attentive consideration. My Lords, I now come to the second part, and by far the most important part, of the speech of the noble Marquess. No one can deny that every word which falls from the noble Marquess whether in or out of Office has a peculiar weight. He has occupied the highest posts under the Crown, and more especially that distinguished post which is considered by foreign countries as representing the official voice of the nation. He has also a predominance in this House which gives him an oracular force when he speaks within these walls. It was therefore with the greatest regret that I heard the line which the noble Marquess took with regard to the question of conspirators within these islands. It was with the deepest regret that I heard him lend the weight of his authority to the supposition that we are the main focus for these disastrous conspiracies abroad, and give support, which I cannot help thinking will be most deleterious in its effects, to the contention of many foreign journalists, irresponsible in themselves, and I fear animated by no good feeling towards this country, that we are the nation which has specially fostered the anarchical plots against the lives of foreign Sovereigns and statesmen. Before the noble Marquess gave the weight of his authority to such a statement he ought, I think, to have been very careful to cite the authority on which it was founded. He brought in the recent disastrous attempt which we have all so deeply mourned on the Chief of the State in France. Where was that crime planned? The noble Marquess asserts that it was planned in England.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: It is stated so.

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY: All we know is that the assassin came from Cette, where he had accomplices, and where he had spent a considerable time; but is there any evidence, except the mere gossip of the Press, that this man came from England, prepared his crime in England, or that England is in any way responsible for it? That is the question. I do not intend to enter now into the question as to whether warrants should issue enabling the Secretary of State to remove from our shores aliens reputed to be dangerous to our State or to foreign nations; but nothing more disastrous has been said in or out of Parliament, nothing more likely to complicate our foreign relations—which the noble Marquess, I have always thought, has been anxious to maintain on the most amicable footing—than the fact that the late Prime Minister and Secretary for Foreign Affairs has risen in this House and impeached his own country as a harbour of foreign assassins. I regret it—I deplore it. I hope when the Marquess comes to a fuller and a calmer consideration he will see that the language which he used covered far too large an area, and that it cannot be justified as representing to foreign States a true logical or well-founded description of our position with regard to foreign conspirators. Let the noble Marquess remember another circumstance. Why is it that many of these criminals are sometimes found on our shores? Because they are actually shipped here by the States which complain of their presence. It must have often happened to the noble Marquess, when Secretary for Foreign Affairs, as it has happened to me, to find that men expelled from the territory of a neighbouring country are brought direct by the orders of that Government to the very port of embarkation and shipped on board a vessel that is bound for the British shores. I confess that where that is so, and where these misdemeanants are thus brought to England, I do not consider that the responsibility lies with Great Britain alone. I regret the presence of such persons on our shores; I regret that some of their crimes should possibly be concerted here; but I cannot think that the country to which they are sent and which unwillingly receives them is to be considered as more responsible than the country which wishes to expel them. I hope that the noble Marquess will, on consideration, think it necessary to modify very considerably the arraignment which he has pronounced against this country. I am bound to say I think it will produce a most disastrous effect on the continent of Europe. We have—at all events, I have, and I do not doubt that my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs has also—always contended that we are not specially the harbour of these criminals. We contend that we do our best to supervise and arrest their proceedings. We contend that where we are cognisant of them—and we believe that our detectives are at least equal to those of foreign countries—we have been the means of preventing their nefarious designs coming to completion; and it is, therefore, with the most profound regret that I heard the noble Marquess adopt so different a tone and attitude. I hope that we shall be able to reassure foreign States, in spite of that potent voice and authority on the question, that we do not harbour, and that we do not largely conceal, these assassins—certainly not to a greater extent than do the other countries themselves. My Lords, with these few remarks, which have been forced from me most unwillingly by the attitude of the noble Marquess, I conclude by saying that we will receive the proposals contained in the Bill with the most anxious desire to meet them in a friendly spirit.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I do not know whether I have a right of reply, but I must point out to the noble Lord that I never said we were willing harbourers of these villains. All that I said was that the fabric of our laws is insufficient to enable us to provide that security against our unwilling reception of them, of which I know foreign nations have so often complained. The noble Lord says that sometimes they are sent over to us by foreign nations. That is perfectly true. I remember a case four years ago—and as the Foreign Minister and the Ambassador are both dead there is no indiscretion in mentioning it to the House—there was a man named Hartmann who made an attempt against the life of the Emperor of Russia. The French Government at that time did exactly what the noble Lord has said. They took Hartmann down to Boulogne and sent him over to this country. But if we had possessed the power I am now asking for we should not have allowed him to remain here; and it is precisely to prevent any such accusations as this, which the noble Lord has said that I am making, that I am asking for this additional power to be given to the British Government. I could understand the reproach of the noble Lord if I were asking for anything exceptional and unusual; but what is exceptional and unusual is that we do not possess the power; we stand alone among other nations in not possessing it. Though I quite agree with the noble Lord that Government after Government has made every effort which, in the state of our law, it could do to prevent this country from becoming a harbour of these assassins, yet, so long as the Legislature does not take the precautions which all other countries consider necessary, at all events it furnishes a plausible ground for the accusation that Great Britain is not doing its utmost to repel these assassins. I utterly repudiate the alleged arraignment which I am said to have made against my own country. I believe the utmost efforts have always been made in this country to prevent these villains from being harboured here. But I do say this—and it is why I offer this Bill—that the state of our law is defective, and that, consequently, our Governments, who, I believe, have all had the most upright and anxious intentions in this respect, have not been able to act up to those intentions, and have, most unwillingly, given a security to these assassins which I am very sorry that they should possess at the hands of any nation.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Earl of KIMBERLEY): My Lords, I am sure that we on this side of the House have been most glad to hear the explanation which the noble Marquess has now given, and we most fully and willingly accept the view which he has just presented to the House. But I cannot help saying, after the remarks of my noble Friend beside me, that the noble Marquess, unintentionally, I have no doubt, did say that the plots which have produced the late terrible results on the Continent have been mainly hatched in this country.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I do not know whether I said "mainly," but I certainly saw it stated—and I believe on good authority—that the plot was arranged here.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I do not want to press the matter further. It was that which aroused in us a feeling of deep regret. I do not know on what information the noble Marquess founds that accusation, or that it is by any means well founded. If the noble Marquess had said that the absence of any power in this country to remove persons who might be dangerous in foreign countries had given rise to the belief that plots were largely hatched here, I should have thought that was a legitimate and fair argument. But he did, unfortunately, give the weight of his great authority to the statement that these plots were largely hatched here. That is a most grave statement. I am certain—though my experience, compared with that of the noble Marquess is but small—that no one can underestimate the effect which such a statement will have throughout Europe. The explanation which the noble Marquess has now given I most entirely accept, and I trust that foreign Governments who may notice what has passed on this occasion will direct their special attention to that explanation; and that, if the noble Marquess used any words which went beyond those given in the explanation, those foreign Governments will not regard them as his deliberate opinions, but rather as observations which have slipped from him, without intending them or considering their full effect.

LARCENY ACT AMENDMENT BILL (No. 136)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord HERSCHELL), in moving the Second Reading, said: My Lords, the object of this Bill is to make a small but important change in the Criminal Law of this country. As the law now stands property may be stolen anywhere outside England and received in England with the full knowledge that it has been stolen, without the person so receiving it being amenable for any offence in this country. A person, in those circumstances, may in fact hold here the stolen property without being subject to any proceedings under the Criminal Law of England. The view taken by the Judges has been that, inasmuch as a person can only be punished here for receiving with a guilty knowledge goods which have been feloniously stolen, and inasmuch as, outside this country, there is no such thing as "felony," a person in England cannot be held to have feloniously received goods which have been feloniously stolen abroad. That is a technicality of an extreme kind, and one which I think your Lordships will agree ought not to stand in the way of justice. The proposal in this Bill, therefore, is that if goods have been stolen abroad and are brought to this country under circumstances which, if the offence were committed here, would render the receiver liable to conviction under our Criminal Law of guiltily receiving them, such person shall no longer be able to escape on the mere technicality at present existing.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Chancellor.)

LORD HALSBURY: I entirely concur in what my noble and learned Friend has said. With regard to what he has said about the interpretation of the present law by the Judges, I cannot help thinking that they are right, because the words of the Act are "where goods have been knowingly received being feloniously stolen." The Judges, therefore, could hardly have done otherwise than they have done.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord HERSCHELL): It is scarcely material to argue that now, though if the case were argued at the present day the law might receive a different interpretation, and the matter might not have been dealt with on the technicality merely, but upon the nature of the act done. However, if it is considered that the Bill is necessary, whichever interpretation is correct, that cannot oppose any impediment in its way.

QUESTIONS.

BEREHAVEN HARBOUR.

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.): On behalf of the hon. Member for Cork Co., W., I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to an obstruction to the fishing industry in Castletown Berehaven Harbour caused by an ice hulk; and whether he will have it removed?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. BRYCE, Aberdeen, S.): My attention has not been directed to the circumstance referred to by the hon. Member. The Board of Trade is not the Harbour Authority of Castletown Berehaven Harbour, and I have no power to assign positions to, or remove, different classes of craft in the harbour.

MR. SEXTON: On behalf of my hon. Friend, I beg further to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether representations have been made that the absence of a beacon on the western end of Bere Island is a source of danger and an impediment to the fishing industry; whether he is aware that on the 19th instant the steamer Isabella narrowly escaped being wrecked, owing to the absence of the said beacon; whether a receptacle for a beacon has been erected on Bere Island for several years; and whether he will cause a light to be placed on it?

MR. BRYCE: The Commissioners of Irish Lights inform me that there is a beacon on the western end of Bere Island. The original intention was to exhibit a light from this beacon tower; but before it was completed the proposal was abandoned owing to the difficulty of sailing vessels navigating the narrow Western Channel, and the present Berehaven Lighthouse was at once commenced. Applications in the interests of the fisheries have been made for the lighting of the beacon; but the Commissioners of Irish Lights have decided that they would not be justified in charging the expense to the Mercantile Marine Fund, to which fishing vessels do not contribute.

ARMY HIGHLOWS.

CAPTAIN NORTON (Newington, W.): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office for what term of years the contracts for Army highlows are put out?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. WOODALL, Hailey): The contracts for Army highlows are put out for the probable requirements of 12 months.

GENERAL POST OFFICE, DUBLIN.

MR. HAYDEN (Roscommon, S.): On behalf of the hon. Member for the Harbour Division of Dublin, I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether there are at present in the General Post Office, Dublin, several postmen who passed an examination in 1886 qualifying them both for the position of postman and sorter; whether a new examination was introduced in 1893 for the position of sorter; whether those postmen who obtained their certificates in 1886, entitling them to promotion to the office of sorter, are now precluded from that promotion until they again pass the examination prescribed by the Rule of 1893; and whether those who qualified in 1886 will be allowed the benefit of the Rule in the Service at the time they qualified, or whether it is proposed to compensate them in any way for being thus deprived of the privilege which they qualified for by their examination?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. A. MORLEY, Nottingham, E.): A question in almost identical terms was put by the hon. Member on the 1st of June last, and to the reply which I then gave there is really nothing to add.

MR. HAYDEN: On behalf of my hon. Friend, I may further ask the right hon. Gentleman whether candidates appointed to the position of sorter in the General Post Office, Dublin, are placed on the pay sheet in the order of the dates of their Civil Service certificates; and will he explain why William Emoe, who was appointed on the 18th of May, 1893, was placed on the list over several candidates who had been previously appointed?

MR. A. MORLEY: In cases where several appointments are made at the same, or about the same, time it is usual that the officers appointed should rank according to the length of their previous service, and not according to the date of their Civil Service certificates, which are often delayed by accidental circumstances. Mr. Emoe was one of a batch of 24 officers nominated at the same time, but, owing to an attack of typhoid fever, his examination (and consequently the date of his Civil Service certificate) was delayed about two months. As, however, he had been employed in an unestablished capacity longer than any one of the others he was placed on the list first.

EVICCTIONS IN SOUTH LEITRIM.

MR. TULLY (Leitrim, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that a number of evictions have been carried out within the last few years on the estate of Mr. Marsham Jones, situated at Drumreilly Lower, South Leitrim; that a number of the evicted farms lay idle until the introduction of the Evicted Tenants Bill, when in May last a man named Joe M'Cordick, from Manorhamilton district, was declared the tenant for 50 acres; that the father of M'Cordick is a public mendicant who lives by seeking alms; and that the planter himself has no means of stocking the land, and whether he will be prepared to recommend that planters of this class, who have been constituted tenants within the present year, will be excluded from compensation under the provisions of the Evicted Tenants Bill?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. J. MORLEY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne): There have been two evictions on the estate of Mr. Marsham Jones, situated at Drumreilly Lower, South Leitrim, during the past three years; these farms are still lying idle. The new tenant referred to in the question took four farms containing 37 acres, in March last, and of these four farms three had been idle since 1883, and the other since 1889. I am informed that his father is not a public mendicant, and that the new tenant has eight head of cattle on the lands.

GELDESTON CHURCH SCHOOL.

MR. HARRY FOSTER (Suffolk, Lowestoft): I beg to ask the Vice-President of the Committee of Council on Education if he is aware that the managers of the Church School at Geldeston, near Beccles, have been ordered by the Department to provide additional cloak room accommodation, in addition to other structural alterations, although the school is large enough to accommodate twice the number of scholars in attendance; will he explain why the offer of the managers to partition off one end of the room, in order to meet the requirements of the Department, has been declined, the Department insisting upon an external porch; whether he is aware that the school opens straight on to the high road, and that this is impossible, and would be in any case a considerable expense; and whether he will give instructions to accept the offer of the managers?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Mr. ACLAND, York, W.R., Rotherham): Her Majesty's Inspector reported in February, 1893, that a cloak-room was required at this school. Plans were submitted for one in the following June, which the Department's architect was unable to approve. The managers subsequently fitted up pegs and a portable stand within the school for this purpose, and were informed last month that the question may stand over until Her Majesty's Inspector has an opportunity of visiting the school and reporting on the arrangement. The other alterations required related to the sanitary condition of the offices.

DRUMHARRIFF BRIDGE.

MR. HAYDEN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (1) whether the balance due to Messrs. James Coyne and James Beirn, who, as securities for the contractor, completed the Drumharriff Bridge over the River Shannon, has yet been paid; (2) whether, on the certificate of Mr. Mulvany, county surveyor for Roscommon, who had chiefly the superintendence of the work, it was agreed to allow the securities £100 for extra work performed; (3) whether the County Roscommon Grand Jury granted a presentment for £50, one-half this amount; (4) on what ground does the Leitrim Grand Jury refuse to grant a similar presentment for its share of the amount due; and (5) whether he is aware that, irrespective of the allowance for extras, the amount of original contract held by the Leitrim Grand Jury is £89 5s., not £60, as alleged?

MR. J. MORLEY: (1 and 5) The Secretary of the County Leitrim Grand Jury reports that there is no balance due to the sureties of the contractor for the building of this bridge, but that a sum of £60, not £89 5s., is due to the contractor as part of the contract. The contractor left the country before completing his contract, and no duly-authorised representative of his having made any claim for the £60, the Grand Jury have retained the money in their hands. (2 and 3) The Secretary is not aware of any agreement such as is referred to in the second paragraph. I am informed, however, by the Secretary of the Roscommon Grand Jury that they approved of payment of a sum of £100 to the sureties for extra work provided the Leitrim Grand Jury would contribute one-half, which they declined to do, and the application was consequently "nilled" at the ensuing Assizes. (4) The Leitrim Grand Jury refuse to make any additional grant on the ground that the amount of the original contract covered all expenses connected with the erection of the bridge.

Mr. Acland

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS AND FAIR WAGES.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if, in order to make the Fair Contracts Resolution of the late Government more effectual, he will cause to be annexed to every specification for a tender for Government work a schedule setting out the rate of wages paid to the various trades to be employed in and about the execution of the contract if the work is done within the United Kingdom, and similarly if the work is done elsewhere, and the hours of labour to be observed by such workmen within the United Kingdom, and the hours they will work in foreign countries, independent of the Factory Acts and the Trades Union Regulations prevailing in Great Britain and Ireland?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. T. HIBBERT, Oldham): As my hon. Friend is aware, steps have already been taken in all Government contracts to secure compliance with the Resolution of the House of Commons. I do not consider that that Resolution authorises the issue of a hard-and-fast schedule of wages and hours, nor do I see how this could be done seeing that they vary in different localities in the country.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware of what the London County Council are doing in this matter?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: The hon. and gallant Member has been good enough to show me one of the London County Council specifications, but I do not think that that could be made applicable to the country generally. It is intended solely for the Metropolis.

ENGINE DRIVERS AT WOOLWICH ARSENAL.

MR. MACDONALD (Tower Hamlets, Bow): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War what number of hours constitutes a week's work for engine drivers and stokers employed in Woolwich Arsenal, and whether it is a fact that some of the men are working from 59 to 69 hours a week?

MR. WOODALL: Engine drivers and stokers are well aware that their hours must be in excess of those of the ordinary workmen, as their engines must be cleaned and attended to after being used. They receive a consolidated rate of wages which takes into account this extra employment. It is believed that their hours average about 60 in the week.

THE MANUFACTURE OF WARLIKE STORES.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT: I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office if the determination of the late Government to divide the manufacture of warlike stores equally between the Royal Arsenal and private firms is being adhered to; and if, having regard to the vast capital expenditure on plant in Sheffield and elsewhere, at the instigation of the War Department, and the number of men dependent for their livelihood on its full employment, he will take care that the proportion of work done at Woolwich, &c., shall never be exceeded?

MR. WOODALL: It has for many years past been the policy of successive Governments, with a view to maintaining an alternative source of supply, to place with the trade a large proportion of the orders for warlike stores. This policy was supported by the Report on the Manufacturing Departments by the Committee of 1887, over which the Earl of Morley presided, and Her Majesty's Government have no intention of departing from it. Although I cannot pledge the War Department to any exact proportion in the distribution of orders, I can say that there is no present intention of increasing the proportion placed at Woolwich.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT: Is the proportion this year 50 per cent.?

MR. WOODALL: The proportion allocated to private traders exceeds 50 per cent., and it is higher than has been the case for five or six years past.

LADY FACTORY INSPECTORS.

CAPTAIN DONELAN (Cork, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he can state the number of lady Inspectors appointed under the Factory Acts; and whether any of the Irish candidates were appointed; and, if so, how many?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr.

Asquith, Fife, E.): Four ladies have been appointed. The appointments were made on the ground of special fitness alone, and without regard to the nationality of the candidates. I believe one of the ladies appointed is of Irish birth.

CAPTAIN DONELAN: On what principle are the selections made? Do Irish candidates have any opportunity of proving their fitness?

MR. ASQUITH: The selection is made on account of fitness, and the ladies best qualified are appointed. They are selected in the same way as any other candidate.

CHINA AND JAPAN.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT (Sheffield, Ecclesall): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether China has asked the Russian Government to mediate between herself and Japan; and whether he can give the House any information as to the existing difficulties between the Chinese and Japanese Governments?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir E. GREY, Northumberland, Berwick): I cannot answer as to the communications which may have passed between two other Powers. The cause of the difficulties between the Japanese and Chinese Governments has already been fully stated in the Press; it arises from the fact that owing to disturbances in Corea both China and Japan have thought it necessary to send troops there for the protection of their respective interests.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: Is it not true that the object of Japan is to promote reforms in Corea, which shall secure the permanent peace of that country?

SIR E. GREY: That question primarily concerns the Governments of Japan and China.

THE FLESK MILLS FISHERIES.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): On behalf of the hon. Member for North Louth, I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, with reference to the fishery inquiry held at Killarney last July by Mr. Alan Hornsby and Mr. Cecil Roche: (1) whether a copy of the evidence taken thereat, specially relating to the fishery in the River Flesk and the destruction of fish at the Flesk Mills fishing weir and mill race, will be laid upon the Table of the House ; (2) could he explain exactly what the Irish Fishery Board hold to constitute a fishing weir ; (3) whether the absence of a Queen's gap justifies the Fishery Inspectors in not regarding the weir on the River Flesk, near Kilarney, as a fishing weir ; (4) whether it is because electric light works have been established that the sluices admitting water to the mills are to be kept open continuously, and not shut down on Sundays as heretofore, in violation of the law, and to the material injury of the local fishing industry ; (5) whether the wooden structure, promised to be erected last summer after the fishery inquiry, is being proceeded with, or do the Inspectors now intend to leave the weir as it is without any such erection to preserve the fish on their way to the spawning grounds ; and (6) whether any steps will be taken to re-establish a weekly close season, in connection with the milling works on this important river, as enacted in several of the Fishery Acts ; or is it the intention of the Fishery Inspectors to allow this valuable industry to be imperilled and probably destroyed, merely to save a small expense to the promoters of the electric light ?

MR. J. MORLEY : (1) The Inspectors of Fisheries inform me that at the inquiry referred to some evidence was given regarding the destruction of fish at the Flesk Mills weir and race. I shall be happy to supply a copy of the evidence to the hon. and learned Gentleman, should he so desire, though it seems hardly worth while laying it on the Table of the House. (2) The Inspectors hold a "fishing weir" to be a weir legally erected for the capture of salmon, but not a weir erected, as in the present case, for the sole purpose of supplying water to a mill. (3) The weir at the Flesk Mills cannot, in the opinion of the Inspectors, be regarded as a fishing weir under any circumstances. It was not constructed, nor could it be used, for such a purpose. (4) The reply to the fourth paragraph is in the negative. Section 63 of the 5 & 6 Vic., c. 106, provides that during the weekly close season the sluices which admit the water to the wheels of all mills shall be shut down for 24 consecutive hours, provided that the mill shall not be thereby deprived of the necessary supply of water for its efficient working. The shutting off of the water from the wheel sluices of the Flesk Mills for 24 consecutive hours would, I am informed, interfere with the working power of the machinery, but the owner allows a free passage of water through the sluice on the upstream side of the wheels for 16 consecutive hours each week. (5) The erection of the wooden structure referred to in the fifth paragraph will be at once commenced. (6) As explained in reply to the fourth paragraph, the Act of Parliament referred to provides that certain steps shall be taken every week at mills where no pass exists to provide for the passage of fish, but that these steps need not be taken if they interfere with the necessary supply of water to the mills. The miller has, therefore, a clear legal right to refuse, under certain circumstances (which exist at Flesk Mills), to shut the sluices admitting the water to the wheels, and the Inspectors have no power under any of the Fishing Acts to interfere with him. The Inspectors have already done all in their power in regard to this matter, and that is, they have made a successful appeal in a friendly spirit to the mill-owner to assist the passage of fish by the erection of the timber structure referred to.

ROYAL HOSPITAL FOR INCURABLES, DUBLIN.

MR. M. HEALY : On behalf of the hon. Member for North Louth, I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (1) whether the fact that a Government grant is made to the Royal Hospital for Incurables, Dublin, gives the Government some power to interfere when the Institution is managed in a way entirely at variance with the professions of non-sectarianism on which the grant is made ; (2) whether the annual grant from Government of £298 8s. 8d. to the Institution is made on the understanding that it is unsectarian in its character ; (3) whether he is aware that it is admitted by the secretary to be the fact that no Catholic holds any paid office in the hospital above the rank of servant, nor has held any for the last 25 years ; (4) whether the two Catholic medical men who are on the staff are unpaid, and were, moreover, not elected by the Managing Committee, whose religious intolerance is complained of, but by the direct vote of the Governors; (5) whether all the paid officials are appointed, not by the direct vote of the Governors, but by a Managing Committee of 50 members—38 Protestant and 12 Catholic—which has never, within the last 25 years, appointed any Catholic to any paid office above the rank of servant; (6) whether the Visiting Committee of the hospital consists of seven members, including always the chairman, vice chairman, treasurer, and two other Protestants, so that the Catholics upon it are always in a minority of two to five; (7) whether he is aware that Bye-law 4, under which the Managing Committee is constituted, has been so drawn that it is practically impossible for the general body of the Governors to reform, even if they would, that Committee; and (8) will the Government, in view of these facts, and especially in view of the fact that it contributes a considerable annual sum towards the maintenance of the hospital, draw the attention of the Managing Committee to the persistent exclusion of all Catholics from all the chief offices of influence, and from every paid office above the rank of servant in the Institution?

MR. J. MORLEY: The statements of fact referred to in paragraphs 3 to 7, inclusive, are, I am informed, substantially accurate. The bye-laws governing the Charity were approved of by the late Lord Chancellor Naish, himself a Roman Catholic. With regard to the remainder of the question, I would observe, in the first place, that the Royal Hospital for Incurables is a Corporation originally created by letters patent in 1799, and that as such the Governors have power to elect all necessary officers and to apportion their salaries. Government have no power to interfere in the selection or appointment of the officers of the Institution whether honorary or paid. As regards the allocation of the Parliamentary grant to the hospital, this is made in accordance with the recommendation of a Committee of the House of Commons, and although I am not aware that any sectarian consideration enters into the matter, yet, in my opinion, the fact that a hospital receives a portion of the grant would place it within the function of Government to make representations to the Governing Body for improving the general management or remedying abuses, if satisfied that such action on the part of Government were called for. I observe, however, that the management of this hospital is spoken of in terms of the highest praise by the Board of Superintendence of Dublin Hospitals. In their Report for the year ended March last the Board state that the hospital continues to deserve the favourable comments they have made in former Reports as to its general administration, and as to the kindness and attention bestowed on the inmates; that the efforts of the Governors to develop the resources of the Institution have been gratifying and encouraging; and that the hospital deserves the highest praise, as its great extent and admirable arrangements minister in the best manner to the comforts of its inmates in their closing days. The Hospitals Committee of the Dublin Corporation have also spoken in no less gratifying terms of the management of the Institution. The financial condition of the hospital appears to be in a very flourishing condition, as may be gathered from the fact that the annual estimates show that the expenditure for the current financial year is estimated at £9,659, towards which Parliament contributes but £250, not £293 as stated in the question.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: But would not the Government consider it their proper function to make representations if they found that the management of the hospital was conducted on grossly sectarian principles?

MR. J. MORLEY: We do not consider there is any proof that the management is grossly sectarian; and the Government contribution, after all, is so small as not to entitle us to interfere. We have heard nothing to justify the charge of partiality made by my hon. Friend; but if facts in support of it are laid before me, I will inquire into them?

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): Has the right hon. Gentleman received any complaint from anyone concerning this Institution?

MR. J. MORLEY: No, I have not.

METROPOLITAN POLICE BOOTS.

CAPTAIN NORTON: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the conditions of the contracts for the supply of boots to the constables of the Metropolitan Police Force, and who is responsible for the proper carrying out of the contract; who is to blame for the fact that the marked dissatisfaction which has prevailed throughout the Force for many years past with respect to the boots supplied to the constables has not been brought to the knowledge of the authorities; who is responsible for having put out a contract for articles of this kind, which require no special plant, for so long a term as five years; whether he is aware that an inquiry, such as is now said to be taking place with reference to the boots in question, was instituted some years ago for the purpose of ascertaining whether the constables preferred the money paid for the boots in lieu of the boots; and that this inquiry brought to light the fact that the constables by an overwhelming majority were in favour of the allowance, whereas the Report which reached the authorities was, nevertheless, in the contrary sense; and when the result of the inquiry now said to be taking place will be made public?

MR. ASQUITH: I cannot within the limits of an answer enumerate the conditions of the contract. It can be seen at the Home Office by my hon. Friend if he so wishes. The Receiver is responsible for the due carrying out of the contract. All boots supplied under it are inspected and passed by an independent examiner, who is a practical bootmaker. I may say that 28 sizes of boots are kept in stock, and that any man who has a peculiarly-made foot can be specially measured, and special lasts are kept for such men. Any boots which prove on wear to be inferior can be and are returned. I cannot upon the evidence before me admit that there is any sufficient ground for the allegations that there has been marked dissatisfaction for years past with the boots supplied. The Secretary of State is responsible for the contract. Formerly it was the custom to have annual contracts, but the result gave great dissatisfaction to the men. On more than one occasion the contractor failed to deliver the boots and the men were kept waiting for months. A considerable quantity of special plant is required. The inquiry referred to by my hon. Friend was, I suppose, in 1887, when the then contractor failed to supply the full number of boots for the second issue of that year, and the Commissioner was extremely dissatisfied with the quality of the boots. He made inquiries as to whether the men would prefer to receive money in lieu of boots on that occasion. The Commissioner has no reason to believe that the Report which reached the authorities was in any way contrary to the facts. The boots have since then been very much improved, and nothing is left undone to make them as good as possible.

RIFLE PRACTICE ON WIMBLEDON COMMON.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): On behalf of the hon. Member for Wandsworth, I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, in view of the representation of the Conservators of Wimbledon and Putney Commons, that the privilege reserved to Volunteers of practising rifle shooting on Wimbledon Common can no longer be exercised with due regard to the public safety, and their request that the ranges be permanently closed, he will, in the interest of civilians frequenting the common and its neighbourhood, interfere to prohibit rifle practice in a locality deemed to be dangerous?

MR. ASQUITH: The matter has been referred to the Military Authorities, and is at present under their consideration; but, at the same time, I would call the hon. Member's attention to Section 66 of the Wimbledon and Putney Commons Act, 1871, under which the Conservators have the power (subject to arbitration) to terminate or suspend permission to the Volunteer corps to use any part of the common as a rifle range.

EDUCATION REPORT.

*SIR F. S. POWELL (Wigan) had on the Paper a notice to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education when the Report of the Committee of Council will be printed and circulated. When it was reached the hon. Member intimated that the Report had already been published, but he wished to know whether the attention of the right hon. Gentleman had been drawn to an obvious error on page 23, by the substitution of the word "distinction" for "instruction." Would the error be corrected?

MR. ACLAND : The misprint alluded to shall be corrected as soon as possible.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGES.

SIR F. S. POWELL : I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education when he will present to the House a Report, as promised by him last year, showing the number of men and women students in University Colleges, the degrees, and other particulars ; whether such Report will state in what part of the United Kingdom the parents are resident in each case ; and when the same will be printed and circulated ?

MR. ACLAND : This Report is now in the printers' hands, and will, I hope, be circulated in the course of the next week or two. It will not include any lists of the residences of the parents of students. Such lists would add very greatly to the bulk of the Report.

*SIR F. S. POWELL : Will it state how many belong to what I may term different nationalities, such as Ireland, Scotland, and Wales ?

MR. ACLAND : In the different localities ?

SIR F. S. POWELL : Yes.

MR. ACLAND : I am afraid it will not, but I will inquire.

CATHEDRALS AND ABBEYS IN SCOTLAND.

MR. CARVELL WILLIAMS (Notts, Mansfield) : I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether the cathedrals and abbeys of Scotland are to any, and what, extent under the control of the Board of Works ; and whether the Board is responsible for their maintenance and repair ; and, if so, from what source is the expenditure thereon met ?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. H. GLADSTONE, Leeds, W.) : Certain of the ancient cathedrals and abbeys in Scotland are under the charge of the Office of Works, chiefly in respect to the maintenance of the structures. With the exception of Glasgow Cathedral, the repair and maintenance consist chiefly in the preservation of ruins. The expenditure incurred by the Office of Works on this service is provided for in the Vote for Public Buildings, Great Britain.

WORSHIP STREET POLICE COURT.

MR. J. STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the block of business at the Worship Street Police Court ; whether he is aware that the first of 46 summonses issued against the reputed owner of insanitary property in the parish of Shoreditch by the Shoreditch Vestry came before the Court on the 5th of June was adjourned to the 26th of June, and on that date was again adjourned for three weeks ; that the 45 summonses of a similar character against the same defendant have yet to be heard ; whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that police court proceedings have been taken at various times against the same defendant during the past two years, and that the property has been pronounced by the Sanitary Inspector of Shoreditch and by the County Council Inspector to be in a condition dangerous to health ; and what steps he can take to secure that the hearing of the cases is expedited ?

MR. ASQUITH : I am informed by the Chief Magistrate that there has been no block of business at Worship Street, except that there have been two or three long cases, which must always cause some interruption, and which might happen at any Court. The cases which my hon. Friend refers to in the second paragraph of his question have been adjourned, in order that a whole afternoon might be given to them. One case will govern the others, and the prosecution made no objection to the adjournment. Mr. Haden Corser has viewed the premises, and there is no immediate danger to the occupants. The sanitary conditions complained of are owing to faulty construction, and not from want of care or cleanliness of owner. I have no information as to any previous proceedings. I will communicate with the Magistrate, and suggest to him the desirability of proceeding to a decision as soon as possible.

HALSHAM SCHOOL, YORKSHIRE.

SIR F. S. POWELL : I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether, notwithstanding the repeated assurances that Schedule VII. of the Code is not to be applied to existing schools, the Education Department have condemned a class-room at Halsham, in the County of Yorkshire, only because it is three feet short in width of the requirements of the said Schedule; and whether, notwithstanding a satisfactory Report, the grants under Articles 104 and 105 have this year been for the first time refused to the school.

MR. ACLAND: In reply to the first part of the hon. Member's question, I have to point out that, in the first place, the class-room in question is a new one not yet built, and, therefore, subject to the Rules of Schedule VII.; and, in the second place, that the Department have approved it in view of the small number of children at the school. With regard to the second part of the question, the school has a considerable endowment, and has a balance in hand on the year's accounts, notwithstanding the fact that it receives no support whatever from voluntary contributions. In these circumstances, there does not seem to be any justification for paying grants under Articles 104 and 105.

THAMES SHIPBUILDING FIRMS AND NAVAL CONTRACTS.

MR. MACDONALD: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether the prices quoted by the Fairfield Company and by the Thames Ironworks for the construction of first-class battleships were £435,000 and £443,000 respectively; whether an offer was made by the Admiralty to the Fairfield Company to construct one of these battleships at about the price quoted by Messrs. Thomson; whether any similar offer was made to the Thames Ironworks; and, if not, will he explain on what grounds; and whether he is aware that the Admiralty conditions of tender, by which every contractor is compelled to undertake to pay the district rates of wages, mean in London an increase of wages rates of 10 to 20 per cent. over the rates current on the Clyde, Tyne, Humber, and at Barrow and Belfast; and, if so, whether any consideration has been given to this penalty placed upon London shipbuilders, which in the case of first-class cruisers and battleships would mean some £20,000 or £25,000 upon each ship?

Si- F. C. Powell

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Sir U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH, Lancashire, Clitheroe): The amounts of unsuccessful tenders are confidential and are never published by the Admiralty. The offer made to, and refused by, the Fairfield Company was to build a battleship at the figure which has been accepted by Messrs. Laird and Messrs. J. and G. Thomson respectively. That offer, as I explained to my hon. Friend a week ago, could not be made to the Thames Company, because they were not (like the Fairfield Company) among the firms who tendered lowest. Many firms tendered lower than the Thames Company. We are not aware what may be the comparative effect in different districts of the United Kingdom of inserting in our contracts the clause required by the House of Commons Resolution as to the current rate of wages. If in London the current rate of the London district is paid, and for example on the Clyde the current rate of the Clyde district is also paid, the fact that the London rate is higher than the Clyde rate would not justify the Government in accepting tenders so much higher as to involve large sacrifices of public money. Our practice is to make contracts at the lowest rates tendered with firms who accept our conditions and are fully able to undertake the work. Any other practice would tend to favouritism and would benefit a particular firm or locality to the exclusion of other firms and districts, and at the expense of the taxpayer.

RAILWAY RATES BILL.

SIR J. WHITEHEAD (Leicester): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the present position of the Railway Rates Bill; and can he say when it will be proceeded with, and whether in Committee of the whole House or in the Standing Committee on Trade?

MR. BRYCE: I propose to-night or Monday to move that the Bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Trade.

RESTRICTIONS ON THE SALE OF SWINE.

MR. H. ROBERTS (Denbighshire, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether he has received further communications pointing out the serious inconvenience and loss to the farmers of Denbighshire caused by the present restrictions against the sale of swine, and appealing for the withdrawal of the Order; whether he is aware that the western division of the county has been entirely free of the disease from the 24th of March last; that the three cases reported in June came from Rhosymedra, Blangedwyn, and Wrexham, all in the eastern division of the county; and that the Chief Constable of the county corroborates the statement that the whole of the western portion of the county is free from the disease, and declares that the Order could be safely revoked so far as the above-named district is concerned; and whether, in view of these facts and the serious consequences of the prohibitive Order during the large fairs taking place at this time of the year, he can see his way to an early, if not an immediate, withdrawal of the restrictions?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. H. GARDNER, Essex, Saffron Walden): I have received the further communications to which my hon. Friend refers, and I have been glad, in conformity with his request, to give them my very careful consideration. It is the fact that the three cases of swine-fever reported in June arose in the eastern division of the county, and that the Chief Constable is of opinion that the western division of the county is free from disease, but the splitting up of the area of a single Local Authority in the manner proposed would be attended with considerable practical difficulty, and I regret that I do not see my way to give effect to the wishes expressed by my hon. Friend. I may add that it is admitted that there has hitherto been considerable difficulty in securing the prompt notification of disease in the county; but if this difficulty is overcome and no further outbreaks occur there during the present month, I should probably be in a position to consider favourably an application for the removal of the restrictions, provided that the Local Authority were willing to take satisfactory precautions against the re-introduction of the disease.

THE BALADHUN MURDER CASE.

MR. NAOROJI (Finsbury, Central): On behalf of Mr. Caine (Bradford, E.), I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India if he has yet received the full Papers respecting the Baladhun murder case, and the inquiry into the conduct of the Deputy Magistrate and other officials censured by the High Court of Calcutta; and, if so, will he lay them upon the Table of the House?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. H. H. FOWLER, Wolverhampton, E.): I hope to lay Papers regarding the Baladhun case on the Table in a few days.

THE WINWICK RECTORY ACT.

MR. LEGH (Lancashire, S.W., Newton): I beg to ask the Controller of the Household if he can state when the Ecclesiastical Commissioners propose to make any payment to the benefices specified in "The Winwick Rectory Act, 1884," and in what manner it is intended to allocate the funds available?

THE CONTROLLER OF THE HOUSEHOLD (Mr. LEVESON-GOWER, Stoke-upon-Trent): The Ecclesiastical Commissioners have decided to distribute the surplus now available in raising to £300 per annum those of the benefices (six in number) specified in the first part of the Third Schedule to "The Winwick Rectory Act, 1884," which are at present below that amount. The several augmentations will take effect as from May 1, 1894, and will be as follows: Benefice.—Croft with Southworth, yearly grant, £93; Earlestown St. John Baptist, yearly grant, £73; Glazebury All Saints, yearly grant, £137; Newchurch Kenyon, yearly grant, £9; Golborne yearly grant, £108; Newton in Makerfield Emmanuel, yearly grant, £24; total, £444.

COLONEL LOCKWOOD (Essex, Epping) said, that in the absence of his hon. Friend the Member for Colchester (Captain Naylor-Leyland), he should like to continue the discussion his hon. Friend began last night on the question of the camp at Colchester. He wished to ask the Secretary for War for a pledge that the building of the Colchester Camp would be commenced either this year or next. This camp, which consisted of what were then regarded as temporary wooden structures, was formed at the time of the Crimean War, and had since been continually condemned by the Military and Naval Authorities. Last year a third of the huts were pulled down, but no rebuilding had been commenced; and he wished to know what the intentions of the Government were on the subject? He also desired to know what it was intended to do with the troops now quartered at Colchester if the remaining two-thirds of the huts were to be pulled down?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Stirling, &c.), who was indistinctly heard, was understood to say that the demolition of the huts at Colchester was being proceeded with. A little inconvenience was caused last year because the General Officer, with a very creditable desire to push things forward, had some of the huts pulled down while the regiment was away at the manoeuvres. It was intended that the troops thus dispossessed should be temporarily accommodated at Gravesend; but sanitary defects were discovered at Gravesend which prevented the carrying out of that arrangement.

MR. JEFFREYS (Hants, Basingstoke) asked what remained of the money voted under the Barracks Act?

THE CHAIRMAN said, that was a question which could not be dealt with under this Vote.

MR. JEFFREYS said, he would then ask the right hon. Gentleman what he proposed to spend at Aldershot during the ensuing year? The camp at Aldershot had grown into a very large one, and there were now generally 15,000 men quartered there all the year round. When the Barracks Act was passed it was understood that a very considerable sum was to be spent on new buildings which were to replace the huts; but he supposed, now that the number of men had been increased, additional buildings would be put up there. The right hon. Gentleman had said he would take into consideration the rent of £100 a year now paid out of voluntary subscriptions to the soldiers' club-house adjoining the gymnasium at Aldershot. The club-house was used entirely by soldiers, and no subscription had to be paid by those who enjoyed its benefits. He thought, under the circumstances, it would be only reasonable that the right hon. Gentleman should make a present to the club-house of the rent of £100.

SIR R. TEMPLE (Surrey, Kingston) said, he desired to know what authority there was for spending the sum of £8,100 which appeared on page 66 of the Estimates upon improved accommodation for the troops at Alexandria? Under the head of Gibraltar he found that the Committee was asked to vote £8,000 for improving communications, &c., but that this sum would not allow of the completion of the works, as £9,800 would still remain to be spent. The Government would remember the great anxiety that had recently been felt regarding the general improvement of this most important port, which was perhaps the second most important strategic point in the British Empire. He wished to know what was the nature of the work, and whether it would soon be finished? It seemed to him that if, as was probable, it was a work of great importance the sooner it was done the better. The same observation applied to a redoubt which was to be built at Hong Kong, and for which a sum of £600 was taken this year, leaving £1,000 to be spent in subsequent years. The same remark applied also to Singapore, where £500 was to be spent this year on certain works and £1,300 was to be left for future years. Then, again, there was an item of £20,000 for Ordnance Store Establishments at St. Lucia, but £13,000 was to be left unspent at the end of the current year. He would suggest that the speedy completion of works that were regarded as necessary at points which were of so much importance to the Empire was most desirable. Everything that related to the completion of that extensive arrangement was a matter of urgent public importance. Though, of course, the criticism on that (the Opposition) side of the House generally did relate to the non-spending of money rather than to the spending of it, in this case it seemed necessary to urge on Ministers the completion of these most important works, although it might involve a rather more rapid spending of money than was contemplated in the Estimates.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : The hon. Baronet says the criticisms on his side of the House on these Estimates are directed to the non-spending rather than the spending of money, and he made some sort of apology for urging the rapid completion of these works. Let me tell him that I have been present here this week during the whole of the discussion of these Estimates, and let it be known that, with the exception of the hon. Member for Peterborough, no other Member of the Committee has complained that the Government does not spend enough, but all has made suggestions that, if carried out, would involve a heavy increase in the Estimates. Perhaps I ought also to except my hon. Friend on the other side of the Table (Mr. Brodrick). Of all persons in this House I should have thought the hon. Baronet would have been the last to make the observations he has just made. Does he think that we should be able, or that it would be wise of us to spend the whole of the sum put down for ordnance store establishments at St. Lucia in one year? Does the hon. Gentleman, who is Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee, not know that we cannot undertake these new works till the Vote is passed?—and that is the reason why there is a certain degree of urgency attaching to this Vote which does not attach to the others. Before the Vote is passed we cannot take even the initial steps towards preparing the plans for any part of this expenditure. That is the reason that very often a comparatively small sum is put down to be spent in the year in which the Service first appears on the Vote. I should have thought the hon. Baronet would have commended us for that as a very proper administrative system. Instead of that, out of his exuberant patriotism—because his motive is patriotic in so far as it is to secure the defence of these distant stations, in which I quite agree with him—he calls on us to spend in this year the whole of the money the works will cost. That disposes of most of his criticisms, which were not directed so much to the Service as to the comparatively small sum to be spent this year. With regard to Egypt, he asks what authority we have for spending money there? We have none until this House votes the money for the Service. When the House has voted it we can spend it there as well as elsewhere. These are services we cannot expect the Egyptian Government to undertake—at any rate, if we did expect it, we are pretty sure they would not do it. The item for Alexandria is in regard to huts which have been built to replace others condemned as unhealthy, and for providing accommodation elsewhere for married soldiers and others. As to the progress to be made on the works at Aldershot under the Barracks Act this year, I cannot say what it will be. There is a large amount of the money taken for those works unexpended.

THE CHAIRMAN : The expenditure under the Barracks Act does not come under this Vote.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : We provide for the interest and Sinking Fund under this Vote, but I cannot say how much will be spent this year. As to the rent of the club house at Aldershot, I have made inquiries, but have not yet received the required information.

SIR R. TEMPLE said, the money had already been taken—save in the case of a redoubt at Hong Kong—for the works to which he had alluded.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, he found that the hon. Baronet was right. In the cases referred to they were second year's expenditures. Most of them, however, were affected by the circumstances which applied in the case of first year's Votes.

SIR R. TEMPLE said, he had not presumed to say what the amount of expenditure should be in a particular year. He had generally adverted—and still would advert—to the slow rate of progress as evinced by the Estimates now before the House. He had urged the Government to expedite and finish the works as soon as possible.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston) said, when works were proposed of an urgent character the Estimates containing them should be brought forward at an earlier period, or they should be put into a Supplementary Estimate so as not to be delayed by the failure on the part of the Government to deal with general financial business, and that a better system should be adopted by the War Office in conjunction, if necessary, with the Treasury, whereby it might be rendered possible to prepare plans of important works before the Estimates were moved. With regard to Gibraltar, no one could doubt the desirability of any works for putting it in a proper defensive position, in the interests of the Empire at large. In fact, it was a matter of such urgency that he should have thought the best plan in such a case would be not to wait for the ordinary Estimates, but to deal with it when the necessity seemed pressing by means of a Supplementary Estimate or in some other way. As to the necessity for ranges to meet the requirements of the new magazine rifle, he did not see that the Estimates contained any very large provision for that purpose. There were some items for the colonies and some for this country, but the total expenditure upon that object was not a very large amount, and probably before the Debate closed some further observations would be made upon that point. It was a matter of great necessity that the rifle ranges of this country should be put in a better condition; and he would urge upon the Secretary for War that it was a question not entirely of the existence of ranges, but also of making them as accessible as possible for all arms of the Service. In these days, when it was so difficult to acquire ranges, it seemed to him that existing or future ranges should be made available for all branches of the Service—that was to say, they should be open for practice to Volunteers as well as the Regular Forces. He was at a loss to know why the Volunteers should necessarily be left to provide ranges out of their own resources. If it were possible for them to do their shooting at a Government range within a sufficiently short distance from their headquarters they ought to be allowed to do so. As to making ranges accessible, he was glad to see that there was an item for constructing a railway to the camp at Strensall; but the principle which applied in the case of Strensall would apply to many other cases which could be suggested in different parts of the country. It seemed to be an extraordinary thing that in this country, where railways had obtained a development which they had in few other countries, so many of our military stations should still remain unconnected with the main lines of railway in their neighbourhood. Take the case of Fulwood Barracks. There everything taken to the barracks had to be carted $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles through the town of Preston. Not only was there no railway, but the Government had not even taken measures to get a siding constructed, or any means of communication made with the railway at the nearest point at which it approached the barracks. If a siding were so constructed it would be possible to save more than a mile of carting. Beyond that, there was a question to which he had previously alluded in the House, and which, so far as that part of the country was concerned, was of great importance—namely, the question of the construction of a light railway to Chipping. He supposed that Chipping was intended to become a large military centre. There were facilities there for permitting extension of what were very satisfactory rifle ranges, and a comprehensive use of that site could only be effectually made by extending the nearest railway up to the camp and range. At present, however, the distance which had to be traversed between the end of the railway at Longridge and Chipping was a serious bar to the usefulness of the place as a military station and rifle range. When the Government did not care to incur the whole of the expense of constructing light railways for the purpose he advocated, it might be possible for them to assist persons who were desirous of promoting the construction of such railways. They could be made useful for military purposes by the Government contributing something towards the cost. He did not think the question of bringing about this communication by railway with military centres was one which should be left out of sight. The railways might be necessary in times of emergency. As an instance of the activity in some quarters for bringing about railway communication in cases of strategic value, they had the case of the communication which was made between the Underground Railway and the Central Police Office. If it was found necessary to have railway communication with an important police station surely it was equally necessary throughout the country to have direct communication between the railways and our great military centres.

Mr. Tomlinson

CAPTAIN BAGOT (Westmoreland, Kendal) said, that no doubt the question of providing rifle ranges was one beset with difficulties. But the right hon. Gentleman had urged that it was a matter of expense. That was a difficulty which would increase rather than diminish with the lapse of time. Sooner or later the War Office would have to face the question of providing the troops with ranges whereon they might be enabled to test the new rifle with which they had been recently armed, which he believed to be the best rifle in the world. The country had gone to great expense, and had spent a great deal of time and trouble in endeavouring to obtain the best military weapon of any Army, and he believed they had succeeded. He did not think any Continental country had a rifle as good as ours. Well, having done that, it did seem ridiculous that we should not provide the troops with a sufficient amount of space in which to practise with the weapon. There were 160 rifle ranges in the United Kingdom, and many of these, when the Martini-Henry rifle was introduced, were considered unsafe. The Committee which had considered the question of the rifle ranges a few years ago had reported that only 30 out of 160 would be considered as absolutely safe. But the Secretary of State had stated that of 160 ranges 48 were safe; and when it was remembered that there were over 100 regimental districts, and that the Volunteers and the Militia had to practise as well as the Army, the Committee would see how inadequate was the provision for practice with the new rifle. In some parts of the United Kingdom, the inconvenience felt in regard to this matter was very great. In Dublin, for instance, there were four battalions of Infantry quartered, and there were no rifle ranges for them. The consequence was, that the men had to be sent with the colours a considerable distance away, to go through a course of musketry practice. It was a question as to whether the range at the Curragh was as suitable as it should be for a new rifle, which had a range of from 500 to 700 yards longer than the Martini-Henry. Bullets from the new rifle travelled a much longer distance after a ricochet, and necessitated the adoption of a range much wider, as well as longer, than those in use for the Martini-Henry. There was no doubt that Continental countries were going ahead in the matter of rifle practice. They were far in advance of us, and when we came into conflict with them—as sooner or later we should, though he hoped that day was a very long way off—our troops would be placed at a great disadvantage. In this he was not only referring to practice by companies or singly, for he was not at all sure whether that was the most important part of the training of soldiers in musketry. On the Continent field firing was practised to a very considerable extent, and unless our troops had opportunities of firing in a body, as in actual warfare, they would be at a serious disadvantage if brought into contact with a foreign Army. The Committee of 1891 stated that there were only four bits of ground large enough for this exercise of field firing for an Army to practise on. The Committee recommended that at least five more pieces of ground should be bought. They mentioned the probable sum that would be required, and strongly recommended that those tracts of land should be at once procured. He knew there were difficulties in the way of finding bits of ground, but he thought that if the Committee which had been sitting, or a body of experts, were to travel round the country they would not have much difficulty in finding sites which would prove to be admirably fitted for the purpose. Land was as cheap now as it probably ever would be, and the Government ought to take advantage of the opportunity to provide the necessary ranges. He believed a difficulty existed in the fact that, if the Secretary of State exercised his compulsory powers of acquisition, the price was fixed by a jury and was invariably very high—quite out of proportion to the value of the land. It had been recommended by the Committee that the various Acts which the right hon. Gentleman would have to put into operation in order to enable him to acquire land for ranges should be consolidated and simplified so that he might have powers at once wider and more simple. They heard a great deal in these days about the compulsory acquisition of land. People were very much divided in opinion about it, but he thought that if there ever was a time when such a power should be given it was now. The Minister responsible for the efficiency of the Army should have power to acquire land, so that our soldiers might be trained in the one thing without which they were absolutely useless—namely, shooting. In view of the great importance of the question to the country, he was prepared to say that, even at the risk of inflicting hardship in some cases, the compensation should be determined not by a jury, but by arbitration, as was the case when the land was acquired by agreement. Although, as he had said, he believed we possessed the most perfect and magnificent magazine rifle in the world, it would not be in accordance with past experience if a new rifle escaped criticism. The hon. Member for Peterborough had criticised it, and no doubt, though it was better than any other, it had its faults. The faults were being rapidly overcome, however, and it was high time that, having this weapon, our soldiers should have ground upon which to let it off. He asked for some information as to the course which the Government intended to pursue.

SIR H. FLETCHER (Sussex, Lewes) said, that with reference to the question of rifle ranges, he noticed in the Estimates this year it was stated that the total estimate for the provision of ranges could not be arrived at, but at the same time a sum of £17,500 was put down as the amount to be appropriated for that purpose this year. He should like to know whether that money was to be spent on renovation or repairs of existing rifle ranges, or whether it was to be devoted to purchasing land for other ranges? On the occasion of the last Debate he mentioned one or two ranges on which some money had been spent, including Browdown at Gosport. It was a curious thing that Browdown was the only range for the South Western district, of which Portsmouth was the chief military centre, and where there were as large numbers of troops as, possibly, in any garrison town in England. He had heard that, notwithstanding the money spent on Browdown last year, it was not altogether in a satisfactory state for the use of the Lee-Metford rifle; and when the opportunity offered, which he hoped would be soon, that district ought to be provided with a larger and more convenient range. Among the other districts which were mentioned in the Return which the right hon. Genleman had kindly furnished him with, he found that in the Thames district, also a very important military district, there were no ranges safe for the Lee-Metford rifle. He wished to ask whether any of this money was to be spent on the Thames district and on the Woolwich district? where, of course, there were large bodies of troops belonging to the Royal Artillery, and it was most important they should have some safe ranges in which to carry on their musketry practice. There were also many other districts which were very feebly supplied with ranges for the Lee-Metford rifle. There was one of these districts in which he had a special interest, and as to which he should be obliged to get information whether any of the money was to be spent upon, and that was the rifle range at Chichester. The Militia were called out annually for training there, and this year they were served with the Lee-Metford rifle; but as it was found the rifle range was not safe for its use, the Lee-Metford rifles were taken back and kept in store, and the training was carried out with the Martini-Henry rifle with which the Militia had been armed for some years. If money was to be spent on this range it should be spent as speedily as possible, so that the Militia, in future years, might have an opportunity of practising with the weapon with which they were armed. The Return furnished him by the War Office showed that there were 47 ranges, with which Ireland, and especially the South, seemed to be very fairly provided, there being 11 in the Cork district. It was hoped that some satisfactory arrangement would soon be arrived at with regard to the Dublin ranges by which the garrison at Dublin would be able to carry out its rifle practice. Scotland seemed to have a very considerable number of ranges when they recollected that in that country there were very few troops indeed, compared with what there were in England or Ireland. He was sure it would interest the Committee to know whether this money was to be spent on renovating the old ranges or for the purchase of new ones.

COLONEL KENYON-SLANEY (Shropshire, Newport) said, before they passed from this enormously important question of rifle ranges, he had one or two suggestions to make which he was surprised had not been made before, and which, he should have thought, would have been made by the Secretary for War himself. He was perfectly aware of all the difficulties which existed in the way of obtaining requisite land for the purpose of these ranges. It seemed to him that the mistake which had been made by the predecessors of the right hon. Gentleman, as well, possibly, as by the right hon. Gentleman himself, was that they thought it necessary absolutely to acquire the fee-simple of all the lands—that was, to buy them up absolutely in order satisfactorily to establish these ranges. If they could buy the land outright, it would no doubt enable them to make more permanent provisions, and there would be many advantages in being able to do so. But they must cut their coat according to their cloth. If they found that the difficulties in the way of purchasing the ranges outright were almost insuperable, he wondered they had not devoted much more attention than they had hitherto done to the possibility of hiring ground for this purpose. Of course, in hiring they could not absolutely dictate their own terms, but by acting on the principle of give and take, and making the best of what was available, the Government would be able to materially increase their rifle accommodation—at all events, temporarily. They might, perhaps, have a range for a certain number of years in one place, and then, when there was a demand for the land, have to remove to another district. This no doubt would be inconvenient, but it would be immensely preferable to having nothing at all. The great and paramount necessity of this training had been urged. In probably the only war within the memory of any man in that House out of which we did not come with credit—namely, the War with the Boers in South Africa, one of the essential difficulties we had to contend with, and which enabled the Boers to inflict upon our soldiers the comparative disasters which they did, was due not to any superior courage or being better drilled, but to the extreme accuracy of the Boer rifle shooting, which they had attained by constant practice, and being thoroughly at home with the weapon they had to wield on the day of battle. Nothing should be more taken to heart by our Military Authorities than the lessons taught to us by that war. He believed when the right hon. Gentleman got up he would not be able to endorse what had been said as to being able to arrange satisfactorily for a rifle range in Dublin. He believed that the War Office authorities there were intimidated by the bogey of expense. This training was a matter of paramount importance, and the question of expense ought not always to stand in the way. He did not agree with his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for one of the divisions of Westmoreland as to giving compulsory powers for the acquisition of land for rifle ranges. He looked with considerable misgiving on such compulsory powers, and he should have to be convinced that every other method had been resorted to before he should consent to this arbitrary, and by no means proper, but unjustifiable method of acquiring land by compulsion. If it was worth while to spend all this money on these rifles it was worth while to go to almost any additional expense to enable our soldiers to make themselves efficient, otherwise what had already been done would be practically useless. He knew the Secretary for War would be anxious to support them, and their object was to create as much public feeling as possible so that the right hon. Gentleman or his successors could put an end to what was nothing short of a public scandal.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, that whilst he was very conscious of the increasing difficulties in the way of obtaining rifle ranges, he thought those difficulties would not be diminished, but would rather increase as the years passed on. Undoubtedly it was of the first importance that their soldiers should be good marksmen. At present they took the sword and rifle, and neither taught the swordsman swordsmanship nor the man who had to fire the rifle marksmanship. With the large range of the rifles they required more ground for the purpose of practising musketry, and they would require far more than even the War Office were disposed to admit. What they gave as the danger line beyond which they guaranteed no bullet should pass was not the danger line. The bullets ricocheted and went further than the War Office supposed. There was a regiment which went for rifle firing to Aldershot, and they shot a farmer who was outside the range. The next year the same regiment came back, fired over the same range, and shot the farmer's son who was also outside the same range. [A laugh.] The hon. and gallant Gentleman laughed, but he did not think the farmer or his son laughed. He only mentioned this to show that the danger line was not far enough off. He had been a witness to the gallant and despairing attempt of the War Office to get a range in Wiltshire, where, owing to the many difficulties in the way, he thought it would be impossible to establish a range. He thought it would be found practically impossible to establish any further ranges in this country for the new rifle. The country was greatly populated; the people did not like to have rifle bullets flying round and not to feel safe within four miles from the man firing the rifle; and he considered the difficulties in the way of getting ranges would increase. He was convinced that it would be found to be absolutely impossible to get rifle ranges for each district within the district itself. In the end they would have to get some large extent of barren and uninhabited land in Scotland or Clare, or some of the Irish mountains, or perhaps in Essex, which would be sufficient to enable them not only to establish ranges for the ordinary purpose of firing, but also for field firing, and there they would have to send the men from all districts from time to time. This was a matter of the most intense importance. Unless they taught the men to use a rifle so as to be able to hit a mark they might as well have no rifle at all. He should like to hear what was going to be done in regard to the provision of rifle ranges. The hon. and gallant Gentleman near him had said that only £17,500 was to be spent on ranges; but he thought this must be a mistake, because, under the head of Barracks and Rifle Ranges, he found the item of £72,000. It was true that under the head of Barracks and Rifle Ranges he found a good deal was to be spent on drainage at the Canterbury Barracks. He had risen chiefly to suggest and impress upon the right hon. Gentleman that the moment had arrived to reconsider the question of the rifle ranges from this point of view; to reconsider whether they could reasonably entertain the prospect of providing rifle ranges under the new conditions of largely-increased dimensions in each district for the troops of that district. If the right hon. Gentleman was obliged to abandon that idea—as he believed would be the case—he would ask him whether he would not consider the other suggestion of getting a general rifle range, or perhaps two, of a large extent, sufficiently large not merely to enable firing to be done at a target, but ordinary field firing, and to face the necessity of having only one or two ranges and sending the troops there in turn to do their firing.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I have really very little to say on this subject; in fact, nothing beyond what I have said already. I think this is the third Debate on the subject of ranges we have had within the last few weeks, therefore I cannot expect to occupy the time of the House in repeating anything I have said before. That I am quite aware of the great importance of the subject and of all that has been said on the necessity of training our troops in the use of the rifle I think might almost be taken as granted. At the same time, I have been interested in much that has been said, and the only complaint I have to make is that, so far from receiving any assistance towards coming to a conclusion in the matter, I have had such a difference of opinion expressed that any initial confusion of mine has become more confounded. I was assured on one of the former occasions when there was a long discussion that the War Office were altogether absurdly timid as to the amount of ranges required, and that a Committee of the House would very much better determine the matter; that the new rifle did not carry anything like so far as had been asserted, and that there was no danger to anything like the extent that was imagined. Now I have the hon. Member for Lynn Regis talking in exactly the other direction, and implying that no one within a county would be safe if a rifle range was established. Then there was another hon. and gallant Gentleman urging us to proceed by way of taking land compulsorily, who went with great detail and at considerable length into the manner in which to apply this system of compulsory purchase; whilst another hon. and gallant Gentleman tells me he altogether disapproves of compulsory purchase, and thinks that all such purchases should be brought about by voluntary powers. Let us hope that the War Office among all these different counsels, from military advisers especially, who are very naturally interested in the subject, will go on as they have done, in a common-sense way, taking advantage of every opportunity offered us to use and push on in this matter quietly and as well as we can. The idea they had in their mind was that there should be in each military district at least one—and in some districts more than one—range at which all the troops in that district could be trained. Of course, I am talking of the Regular troops, but it would be the same way with the Militia. That does not meet the question of the Volunteer Force, who have difficulties of their own in the same direction. As I have said, I quite admit the enormous importance of the question, but I also admit that at the present moment I am not prepared to lay down any particular way out of the difficulty. We will go on as we have been doing in the meantime, spending money as we find it possible to do so. The range which the hon. Member opposite referred to, near Salisbury, has been abandoned. The matter was considered with great care. First of all, it was intended to have a range in the New Forest, and then one in the neighbourhood of Salisbury; but it has been found that the Browdown Range at Portsmouth by a little alteration could be made suitable for the purpose for which the others were intended. I believe that the money which is taken this year will be spent in completing the ranges at Aldershot, Landore, the Curragh, and Browdown. Kilbride comes next, and if this cannot be got, that is if the money necessary cannot be spent there, Gravesend and Sheerness will follow, and abroad, Jamaica and the Mauritius. That, I think, is all that I need say on that subject, having said so much already. My hon. Friend will observe that Chichester is not in those I have mentioned. One of my hon. and gallant Friends spoke about the bogey of expense. Well, no person in my position can disregard the bogey of expense, and if we were to go on spending money on anything that was required, without any regard at all to the expenditure, I do not know what the House of Commons would think of the expenditure of the War Office. I fully admit, and I assert, and declare, that my military advisers as well as myself are fully alive to the enormous importance of this question, and as soon as we see that any definite action can be taken in any individual case we shall be ready to take it. There are certain places in the country which I will not mention—because that might have a most evil effect—on which we have our eyes where ranges might be established, and when the moment comes to strike I hope we shall not be found unwilling to do so.

*MR. BRODRICK (Surrey, Guildford) could not say that he thought the statement of the right hon. Gentleman was a very encouraging one to those who desired to see adequate provision made for suitable rifle ranges, and unless some heroic measures were taken matters would continue to remain in the same condition, and they would have this same Debate year after year. Obviously the whole matter hung on the question whether Parliament could fairly be asked for more money, and he was surprised to hear that the right hon. Gentleman, in the light of his experience in the War Office—which was greater than that of any other man in the House, he having been twice Financial Secretary and twice Secretary of State for War—could imagine that the House of Commons would press him for any reduction in expenditure. He did not remember ever being asked to reduce a single item in connection with such matters, and on the contrary he should like the right hon. Gentleman to recollect what occurred with regard to barracks. They had the greatest difficulty in regard to barracks. Lord Randolph Churchill's Committee which inquired into the subject with a view to economy took evidence with regard to barracks for only one single morning, and on the strength of that morning's work they decided on a Report encouraging the country to spend £4,100,000 on barracks. That decision was taken after evidence had been given by one officer alone, and having that example before him he really hoped that the right hon. Gentleman, when he came to look into the whole question next year, would come to the conclusion that it was a matter on which he might fairly ask to have a loan.

He should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he had at all attempted to take land for rifle ranges under the powers given by the Rifle Ranges Act? It was said during the discussion that evening that juries would award very high prices for land taken compulsorily under that Act. That was so, indeed. He knew of one case in Scotland in which the jury added 50 per cent. to the value of the land because the land was taken compulsorily for a rifle range. The experience of the War Office in Ireland was even more unpromising than in Scotland. Land in Ireland which was quite unsaleable for any other purpose enormously went up in value when it was intended for ranges, and tenants who had a tenant-right in the land endeavoured to charge more than the fee-simple was worth. But he should like to know whether the right hon. Gentleman had used the powers of the Act, which enabled him to take land by arbitration, and, if so, with what result? He would venture to suggest, in conclusion, that the War Budget had some claim on the enormous surplus which the Chancellor of the Exchequer expected from the new Death Duties; and if from that source the War Minister was able to do anything for the rifle ranges he would meet with cordial support from the Opposition side of the House.

MR. FREEMAN-MITFORD (Warwick, Stratford) said, the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War had complained that there was not a single suggestion made in the course of the discussions that had not a tendency towards increasing expenditure. But he should like, very respectfully, to make a suggestion to the right hon. Gentleman which he believed would have a tendency to reduce expenditure, gradually and permanently. At present the War Office employed the officers of the Royal Engineers as architects for new War Office buildings. No one doubted that the Royal Engineers as a military body was one of the finest corps in Europe; but whether they were the most competent of the economical architects to carry on the barrack work of the United Kingdom was a totally different question. Architecture, like every other art, was a very jealous mistress, and unless a man gave her the full devotion of his life he was not likely to make a first-rate architect. The Royal Engineers should be confined to their own proper sphere, and that was the erection of forts. Economy in architecture was the very first problem that exercised the mind of the architect; but very little or nothing was known as to the principles on which the officers of the Royal Engineers calculated their estimates for buildings. His suggestion was that the work of building barracks should be handed over to the staff of trained architects in the Board of Works. [A laugh.] The right hon. Gentleman laughed at that, but surely it was a suggestion that was worth consideration. If the architects of the Board of Works carried on the building operations of the War Office they would get better contracts all over the country than could possibly be got through the medium of the commanding officer of the Royal Engineers, who was appointed for five years, he thought, and therefore could not have the same experience of the prices that normally obtain in the various country towns, as would be at the command of the trained officers of the Board of Works. He supposed he would be answered that an architectural training formed part of the curriculum of the schools in which the Royal Engineers were educated. That was true; but he doubted that the knowledge obtained in that way was such as would fit a Royal Engineer to compete with a trained architect, any more than a trained architect could compete with a Royal Engineer in the construction of forts. When they asked a Royal Engineer to become an architect they asked him to do something that was outside his profession; they took him away from duties which more obviously fell upon him, and duties therefore which must to a certain extent suffer by diverting his energies and talents into courses that were perhaps a little foreign to them. If they were to insist on their barracks being built by trained architects they would build them cheaper and better; the sanitary accommodation would be more perfect, and, moreover, they would leave the officers of the Royal Engineers altogether to their proper military functions.

SIR A. ACLAND-HOOD (Somerset, Wellington) said, he had questioned the right hon. Gentleman with reference to the condition of the barracks at Plymouth, Devonport, and other places in which troops were quartered on returning from India and other hot climes, and the right hon. Gentleman had said that while those barracks were damp they were not cold.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : I said it was a damp clime to send them to.

SIR A. ACLAND-HOOD said, the right hon. Gentleman had further stated that the discretion as to where the troops were to be quartered was in the general officer commanding the district, and therefore the War Office had no responsibility in the matter ; but he thought the right hon. Gentleman might use his influence in the right direction by recommending that troops returning from hot climes should not be sent to damp barracks. With regard to Wellington Barracks; he understood the right hon. Gentleman to have told him last night that the married men's quarters which had been destroyed by fire had been rebuilt, and that the other married men's quarters had been furnished with proper exits in case of fire. He had that morning visited the barracks—every corner of which he knew, having been stationed there dozens of times, and months at a time—and he was surprised to find that the place which had been burned down was still a vacant space, and that the exits and entrances of the existing married men's quarters were exactly the same as they were a few years ago. The bad drainage nuisance, to which he had also called attention, was very much worse now than it had been when he resided in the barracks. In fact, the barracks was a breeding place of disease. An insanitary state of things existed there that would not be tolerated in any union or prison, and he could not see why our soldiers should be housed worse than paupers and convicts. The right hon. Gentleman told him last night that the sum required for the drainage of the barracks was included in this year's Estimates. The battalions quartered in the Wellington Barracks would soon be leaving for the Autumn Manœuvres for five weeks, and he asked the right hon. Gentleman to have steps taken to have this disagreeable and dangerous nuisance removed during that period. He would also like to have an assurance from the right hon. Gentleman that there would be a sum included in next year's Estimates for rebuilding the married men's quarters which had been burned down, and to provide proper exits and entrances to the existing married men's quarters. If he did not get those satisfactory assurances he would have to move a reduction in the Vote and to go to a Division.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, he understood it was never intended to rebuild the married men's quarters which had been burned down at Wellington Barracks ; but, taking a lesson from the fire, the remaining married men's quarters were so altered as to secure proper exits in the case of fire. A scheme for the reconstruction of the entire barracks was under consideration ; but, pending that scheme, small improvements would be attended to, and the nuisance complained of was included in the Estimates and was being dealt with, a tender for the fittings having just been accepted. He was told there had been no complaint of the general drainage of the barracks. He was bound to say, generally, that when such complaints were made there was always a suspicion as to the way the barracks were kept. Undoubtedly, in many cases, the evil odours complained of were due to the regiment in the barracks neglecting to properly flush the drains, and to keep things in proper order, though he was sure that so far as the Wellington Barracks was concerned all those things were properly looked after. But if any evils of the kind existed the person responsible was the general officer commanding in the district. It was the duty of the medical officers to report those evils to the general officer commanding in the district ; and there was a Standing Order, so to speak, of the Secretary of State in the War Office, that a question of money should never stand in the way of any sanitary repairs or alterations which were urgently required ; and if proper representations were made, as they ought to be, to the general officer commanding in the district, it was the fault of the general officer that the evils existed ; for if he forwarded the representations to the War Office, they would have been at once attended to. It was very easy to say that our barracks were such that the soldiers could not live in them, but it was all the greatest nonsense. The greater number of barracks showed better with regard to health than any other buildings in which men were congregated together. With one or two flagrant exceptions, which were being dealt with, the greater part of the barracks were in a perfectly good and satisfactory condition, if they were to judge by the medical reports. In the case of the Wellington barracks, there had been no complaints of the general drainage, except that in the married officers' quarters the wife of an officer had died from puerperal fever. The sanitary arrangements of the barracks were then examined by Mr. Tyndal, the sanitary engineer of the War Department—a most competent officer—and while a few minor defects were found, nothing of a serious nature was discovered. That showed what pains were taken by the War Department in those matters. Again, a lamentable account was given last night of the drainage of that fine building, the General Officers' Home at Portsmouth. A general examination of the drainage of the house was made in 1890 by Mr. Tyndal, and he reported to the War Office. But not content with that, his predecessor in the office of Secretary of State invited Sir Frederick Bramwell to examine the house, and the result was that Sir Frederick Bramwell agreed, item by item, with every one of Mr. Tyndal's recommendations. The hon. Member for Warwickshire proposed that the whole business of building and repairing barracks should be taken out of the hands of the Royal Engineers. Everyone might not agree with the particular kind of architecture favoured by the Royal Engineers, but anyone who went to Aldershot and examined the new buildings put up there would see that externally and internally they reflected the very highest credit on the Department of the Royal Engineers. He believed that the Royal Engineers were admirably qualified to erect barracks. They had high civilian assistance; they were often men of very great experience, and the interests of the barracks were in every respect well looked after by them. The hon. Member suggested that the barracks should be handed over to the Office of Works. He did not wish to say anything, as between one Government Department and another, of an unfavourable character, but he doubted that the Royal Engineers could produce so absolute a failure for all the purposes for which it was intended that that block of buildings, in which the Foreign Office, the Home Office, and the Colonial Office were included.

MR. FREEMAN-MITFORD: I must interrupt the right hon. Gentleman. That building was not built by the men to whom I alluded. It was built by the late Sir Robert Scott, and not by the Office of Works.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Probably the Office of Works had some controlling voice in the matter. The plans had to pass the Office of Works.

MR. FREEMAN-MITFORD: The plans were settled by a committee of taste.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, "taste" very much depended on the idiosyncrasy of the individual. But he would come further down. There was the new Admiralty buildings. He was not finding fault with the Office of Works. No doubt they did their best with the circumstances they had to deal with. But were the Office of Works such models of excellency that they should turn up their noses at the barracks built by the Royal Engineers? It was notorious that the great block of buildings which included the Foreign Office and the Home Office was so badly constructed with regard to sanitary accommodation that the drains would not work, and a big sum, £20,000 or £26,000, had to be spent on them to put them into a proper condition. That experience did not show that the Office of Works would preserve them from some of the evils into which they occasionally fell under the directions of the Royal Engineers. The Department of the Royal Engineers was successfully managed. Fault might be found with their form of architecture as a matter of taste, but as to the substantial qualities of the buildings and the suitability of the buildings for the purposes for which they were intended, their work was exceedingly well done. His hon. Friend the Member for Guildford had asked him whether they had placed the provisions of the Rifle Ranges Act into operation. They had not. One of the difficulties found with the Act was that though the War Office might purchase property they could not interfere with rights of way.

MR. FREEMAN-MITFORD said, he understood that the sanitary arrangements of the buildings which the right hon. Gentleman had so seriously and severely criticised were constructed entirely under the directions of an officer of the Royal Engineers who was at the time attached to the Office of Works.

SIR A. ACLAND-HOOD said, the nuisance in the Wellington Barracks had been reported last September, 10 months ago, and the Report was followed by a long correspondence which occupied three months, between the officer commanding in the district—whom the right hon. Gentleman said was the responsible person in the matter—and the Commander-in-Chief, but nothing had yet been done. Meanwhile the soldier had to live in the place, which he admitted was very comfortable if it was not for the bad drainage, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would, without any further delay, take the question of the drainage seriously in hand.

MR. HANBURY said, the number of complaints which were made of the defective sanitary arrangements of barracks showed how essential it was to have some person in authority responsible for the barracks. He did not know what the Royal Engineers might be as architects as compared with civilians, but the fault of the system, in his opinion, was that the Royal Engineers were not responsible, as the right hon. Gentleman seemed to think, for the barracks. The whole of the duties in connection with the building and repair of barracks were duplicated. The Royal Engineer and the District Surveyor worked side by side, and it was utterly impossible to say which was the architect and which the surveyor. Then when they had made out the plans, they were submitted to the officer commanding in the district, and to the commanding officer of the Royal Engineers, both of whom reported to the War Office on the subject. He would like to know which of all these men were responsible for the building?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The general officer commanding in the district.

MR. HANBURY said, it, therefore, appeared that the man who was responsible for the building was a military man who knew nothing, architecturally, about it. No wonder the barracks were so bad! He should also like to know what training had the Royal Engineers for architectural work of this kind? So far as he understood, there was a commander in each district, but how could these commanders be expected to know anything about architecture when they had no training? The training an officer got was whilst he was a lieutenant, during the six months that he remained at Chatham. A man might be sent out to India, and if he did not stop out there altogether the training was of very little use to him, for during the seven or eight years he was in the Service before he was appointed to a district he only received six months' training in architecture. He thought his hon. Friend had made out a good case; that, looking at the fact that the organisation was bad, these men had not the proper training for the work they were called upon to perform. The right hon. Gentleman rather questioned that; but did they not, year after year, have complaints about the sanitary condition of these barracks? It would not, perhaps, matter so much if the War Office could be treated as private individuals, because things went on at these barracks that could be indicted if the property belonged to private individuals. A great deal was allowed to go on that was much worse than would be imagined. There was not sufficient accommodation, and some of the night arrangements were of the most filthy description, and if they occurred in private houses would form the subject of a prosecution; therefore, his hon. and gallant Friend was perfectly justified in bringing this matter forward. Taking the married quarters, did the right hon. Gentleman mean to tell him that in any cottage belonging to a private individual that married people with a family of three or four children would be allowed to huddle into one room, as was the case in many of their old barracks? He would like to get a return of the number of barracks where any provision was made in married quarters better than one room for a married couple and three or four children. This was a thing which the War Office ought not to allow to go on. There was one question he wished to ask as to this Vote. When the Vote was under discussion some time ago great blame was attached to him by the right hon. Gentleman because he declined to allow the Vote to be taken after about five minutes' discussion, though it was stated that it was absolutely necessary to get the Vote that day. Very strong language was used ; but of that he did not complain, because it was done by everyone in charge of the Vote, but the right hon. Gentleman had shown there was no absolute necessity for passing the Vote at that time by delaying to bring it forward again for four or five weeks. A very strong appeal was made to him to let the Vote go, as it was said it was of very great importance that the Vote should be got, even in the last five minutes, on account of the commencement of new works. What he wanted to know was, how this Vote differed from other Votes as to make it more necessary to get this Vote than any other ? Was it the fact that the money that had been voted on other Votes could not be transferred with the sanction of the Treasury for the works to be constructed under this Vote, and was it the fact that under other Votes articles of warlike stores and things of that kind could be bought without receiving Parliamentary sanction, but that it was utterly impossible to commence any new buildings until this Vote had passed ? For the benefit of the Committee and the information of the House he thought they ought to know that. From what the right hon. Gentleman said the other day it would appear it was urgent to get this Vote on the ground that these buildings could not be begun until they received the sanction of Parliament ; if so, the right hon. Gentleman was justified in pressing him to some extent ; but if that was not the fact he failed to see the justification. He wanted now to ask a question about the barracks at Fullwood, near Preston. In anything he said he was not going to press the right hon. Gentleman to keep troops in Fullwood barracks for any local reason, but at the present moment there was a good deal of accommodation for cavalry, provision being made for 380 men and 158 horses, and a new riding school was built some six years ago at a cost of £3,500. If it was not to the public advantage to send cavalry to Preston he did not wish the right hon. Gentleman to send them, but a large amount of money had been spent upon these barracks, and he wished to know if that was to be thrown away. He strongly objected to troops being put into large towns for mere police purposes, a thing they ought all to protest against ; and if these barracks were not in the open country he would not have brought the matter forward ; but he said that there was a large amount of accommodation at Fullwood barracks, and if the right hon. Gentleman had made up his mind to withdraw the cavalry he should like to know his reason for so doing.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, he had not with him the material that would enable him to answer this question, but he would inquire into it. He quite sympathised with the hon. Member, and no doubt it would be satisfactory to his constituents to have a cavalry barracks there. In his own constituency he was always being asked to send a battalion to Stirling Castle ; therefore, he quite sympathised with the hon. Gentleman.

MR. HANBURY said, he most distinctly said that if it was not for the public advantage then do not send them.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, he, of course, understood that ; but the hon. Member alluded to a larger question, that of getting the Vote. The matter was quite plain, but he was in this position : as if he were a humble scholar being interrogated by his schoolmaster, because the hon. Member was on the Public Accounts Committee and knew the rules better than he (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) did, who had to obey the hon. Member. On this Works Vote no new works could be undertaken until it had passed the House of Commons. In the case of any other Vote, as the hon. Member had said, they could spend money on them and transfer the money, as it were, from one to the other ; on this Vote they could spend money on any service which was already in progress, but they could not undertake to spend anything on a new work until the House of Commons had voted the money. He believed this provision could be dispensed with in some instances, if cases of great urgency could be shown the Treasury in some instances overruled the restriction. Sometimes when this Vote was put off the whole of the best part of the building year had gone. The other day he did not say there was an urgent necessity to pass it, but that it was urgent that they should get it as early as they could in order that they might have the advantage of fine weather.

*MR. A. C. MORTON (Peterborough) said, he was in favour of economy, but he was also in favour of providing proper accommodation for soldiers, and therefore he wished to ask one or two questions with regard to certain parts of the United Kingdom. For instance, he wished to know whether the War Office had made any provision for rebuilding the barracks at Londonderry? Some time ago he understood they were about to proceed with the work, which he believed had been in hand or had been considered for a great number of years. From his own knowledge, having seen the barracks last year, he could assure the right hon. Gentleman that they really wanted rebuilding. He was sorry that the Local Representative was not present to-day to support him in his appeal to the right hon. Gentleman as to the necessity for proceeding with these barracks as speedily as possible. He trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would not delay the matter much further. Then he wanted to know something with regard to Stirling Castle and some other Scotch castles. Stirling Castle was in the constituency of the right hon. Gentleman, but he was not satisfied that the right hon. Gentleman had done, or was able to do, all that was necessary to prevent this old historical castle from going to ruin. So far as he could understand, the only amount down in the Vote out of which the work could be done was the sum of £1,000 for ordnance store buildings, including purchase of land; he was not aware whether there was any other sum included in the lump sum of the Vote that could be used for the purpose of restoring this castle; still, he should like to know if the right hon. Gentleman intended to do anything more for the purpose of restoring this castle so far as he could, and putting it in such a condition as would prevent it decaying and being destroyed altogether in some short time? When he (Mr. Morton) was there last year there were some parts that wanted repairing very badly indeed. He should be glad to know that the War Office had some general power of doing what was right and proper for the preservation of an historical castle of this nature. Then there were three other castles in Scotland he should like to say something about. He saw that Edinburgh was mentioned in the Vote, and that £1,500 was taken with regard to it. He was aware that part of this castle was not under the control of the right hon. Gentleman at all, and he was sorry that he had been unable to get the Board of Works to do their duty with regard to that part of the building under their control. He had noticed there were sums of money to be spent, but so far as he could judge from personal inspection the right hon. Gentleman did not propose to spend enough to put it in a satisfactory state, either for its preservation or for the comfort and necessities of the troops quartered there, consequently he should be glad to get some further information from him. Another historical castle was Blackness Castle. This old castle itself was used as a powder magazine, or a magazine for old stores or something of that sort, and had been allowed to go out of use altogether except for the purpose he had mentioned. There was another historical castle to which attention had been called, and that was Dumbarton Castle, but he did not see that mentioned, though it might be included in the lump sum, which for works under £1,000 was taken. He should like to know whether the right hon. Gentleman intended to do the necessary work to prevent Dumbarton Castle from going to ruin entirely? He had mentioned these four castles in Scotland because they were supposed to be the keys to the Kingdom of Scotland, and it was provided, or intended to be so provided, in the Treaty with England that these castles, together with the two Royal Palaces, which he (Mr. Morton) had referred to on other Votes, should be kept up at the expense of the United Kingdom. He was aware they had generally been grossly neglected by all Governments; but now that they had a War Minister who was a Scotchman and a Scottish Representative, and that most of the other Members of the Government, if not all Scotchmen, represented Scottish constituencies, one would have thought that these buildings would have at last an opportunity of being taken care of. He did not desire to detain the Committee now, but he hoped his right hon. Friend would be able to give him a satisfactory explanation as to what he intended to do.

MR. CAINE (Bradford, E.) said, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would give the Committee some information as to what was to be done with regard to the Bradford Barracks before this Vote was taken.

*MR. WOODALL said, they were all aware that the Bradford Barracks did call for improvement, and they hoped to include the work in the Estimates of next year.

MR. CAINE asked, why not this year? He had called attention to this matter for some considerable time, and his predecessor had done the same. These barracks were a disgrace to the place.

*MR. WOODALL said, they could not satisfy all requirements at once. They had demolished a portion of the barracks, and they meant to effect necessary works the money for which would be included in next year's Estimates.

*SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.) said, that on the item of telegraphic and telephonic communication he wished to point out that there were many military ports and stations that were not provided with this communication, owing to the Post Office, before making such communications, requiring guarantees of a certain amount of revenue. But there were considerations that went beyond that, and he had to thank the right hon. Gentleman in the case of Paull, near Hull, for having acceded to the request made to him and over-ridden the Post Office Regulation, and he thought there were a number of other cases where it should be done also. Then with regard to the item for submarine mining. This work had been extremely well done, and the general impression was that it conduced to the efficiency of coast defence; but modern quick-firing guns were not always in position to cover the mine-field, though without this submarine mining was useless.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must call the attention of the hon. Member to the fact that we have passed that Vote.

SIR A. ROLLIT: Then I cannot pursue the subject?

THE CHAIRMAN: No.

*MR. BYLES (York, W.R., Shipley) wished to join his hon. Friend near him (Mr. Caine) in the regret that the soldiers of Bradford should have to wait for another year before they could get the accommodation that was necessary for them; for no town in the Kingdom probably were the working classes better housed than in Bradford, and he thought it was a very great pity that only those in the service of the Queen should be provided with such inadequate accommodation. However, he noticed with satisfaction the definite promise that a sum of money would be included in the next year's Estimates to carry out the work.

SIR A. ROLLIT asked, if he could not put himself in Order by moving to reduce the Vote by £100 in order to draw attention to the question of submarine mining?

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman cannot do that; he cannot go back upon another Vote.

MR. R. G. WEBSTER (St. Pancras, E.) said, he wished to say a word about Stirling and to call attention to the fact that it was the old Parliament House of Scotland.

An hon. MEMBER: One of them.

MR. R. G. WEBSTER said, he claimed it to be not only one of them, but the old Parliament House of Scotland. At the present time, the room that was formerly used for the Parliament of Scotland was used as a dormitory for the soldiers. Considering this was an old and historical building, he thought they should build dormitories outside, and keep this room either for public meetings or for the future Scottish Parliament.

COLONEL KENYON-SLANEY (Shropshire, Newport) said, he wished to raise a question relative to the recreation grounds in London, which was a matter in which he thought the sympathies of the right hon. Gentleman would be enlisted.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! I cannot find anything in the Vote that would cover this.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, that with regard to the question raised by the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Morton) respecting Londonderry Barracks, it was true that that had hung fire somewhat, but it was not from any fault of theirs. The plans were nearly completed, but the works could not be proceeded with until the necessary land was obtained, and it was this that had caused the delay.

MR. A. C. MORTON asked if the War Office could not take the land under the powers they now possessed?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN replied that they could not take it all at once; they were getting it compulsorily. With regard to Stirling Castle, or any such building, the position he took up was this. It had two characters; it was an ancient historical building, and, on the other hand, it was a barracks. He was willing to spend any money upon it that was requisite as a barrack, but, considering all the other claims upon him, he could not take the money entrusted to him for the health and maintenance of the Army, and give it to an outside matter, which was an æsthetic and historical consideration. He should like to see the old Castle put in a better condition, but it could not be done with Army money; the Army requirements must be satisfied, and, therefore, it must be from some other source this money must be provided. He had, however, given instructions that every possible care should be taken of the building by the troops, and that in case of any repairs becoming necessary the work should be intrusted to thoroughly competent men with some artistic skill and appreciation of the character of the building, and not to an ordinary mason. The money taken in this Vote was for the completion of the stores for ammunition. With regard to Edinburgh, the money was taken for the building of a new hospital, and the plans of the much-maligned Royal Engineers were submitted to the City authorities and approved by them and the Lord Provost. As to Blackness, the pier was practically destroyed in a storm last November; and as to Dumbarton, he had gone carefully into that question. It could hardly be called a military position at all, though nominally under his charge. So far as his information went, having had the building inspected, it was not subjected to deterioration; but again he must protest that he could not find money out of his Votes to spend on mere æsthetic, sentimental, or historical grounds.

Dumbarton Castle was of no use to the Army; and if his hon. Friend, or any number of the hon. Member's friends, would join in taking charge of Dumbarton Castle, restoring the building and putting it into a better condition than it was in now, he should be very glad to see it, but he was unable to spend Army money upon it. With regard to telegraphic communication, he could assure the hon. Member for Islington (Sir A. Rollit) they would make all the provision that was possible.

MR. A. C. MORTON said that, with regard to Stirling, the right hon. Gentleman told them he could not use money voted for the barracks in order to repair the historical rooms in the Castle; but why had those historical rooms, including a consecrated chapel, been converted into dormitories and places of that sort? He did not blame the right hon. Gentleman for that; it was the act of one of his predecessors.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, the hon. Member must not expect him to know what were the motives of his predecessors of 100 years ago.

MR. A. C. MORTON: But surely the right hon. Gentleman can put right what they did if he considered they were in the wrong.

MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, S.) asked as to certain repairs to Pigeon House Fort, Dublin. He assumed the cost of those repairs would be defrayed out of this Vote.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Member, but this matter was brought forward last night, and was ruled to be out of Order on this Vote. I then stated that the proper Vote for discussing it was the Vote for the Army Sanitary Committee, on whose advice I acted in the matter. It might also be brought forward on Vote 14.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: But the work was done on the advice and evidence of persons whose charges are defrayed under Item A of this Vote—namely, the Royal Engineer Officers.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: My advisers in this matter were the Inspector General of Fortifications and his officers.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: If the cost of the repairs are not provided for under this Vote, in what Vote do they appear? I am quite willing to accept the suggestion of the Secretary for War that the discussion on this matter should be deferred until we reach a later Vote, but I only wish now to point out that I had good grounds for raising the point on this Vote.

Vote agreed to.

2. £114,500, Establishments for Military Education.

MR. JEFFREYS (Hants, Basingstoke) asked what action the War Office proposed to take on the Report of the Committee on the subject of Army Examinations? That Committee reported, he believed, in a manner not acceptable to the general public or to the opinion of the House; at any rate, in so far as it suggested that Latin should be made an optional subject in the examination of candidates for the Army. Latin was compulsory at the present time, and he thought it was necessary it should be so in order to induce boys from our great public schools to come up for these examinations. Latin, it should be remembered, was an important branch of the education at the public schools. He believed it was generally recognised that the best officers in the Army came from our public schools. They knew what was the opinion of the Duke of Wellington of the boys educated at Eton, and he hoped the War Office would do all it possibly could to encourage those public school boys. He also called attention to the dissenting Report of the three Commissioners (Lord Francis Hervey, Mr. Gipps, and the Member for Chelsea), who said that they saw no advantage in the proposal to remove Latin. Next, the Committee suggested that the medical examination of candidates should be carried on by Boards of Medical Officers specially selected for the purpose. It would certainly be more satisfactory to the candidates and to the general public if a Board of Medical Officers were appointed before whom the candidates could go. As they well knew, crammers told the candidates what was necessary to be known when going before the examiners at either Woolwich or Sandhurst; but other subjects—a knowledge of which was equally desirable in the interests of the Army—were left untouched, and he, therefore, hoped the authorities would give weight to this recommendation of the Committee, because he thought it would be more satisfactory to the general public to have a Board of Examiners. He would like further to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it would not be possible to have the medical examination first, so as to let the candidate know at once whether or not he was fitted for the Army, as if a candidate knew beforehand he had got a medical certificate, he would go into the examination with all the more heartiness. In conclusion, he again appealed to the right hon. Gentleman to continue Latin as a compulsory subject.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, he was in this position: that he could not with propriety express any opinion on the Report. The moment he received it he referred it for observations to the Civil Service Commissioners who conducted the examinations, and one of whom (Lord Francis Hervey) was a member of the Committee. He had not yet received those observations, and, therefore, he was unable to pronounce any opinion on the topics dealt with in the Report. The main and governing objection to putting the medical examination before the literary examination was this: that the examination would not be applied only to the successful candidates, but to the whole body who might come up for examination. This would involve the examination, perhaps, of 600 or 700 candidates instead of 60 or 70; and this would involve a tremendous amount of work.

MR. JEFFREYS: It would prevent physically unfit candidates coming up for examination.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, it would be almost impossible to have the examination beforehand. He was in favour of making it as formal as possible, and, therefore, there was one recommendation of the Committee which he should like to refer to. The Committee said that, in order to prevent as far as possible disappointment, whatever Regulations of the medical test might be made, the fullest publicity should be given, and the attention of parents and guardians directed to them by special circular. This was important. Take, for example, the question of eyesight. If parents knew that the examination was so strict in that respect, and due intimation was given as to the nature of the test to be applied, they might be able to apply that test themselves, and so obtain some security. The Committee further suggested that the medical examination should be carried out by a Board of Medical Officers specially selected for that purpose. That was most essential in order to secure authority and uniformity in the examination. The subject of Latin appeared to have operated on the nerves of the head masters of the country. He was a Latinist himself, and he was not in favour of discouraging or excluding it; indeed, he would go further, and would maintain Greek as well. But it must be remembered that he was speaking under this reservation when he expressed this opinion: that he had yet to hear the opinions of the Civil Service Commissioners before he formed any opinion on the Report. But the recommendation of the Committee appeared to have been entirely misunderstood, even by the head masters. Latin was not compulsory in the ordinary sense of the term at the present time. It was one of the first-class subjects which every one must take up; but taking up the subject was satisfied by writing a name, and a number at the head of a blank sheet of paper. There was no rule just now that a candidate must obtain a certain number of marks in Latin. A boy could go up for examination, and know not one word of Latin at the present time, and yet pass very high among the candidates. What was proposed in the Report was that Latin should be put in Class II., instead of Class I.; that was to say, it should be one of the optional subjects which a boy could take up, and which was to be marked at the same rate as now. Latin at the present moment, therefore, was only compulsory in the sense that no other subject could be substituted for it; it was not compulsory in the sense that marks must be obtained for it. He was not a partisan on the side of crammers, or on the side of public schools. His object was to get the best young men into the Army, to "tap," as it were, the best sources of supply, and he wanted to have the examination so arranged as to make it possible for any well-educated youth to compete with a fair chance of success, whatever the nature of his education might have been. As he had said, he was not a partisan of the class injuriously called "crammers," but neither was he a denouncer of it. In former days, it should be borne in mind, many of the public schools did not teach, and failed to meet the educational wants of the country in any adequate degree. However, he had no wish to favour either crammers or schools, his only aim being that the examination should be the fairest possible test of the general education of the best young men in the country. That test ought not to be confined to one particular kind of education, or to one particular set of subjects. For example, if a lad had an aptitude for scientific subjects, he ought to have a chance at the examination, just as the boy who had been educated in classical and linguistic subjects ought to have his chance. That was the object he would have in view in any decision he might come to. The hon. Member had suggested that he should give weight to the recommendations contained in the dissentient Report, but surely the Report of the majority deserved great weight. He was glad to have had that opportunity of removing a misapprehension which had arisen in regard to the subject of Latin.

*SIR A. HAYTER (Walsall) said, he was sure it would be a matter of satisfaction not only to the right hon. Gentleman, but to the Members of the Committee that the recommendations made last year by the Visitors to the Military College at Sandhurst had been loyally and thoroughly carried out by the new Commandant, General East. In the first place, it struck the Committee and the public generally that it was a mischievous system that the boys should only be employed four hours a day, but General East had now introduced a system under which the cadets were employed indoors at full work for five and a-half hours a day, while other arrangements had been made by which their time was occupied for eight hours a day. Expensive amusements like polo and the gymkana had been discountenanced, and the general expenses had been reduced to the Woolwich standard. The outfit of the cadets, however, was still too expensive, and cost £40, as compared with £32 for the Woolwich outfit. The helmet, which was now de rigueur, and the mess-jacket might well be dispensed with. Alterations ought to be made in the canteen arrangements, which were insanitary, and dangerous from its proximity to the theatre. The canteen was used by 200 employés of the College, and it was essential that something should be done at once to improve it. With regard to modern languages, it was curious that there was no teaching of French or German at Sandhurst. Even if the right hon. Gentleman could not appoint professors of those languages at the College, as they had at Woolwich, he might encourage the study of French and German by directing that marks should be given for those subjects, which were daily becoming more and more necessary, in the final examination for commissions.

*MR. WHITMORE (Chelsea) said, he should like to explain what, in the view of the dissentient Members of the Committee, would be the effect of making Latin an optional instead of a compulsory subject. They considered that a distinct blow would be dealt at Latin as a subject of education if that language were put in the same class with French and German. At present it was necessary to take up Latin and one foreign language. If under the new system it should become possible for candidates to take up both French and German to the exclusion of Latin, fathers would be tempted to send their sons abroad to learn foreign languages, or to crammers, of whom perhaps they would be able to learn those languages more easily than they would at public schools. He was sorry to hear the right hon. Gentleman rather ridicule the opinion of the head masters; surely they were the best possible judges of what would be the effect of this proposed change on the education given in their schools, and as they unanimously agreed that giving effect to the Report of the majority would be a deterrent to instruction in Latin and would make it harder for the public schools to compete with crammers in the sending up of candidates, he would suggest that while the Report was signed by a majority of the Committee, the views of the dissentients, backed up as they were by the educational authorities, were entitled to serious consideration. It was admitted by the majority, as much as by the minority, on the Committee that in the interests of the Army every encouragement should be given to candidates to go straight from public schools to Sandhurst or Woolwich. The Committee also came to the conclusion, after thoroughly considering the matter, that the present system of medical examination was a rather haphazard one, and not nearly so satisfactory as it ought to be. They hoped that in the future the medical test would be made an efficient one and a final one, as it was a very hard thing for a young man that he should be allowed to go up to Sandhurst or Woolwich and spend time there unnecessarily, only to discover eventually that he was unfit for the Army, because he was medically unfit to pass the medical examination.

*SIR A. ROLLIT said, he was of opinion that the proposal to make Latin optional was a movement in the right direction. Personally, he could not help thinking that the public schools had attached too much importance to one particular mode of instruction. The study of modern languages was absolutely necessary, not only for the purposes of intercommunication, but also for properly understanding modern military systems. The Report on military education seemed to him to be a very proper one.

MR. FREEMAN-MITFORD said, it was his belief that a careful study of the ancient languages was the very best training that a young man could have to enable him to enter any Department of the Public Service. If he had this preliminary training he would very readily acquire the modern languages. He thought, therefore, it would be a very great pity if any step were taken which would destroy a system which, after all, had been most valuable to public servants, both military and civil.

SIR F. FITZWYGRAM said, he hoped that public opinion would override the classical tendency of the great public schools. He was himself turned out of Eton without the slightest knowledge of any subject which had been of the smallest use to him in after life. In this examination Latin was a voluntary subject, but it was not so at Eton, where no boy was allowed to join the modern side until he had acquired a sufficient knowledge of Latin for the fifth form.

MR. PIERPOINT said, he questioned whether the study of modern languages would not as well occupy the minds of boys as that of the ancient languages. Some persons thought that Latin was the high road to every sort of learning, but he did not think so, and believed a lad would be better employed studying Hindustanee. Our Army had to perform services in various parts of the globe, and it was most desirable that the officers should be acquainted with every possible language that they might be called upon to use.

*MR. BARTLEY said, it seemed to him that the modern languages were the more useful and their study of more importance than that of Latin at the present time. He was anxious that a system should be introduced by which there should be no gap between the public or the private school and the military colleges at Woolwich and Sandhurst, and that clever boys might pass direct from a good school without having to go to any special crammer.

SIR R. TEMPLE desired to remind the House that a Committee was appointed which inquired into the curriculum and scholastic organisations at Sandhurst and Woolwich, and he should like to know whether their recommendations were agreed to, as he understood they would be? He should also be glad to have information as to the number of students in attendance at the colleges. With regard to the learned topic over which they had spent some time that night, he wished to say that a candidate for the Army just now must take up two languages, of which Latin must be one; that was to say, he might take up Latin and French, or Latin and German, or Latin and Russian. Under the new rule Latin would not be obligatory. The two languages might be German and French or French and Russian. He feared that owing to the greater facilities for learning French and German there would be a temptation to take on those languages at the expense of Latin. Latin would continue to be a main subject in our public schools, and the new rule would give an undue preference to men educated, say, at Bonn or Heidelberg over those educated in the public schools, say, at Rugby or Harrow. The real question was, which was the more important to a British officer, formation of character or a colloquial knowledge of modern languages; and who would make the best British officer, a man educated abroad or at one of our public schools? He had no doubt that the new rule, if carried out, would diminish the proportion of young men of British training in the Army, and increase the proportion of those young Englishmen who had got their education and their ideas in the countries across the Channel.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, that the number of cadets at Sandhurst was 350 and at Woolwich 200, these figures being based on the average of the past two years. The Committee of which the hon. Member opposite was a member had made various recommendations. He could not say that they had all been carried out, but some of them had been. But what the hon. Member behind him had referred to more directly was a more recent recommendation, or series of recommendations, by himself and his colleagues who formed the Board of Visitors last year. He was glad to hear that these gentlemen in their visit this year found almost all the recommendations bearing upon the healthy efficiency of the college carried out. He had taken note of the remarks which had been made on the subject of foreign languages. He was glad so much had been done in the way of reducing the expense for uniforms, and he hoped that, if reasonably possible, further reductions in expense would be made.

THE CASE OF DR. CORBETT.

MR. CLANCY said, he was very sorry to be obliged to interpose before the Vote was taken with regard to the administration of the College at Netley. He regretted to have to allude to the matter, as he had made an effort in private with the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) to come to a decision so as to avoid the necessity of referring to this subject in public. He was sure the right hon. Gentleman would appreciate the reasons which induced him to make that private representation to him rather than mention the matter in public. The subject was as to the retirement of Dr. Corbett, a gentleman who had been studying at Netley for some time, and who, he understood, but for the facts to which he (Mr. Clancy) was going to refer, would in the course of a few weeks have been gazetted to an appointment in the Public Service. The facts of the case were these : He understood that last winter a dance of some sort or other took place at Netley, and that amongst the persons who attended that dance, which was given by the wives of the men belonging to one of the establishments, there were seven or eight gentlemen belonging to the Medical Service at Netley. Unfortunately, the whole of those gentlemen took a little too much to drink. So far as he could find out they also committed what he believed was an offence against military discipline—namely, they treated the men. He had no sympathy with persons who got drunk, and he had nothing to say in defence of persons who offended against military discipline when they knew the rules under which they took service. But what he complained of in this case was unequal treatment. This gentleman (Dr. Corbett) was brought up before his superior officer and talked to and reprimanded. If the matter had ended there, and if all the other persons concerned had been treated in the same way he thought justice would have been done. But, after Dr. Corbett had received this reprimand, and after he had come to the conclusion that the whole thing was over, he was ordered up for trial on the charge of being drunk and disorderly on the occasion of the dance. The result of the investigation had been that he was asked to send in his resignation. He (Mr. Clancy) must say that if he had been in the place of Dr. Corbett he should have refused to send in his resignation, and should have allowed himself to be dismissed. If the right hon. Gentleman was not able to give him a better explanation than he had given already, he should retain the opinion that Dr. Corbett had been treated unequally, and for a very special reason. He had asked the right hon. Gentleman to allow himself and the hon. and gallant Member for Galway to look at the evidence taken in the case. The right hon. Gentleman had refused him leave even to read it. Therefore, he was unable to say exactly what was the wrong given in evidence against this young gentleman. But he was able to say this on the statement which Dr. Corbett had made to him : that he had received an excellent character from the Catholic chaplain of the place, and there were evidences in the amount of his wine bill to show that he had been the reverse of a drunkard, and that there was no charge against him barring this particular occasion. In fact, he was a well-conducted young fellow. Nevertheless, he was requested to send in his resignation. In the absence of the documents which he had asked for he (Mr. Clancy) had no hesitation in saying that this young man, out of six or seven who sinned in a similar way, was treated in the manner in which he had been treated for the reason that he was an Irishman and a Catholic—the only Irishman and Catholic amongst the lot. That was a reason which public opinion, at all events in Ireland, would not regard as a sufficient justification for the treatment to which Dr. Corbett had been subjected. He (Mr. Clancy) did not desire to enter upon a long discussion on this matter, but he would add this : that he fancied the right hon. Gentleman had refused redress to this young man because he did not like to override the decision come to by the Military Authorities at Netley. In the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman he supposed it would have degraded those officials in the eyes of those whom they were engaged in teaching. That might be a consideration of some weight ; but, on the other hand, he should recollect the injury this young man had suffered, and moreover that there might be many persons in his position who would shun Netley, especially Irishmen and Roman Catholics, if conduct of this sort was allowed to go on with impunity. The right hon. Gentleman might say, perhaps, that no great harm had been done to Dr. Corbett, that he was a young man on the threshold of life in his profession, and that he would be able to practise medicine outside. He trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would hardly put forward that plea, because it was obvious that this young man was on the threshold of life he would all through his career have this stain upon his character, and probably on the next occasion when he sought a public appointment he would find this an effectual bar to his getting it. He trusted the right hon. Gentleman would still find it possible to mitigate to some extent the injury which he had caused Dr. Corbett, and would reinstate him—formally, at least.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, the hon. Gentleman had brought forward this case with great moderation, and he was not sorry that he had brought it forward. The case had come under his notice immediately after it occurred, and he had been at first disposed to take a somewhat lenient view of it. That view was shared by the Inspector General of the Army Medical Department; but, on looking into the matter more closely, he came to another conclusion. It must be remembered that Dr. Corbett was at Netley with some comrades as probationers; he was undergoing a course of instruction in that character; he was not a commissioned officer in the true sense of the term. He had misconducted himself on this occasion. Need he (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) tell the House that if he had the slightest suspicion or ground for believing that Dr. Corbett had suffered because he was an Irishman or a Catholic, he would reinstate him tomorrow; but he assured the hon. Gentleman that there was no justification whatever for that suspicion. Dr. Corbett did misconduct himself on that occasion. The matter was inquired into by the professors at Netley, who were his proper military superiors, and they came to the conclusion that he ought to be called upon to resign. The case came up to headquarters. The Military Authorities who were consulted in the matter as a question of discipline took a strong view upon the subject. It did not come before him (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) as Secretary for War. But the hon. Gentleman opposite and relatives and others interested in the case of Dr. Corbett drew his attention to the matter, and it was a question as to whether he should override the opinion of the authorities at Netley and interfere from a disciplinary point of view with the arrangements there. He had found himself unable to do that. It would never do in a matter of this kind, where questions of discipline were at stake, to put aside the opinion of the heads of the institutions in which the persons whose conduct was complained of were serving. The authorities came to the conclusion that Dr. Corbett had committed this offence, and that there was a danger of his not making a satisfactory member of the medical staff if he was admitted into the Service. The hon. Gentleman had made rather light of the argument that, after all, in the case of a young medical man such as Dr. Corbett there was no damage done to him. If an officer who had passed through the Army, and who perhaps had acquired knowledge of a technical kind, was called upon to resign his position, all that he had learnt would be no use to him in his future life; but a doctor who had passed through a medical education which was really a stock-in-trade to him would be able to face the world if he was called upon to leave the Army. He did not wish to be hard on the young man, or to say that he would be likely to misconduct himself in another situation. But having had the opinion of half-a-dozen authorities in this case, he did not think it would be right for him in his official capacity to interfere with the decision that had been come to.

MR. CLANCY was sorry the right hon. Gentleman had not given a more satisfactory explanation of the harshness with which this young man had been treated. The right hon. Gentleman had said he could not sanction the notion that Dr. Corbett had been treated as he had for the reason that he was an Irishman and a Catholic, but the fact remained that the young gentleman happened to be the only Irishman and Catholic among the seven or eight, and he was just as guilty and just as innocent as the rest. In stating the case he (Mr. Clancy) considered he had stated it rather hardly against Dr. Corbett, for the evidence amounted to this, in the language of one of the non-commissioned officers who gave evidence against him, that he was drunk in a military sense, but not in a civil sense. He took this to mean that he was not drunk at all, and that his real offence was drinking with the men. If that were so, and there were six or seven others guilty of the same offence, and he was the only person punished, he being a Catholic and an Irishman, the inference was obvious.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : That is not so. I cannot tell whether he was the only Irishman present, but there were no others guilty of the same offence. He got drunk, and there is no reason to suppose that the medical staff has any prejudice against Irishmen. The medical staff is full of Irishmen, and will be only too glad to have more of them.

MR. CLANCY : Will the right hon. Gentleman grant an investigation?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : No, I do not think that would be consistent with the Regulations.

MR. HANBURY said, there were certain important suggestions made by the Visitors at Woolwich and Sandhurst with regard to buildings, and he should like to get an assurance that they had been carried out. The Visitors described one building as "dangerous, discreditable, and insanitary." In reference to Woolwich they laid great stress on the condition of the Hospital, and reiterated the opinion they expressed last year, that the accommodation it afforded was inadequate in every respect, that the construction of the building was unfitted for a hospital, and that no reconstruction could make it comply with modern sanitary science. He should like to know whether the recommendations of the Visitors had been carried out. He thought the House ought to see more of the Report of the Director of Military Education, which only came out every four years, but which was really a very valuable Report. The effect of the last Report was to show that the education of the Army was very much below the standard attained by civilians outside the Army. The Director was of opinion that the changes made in Army schools during the last few years were not in the right direction. He admitted that the change from regimental schools to garrison schools had very great advantages, but he pointed out that it had some very serious disadvantages. He said that one result of the change was that the commanding officers connected with the schools took much less interest in them than they used to do. The Director was of opinion that this was a very serious loss indeed. Another result of the change was that the schoolmasters were much more frequently moved than they used to be, and this detracted very seriously from the efficiency of the school. Another result was that the men did not attend as much as they used to do, because they were at a greater distance away. The Director remarked that the effect of the men not attending the schools was that when they became non-commissioned officers, not having had a proper grounding in the schools, they found the instruction given in them much more difficult than would otherwise have been the case, and the result was that they had to be let off a great many drills and duties which, of course, fell upon other men. The Director of Military Education also called attention to the fact that the gas was not lighted in barracks till half an hour after sunset, the result being that as the schools were held, as a rule, from half-past 4 to half-past 5 in the afternoon, in winter months, there was very often a long period of time during which education was given practically in the dark, and he attributed this as one of the reasons for their deficient education. From an educational point of view, it really looked as if the education that we had been giving to the country of recent years was of practically very little avail after the children left school, judging from the results attained in the Army. The Director stated that taking the Army all through the state of education was lamentably deficient, and he affirmed that hardly one man in 9 or 10, could either read or write properly. That official quoted a statement made to him by a large contractor, who in 1890 had to obtain a number of labourers in connection with the construction of the Manchester Ship Canal, and who mentioned that only 5 out of every 20 could read and write, and in some cases the proportion was only 1 in 20. In another case a score of men were wanted for the Railway Goods Department in London, and the conditions of education were that they must read and write and add up a few figures, and that 20 men could not be found, although they were quite capable of doing the work required. The Director added, that if that was a fair sample of the state of education in the country among the labouring classes following upon the Education Acts, it was not surprising that the state of education in the Army was what it was, and that the day when Army schools for adults could be dispensed with seemed as far off as ever. That might be a justification for the totally different system which the Army had adopted with regard to the education of children to that adopted in ordinary elementary schools. In the Army schools he believed that there were not tests and sample examinations, but every child was examined individually. There, was, however, no such thing as compulsory attendance at these military schools for children, and the Directors complained that the attendance was very irregular indeed. He would like to obtain an opinion from the Secretary for War as to whether he thought his system for Army schools was better than the system of the Minister for Education, or what was the reason why these Army schools adopted a totally different system from the other schools in the country.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, he took the blame upon himself with reference to the canteen at Sandhurst. It had not been provided for in the Estimates, because he had found better use for the money at present. With reference to the hospital at Woolwich, the medical and other authorities did not altogether accept the views taken by the Visitors, however useful—and they were extremely useful—they might be. But he was speaking from memory, and would look into the question. As to the Report of the Director of Military Education, it was some time since he had seen it; but to begin with, he was under the impression that the Director General could report as often as he liked. It had been his habit to report every four years, and that had been found to answer every useful purpose, but he did not think there was anything to prevent him reporting oftener. The change from regimental to garrison schools, though open to some of the drawbacks which had been pointed out, was, generally speaking, a beneficial one. It dated only a few years back, and the defects would be from time to time remedied. The hon. Member had pointed out several individual evils, as he thought—drawbacks or disadvantages. But throughout the country generally there was a higher standard of education now than formerly. He believed it was a fact which was only too true that children who had been at elementary schools and had been taken away at a somewhat early age were found afterwards to have forgotten the greater part of what they had learned, and that had been sought to be remedied by continuation schools. If those schools were developed men would not be found in the state of ignorance which was described in the Report quoted by the hon. Member. The experience of the War Office was, however, that recruits were better educated than in earlier years. He would look into all the questions which the hon. Member had pointed out. They had a very energetic man at the head of the Education Department, and he would consult him on all the points which had been brought forward by the hon. Member, and in the light of that Report he hoped that any flagrant evil would be entirely remedied. The hon. Member had raised the point as to the gas not being lighted until after sunset, but he believed that was the general practice in all public affairs. It was not an unreasonable thing in itself that there should be some fixed rule to prevent the wanton consumption of gas. He was under the impression that half an hour after sunset was the general rule. He would, however, as he had said, look into the point, which only wanted a little common-sense brought to bear upon it.

Vote agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £130,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for Sundry Miscellaneous Effective Services, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1895."

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; Committee counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. CLANCY said, he regretted that the Secretary of State for War was not present, because the subject to which he had to draw attention was a very important one, and one to which he specially wished the notice of the right hon. Gentleman to be directed. It was a matter which concerned the health of 300,000 people in Dublin, therefore he did not exaggerate when he said it was a very important matter indeed to the whole of Dublin. That city had for a long time very much wanted a system of main drainage. The fact that it was without such a system had been often commented upon, and he had even heard it alluded to in that House as an argument against Home Rule. In the dearth of Unionist arguments against Home Rule he had absolutely heard the fact that Dublin was without this system of main drainage mentioned as a sufficient reason why the people of Ireland generally should not be allowed to govern themselves. The Corporation of Dublin, he believed, at the first moment their commercial position enabled them to do so had taken action in this matter, and at great expense got a Bill passed through Parliament for the execution of an important scheme of main drainage. That was three years ago, and people naturally expected that the work would have been in full swing long since. He himself and others with him thought there would have been such progress made with the work as to justify the expectation that the project would have been completed this year. But not a single step had been taken to carry out the scheme which was sanctioned by the Bill to which he had referred. The reason was to be found in the action of the right hon. Gentleman opposite [Mr. Campbell-Bannerman having now returned to the House], and of his omniscient Army Sanitary Committee. The scheme, it appeared, embraced the laying of pipes under a military institution in Dublin, known as the Pigeon House Fort, and a clause in the Bill enabled the Secretary for War to stop the whole project if he came to the conclusion on the advice of his Committee that carrying the mains under this Pigeon House Fort would be dangerous to the health of the troops stationed there. No sooner was any practical step taken in the matter than the Army Sanitary Committee smelt danger to the troops at the Pigeon House Fort from this project. The Corporation endeavoured to meet the objections of the advisers of the right hon. Gentleman. They summoned to their aid several very competent sanitary engineers and others skilled in sanitary science, and those authorities advised the Corporation that the fears of the War Department in regard to this matter were entirely unfounded. The Army Sanitary Committee, however, held its course, and even as late as last summer he remembered that he himself and the Member for the St. Patrick's Division of Dublin made vain efforts to convince the right hon. Gentleman that the Army Sanitary Committee was taking a very exaggerated view of the whole matter. They had failed to move the right hon. Gentleman, and so the whole summer, which was a very fine one for carrying out work of this kind, was lost, and consequently the opportunity which might have been utilised of pushing their work on towards completion was lost. He was of opinion that the advisers of the Corporation took the right view of the matter, and that the fears of the Army Sanitary Committee were entirely groundless, and even ridiculous, for he believed that even if there were danger it would be of the most infinitesimal character. Considering that there were only half-a-dozen men in the Fort at the time, he thought the idea of stopping the execution of a great scheme of main drainage for the benefit of 300,000 people was a preposterous proceeding on the part of the right hon. Gentleman. He passed on to the next step of the Military Authorities, which was sanctioned, of course, by the right hon. Gentleman. They proposed that the Corporation should end the difficulty by burying the Pigeon House Fort. The Corporation were perfectly willing to end the matter in that way, and to pay a reasonable sum for this absurd and antiquated institution and the site upon which it was built; but they were asked to pay the extravagant sum of £65,000—a sum which would have added actually a fourth to the whole sum needed for carrying out the entire scheme of main drainage. They did not accept this offer, and now things had become infinitely worse than ever they were before. He had that day taken an opportunity of ascertaining how matters really stood, and he had before him a telegram stating that the demands of the War Office in this matter had been much increased since the deputation waited on the right hon. Gentleman last year. [Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN indicated dissent.] Last year the demand of the War Office was that the Corporation should pay £65,000 for the Pigeon House Fort. And now it appeared that in addition to that they required that the harbour in the immediate neighbourhood should be maintained and dredged at the expense of the Corporation; that a boat and boatman should be maintained for the use of the troops stationed there; that sites should be provided for quick-firing guns in the neighbourhood; and also for a submarine mining station. They also prohibited the Corporation from using the fort for building purposes in connection with sewage works, because of the possible injury that it might do to the men stationed there. Beyond this he was informed that they required the Corporation to purchase a new site for the military stores at the North Wall measuring some 200 feet square. He believed from his knowledge of the financial condition of the Dublin Corporation that it was absolutely impossible that these conditions could ever be complied with. He ventured to say that the terms proposed by the War Office were nothing short of ridiculous. The Government in asking the Corporation to buy the Pigeon House Fort were acting a particularly mean part. A short time ago the War Office acquired in the City of Dublin a site and a building which cost the Corporation of Dublin in the early part of the century £100,000. He referred to Richmond Prison and the grounds surrounding it. The War Office a few years ago laid their hands upon that building, and they never paid one penny to the Corporation for it. Yet now in the matter of a great drainage scheme affecting the health of 300,000 people in Dublin they were asking £65,000 for the Pigeon House Fort, whilst they had £100,000 worth of Irish property in their possession without having paid a penny for it. The right hon. Gentleman smiled at that; but was it not indisputable that the Richmond Prison belonged to the Corporation—that they had paid £100,000 for it, that the Government had got it for nothing, and that therefore they had £100,000 worth of Irish property in their hands for which they had paid nothing, whilst they refused to give up this absurd and antiquated institution called Pigeon House Fort unless they got £65,000 from the citizens of Dublin; and thus completely stopped the whole scheme of main drainage. It would not, in his opinion, be too much if, under the circumstances, the Government were to hand over the Pigeon House Fort free of charge to the Corporation of Dublin. He could tell the right hon. Gentleman that it would be impossible that the scheme of main drainage could be carried out except at an additional cost of £65,000 if the right hon. Gentleman persisted in his demand. The only other alternative open to the Corporation was to come to Parliament again and ask for another scheme, and of course that would involve a further expenditure of several thousand pounds. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would come to some decision such as would enable the Corporation to go on with their scheme of main drainage. He could assure the Government that it was only the pressure of other matters which had prevented an agitation arising about this matter which must have made it more troublesome during the consideration of the Army Estimates than the criticisms of some hon. Gentlemen who sat on the other side of the House. For his own part, unless this matter was settled satisfactorily before next year he would make it his duty to take a more active interest in the Army Estimates than he had ever taken before.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, the hon. Gentleman had stated the case for the Corporation of Dublin in somewhat stronger terms than the deputation from the Corporation of Dublin which had waited on him. But, as he had told the deputation, the War Office had no desire to put any impediment in the way of this great improvement in the sanitary condition of Dublin. As the hon. Member had stated, he had had personal experience, though somewhat limited, of the present condition of the Liffey, and was fully aware of the necessity of something being done to improve matters. Again, as Secretary for War, with a great many troops quartered in Dublin, he was intimately interested in any movement for the cleansing of the Liffey. Therefore, on patriotic grounds and on departmental grounds he should be exceedingly sorry to hinder in any way an improvement being made in the sanitary condition of the city. But how did the matter stand? The scheme of the Corporation of Dublin was to collect the sewage of the city and eject it close to the banks of the little piece of ground now occupied by Pigeon House Fort. Pigeon House Fort was the main dépôt for military stores in Ireland. As a place of military defence it was of little value indeed, but the fort was useful as a military storehouse, and so long as it was used for that purpose a certain number of officers and men would have to be located there. The question then arose whether the proposed sewage scheme would affect the health of the soldiers stationed at the fort, and he submitted the point to the Army Sanitary Committee. That was his bounden duty. The Army Sanitary Committee was an independent body. Some of the officers of the War Office were appointed on it, but it also contained several civilians of high sanitary knowledge and experience. They reported against the scheme, and suggested as alternatives either that the sewage from the town should be carried a little further down the river before being discharged, or that the sewage should be let out only upon the ebb tide, so that it should be carried out to sea and not swept back on the bank of the Pigeon House Fort. After his interview with the deputation from the Corporation of Dublin, and as he was shaking hands with the members at leave-taking, it was said to him, "Why not settle the whole thing by selling us the Pigeon House Fort?" That was quite a new point, which, of course, had not been considered by the Army Sanitary Committee. The War Department had paid £100,000, or something like that sum, for the site of the Pigeon House Fort to the Dublin Harbour Board many generations ago. But he did not go upon that point; and, in order not to stand in the way of this main drainage scheme, which he knew was of great importance to Dublin, he put no value on the Pigeon House Fort at all, but said to the Corporation, "Here we have a fort that is very useful to us as a storehouse, but we will let you have the fort, and offer no further impediment to your drainage scheme, if you will give us a wharfage on the north side of the river, and a sum of money necessary to provide a building that will give us an equivalent accommodation to that we at present possess at the Pigeon House Fort." In fixing the price to be paid for it by the Corporation, he had not calculated what the present market value of the property might be, but what sum would be sufficient to build the new premises that the War Office would be compelled to erect in their stead. He had the matter very carefully investigated, and it was found that to erect buildings which would give accommodation equivalent to that afforded by the fort would cost at the very least £65,000. He went to the Treasury and had great difficulty in inducing them to sanction such an arrangement. They considered that £65,000 would not provide equivalent buildings, but in the end he induced them to sanction the sale of the fort to the Corporation of Dublin for that figure. He should not have been justified, in the public interest, in handing the fort over to the Corporation unless he received this money. He thought the Committee would agree with him in the opinion that the proposal made by the War Office was a fair one, and he believed that many of those in Dublin who were directly interested in the matter thought so also.

MR. CLANCY: Do you refer to members of the Corporation?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, the impression conveyed to him by the deputation was that they considered his offer a fair one. The War Office asked for nothing but the actual amount necessary for erecting other buildings elsewhere, and it was to be borne in mind that if the Corporation thought the sum asked was too high and could not accept the offer, there were two other proposals, either of which would satisfy the War Office—namely, that the sewage should be carried further out to sea, or ejected only at ebb tide.

MR. CLANCY: Were those alternatives possible under the Main Drainage Act?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, he did not know that there was anything in the Act to prevent them. The deputation came to him on September 12, but the Corporation did not send their answer to the offer made until three months after, so that if there had been delay it had not wholly arisen with the War Office. At any rate, the Corporation rebuted the idea of paying £65,000 for the fort, and offered £25,000 for it. Of course, he could not accept such an offer as that, because if he had done so he should have had to apply to Parliament for money to provide equivalent accommodation elsewhere. He could only reply, therefore, to the Corporation that he could not accept their offer. He acted throughout on the advice of the Army Sanitary Committee. Those were the plain facts of the case, stated without prejudice or exaggeration. He had the greatest sympathy with the hon. Member and the Corporation of Dublin in the matter, and he had endeavoured in every possible way to meet their wishes. No one occupying his position could have gone further than he had done, and, under the circumstances, the responsibility of further delay in carrying out the drainage scheme must rest with the Corporation and not with the War Office.

MR. CLANCY said, the reply of the right hon. Gentleman was exactly what he thought it would be. The right hon. Gentleman had not contradicted a single statement he had made, and he had not even mentioned the matter of Richmond Prison.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said that, speaking entirely from recollection, he believed the facts in regard to Richmond Prison were, that the prison having become a "white elephant" in the hands of the Corporation, it was handed over by them to the Government, who converted it into a barracks. No doubt the erection of the prison originally cost the city a large sum of money, but the Government spent more in converting it than a new barracks altogether would have cost.

MR. CLANCY said, the right hon. Gentleman had not denied the main facts of his case with regard to Richmond Prison. The right hon. Gentleman said the Government paid £100,000 for the site of the Pigeon House Fort. The Corporation paid £100,000 for Richmond Prison. Those transactions were closed. The Corporation handed over Richmond Prison to the Government six or seven years ago; and the Government never discovered what a valueless institution it was until they had appropriated it beyond recall. Now the Corporation, in return for Richmond Prison, asked the Government for the Pigeon House Fort. The right hon. Gentleman said the Corporation had made a smaller demand than he had made. He was not surprised at that. Irish deputations were too soft when they came over to London to interview British Ministers. If the Corporation had his experience of British Ministers in the House of Commons they would have struck a harder bargain. The right hon. Gentleman would not find him making such a proposal as was made by the Corporation; and when he heard of it he felt indignant that the Corporation had not stuck to their rights and asked that the Government should give Dublin the fort in return for the prison. His opinion that the Government were acting a hard part towards the Corporation had not been in the least shaken by the statement of the right hon. Gentleman. The conditions imposed it was impossible for the Corporation to accept, and the drainage scheme could not, and would not, be carried out if the War Office insisted upon them. The right hon. Gentleman said that unless those conditions were accepted by the Corporation he would have to come to Parliament to ask for this £65,000 to provide equivalent buildings. He thought the right hon. Gentleman ought to ask Parliament for the money, and this was a most appropriate year to ask for it, considering that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had just passed through Committee a Bill which would add £300,000 a year to the taxation of Ireland. If he continued in this frame of mind they would have to take what steps they could to get him to change his view.

MR. HANBURY said, this dispute affected other people besides the Government and the Corporation of Dublin. It raised the important question of the favourable treatment of the local ratepayer as compared with the Imperial taxpayer. He could not conceive why a special consideration should be shown to the local ratepayer of Dublin, which was not shown to the ratepayer of any other town. Would the right hon. Gentleman be willing to apply to other towns the principle he was willing to apply to Dublin, but which, seemingly, Dublin was not inclined to accept? The state of the case was this. The people of Dublin wanted to carry out a main drainage scheme. The War Office in that town had buildings which cost them £100,000 some years ago.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The site alone.

MR. HANBURY: The buildings would have cost another £10,000.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: More.

MR. HANBURY said, he should like to say another £100,000, but he did not wish to exaggerate. The land and buildings had cost, say, £150,000. Surely the proper thing for the Government to do was to have this property valued as Imperial property, and to part with it only upon a fair price being paid. The right hon. Gentleman declared himself unable from want of funds to purchase property for rifle ranges to render the British Army efficient in the use of the new magazine rifle. The right hon. Gentleman was unable to provide £50,000. He understood, however, that the right hon. Gentleman was willing to hand over to the Corporation of Dublin this building and land, for which the War Office paid about £150,000, at £85,000 below its value. When the right hon. Gentleman taunted Members on the Opposition side of the House with constantly urging him to increased expenditure he should be reminded that the best way of saving the money of the public was not to be extravagant in dealing with public property.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, that because in the early days of the century the Government paid £100,000 for land the hon. Gentleman seemed to think they ought to obtain that amount for it when they wished to sell. But the actual value now was nothing like £100,000. They claimed merely what they would require to reconstruct the buildings they would want.

MR. HANBURY said, that whether the land had depreciated in value or not, the right hon. Gentleman ought to have taken a course which would have put the War Office altogether above suspicion. He should have had a careful valuation made and have sold the land to the Corporation under that valuation. That would have been a business-like proceeding.

MR. CLANCY said, the speech of the hon. Member for Preston displayed lamentable ignorance of the question.

Mr. Hanbury

The British had never paid a penny for the Pigeon House Fort. The land was purchased previous to 1817, when the British and Irish Exchequers were amalgamated, and it necessarily followed that the price was charged on the Irish Revenue. It was not until the amalgamation of the two Exchequers that these charges fell on the British Revenue. Therefore, the ignorant speech they had just listened to fell entirely flat. The English and Scotch taxpayers had never paid a penny for the land.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.) said, he wished to call attention to Item G, grant in aid of certain institutions, one being the Association for Providing Employment for Discharged and Reserve Soldiers. He wished to induce the right hon. Gentleman to increase the grant to the amount of last year. Every year 25,000 soldiers were discharged from the Army. These either went into the Reserves or found what work they could on the land or in the towns. The question was, what became of the men who did not find Government employment and could not get work in other quarters? A responsible authority, Mr. Arnold White, who was well known in the East End of London, and who gave evidence before the Sweating Committee and before the Labour Commissioners, said that a considerable part of the casuals in London were Reserve and discharged soldiers. In General Booth's book, Darkest England, which seemed to have some amount of truth mixed up in it, it was stated that on a certain night at a certain time 10 per cent. of the casuals whose cases were investigated by the "Salvation Army" officials were Reserve or discharged soldiers. These facts ought to be taken into consideration by the War Office. These facts exercised a deterrent influence on intending recruits for the Army, and the Inspector General of Recruiting—General Fielding—said last year that he thought recruiting would never be in a satisfactory condition, and they would never get the sort of men to join the Army that they wanted until the Government did something for the men who left the Service and joined the Reserve. It was said that manufacturers should be ready to employ these men, who were young, of good character, and well able to perform a good day's work; but manufacturers showed no particular alacrity to employ discharged soldiers, their contention being that if the Government did not set an example they failed to see that any patriotic duty rested upon them to take a step which the Government had not taken. One hon. Member who sat on the Ministerial side of the House, and who represented a division of Shropshire, employed a large number of these men. He looked out for them and did his best to get them, and he (Major Rasch) honoured him for it, but Reservists were not as a rule employed by manufacturers for the reason he had stated. This failure on the part of the Government to provide adequate employment for discharged soldiers had no parallel in any country in Europe or on the other side of the Atlantic. In America there was an enormous pension list, chiefly applied to old soldiers, and now amounting to £28,000,000 a year. In France every non-commissioned officer who had served 14 years was entitled as of right not only to pension, but to Government employment. In Germany there were something like 90,000 posts open to soldiers, and in Austria-Hungary something like 80,000 posts. No doubt the Secretary for War would reply that in this country there was no State monopoly of the railway service as there was in Austria, which threw a great many posts open to the disposal of the State. Still, our Government might do a great deal more than they did. There were something like 4,000 or 5,000 berths at Enfield and Woolwich which might be made available for the unskilled labour that Reservists and old soldiers could render.

THE CHAIRMAN: This question was dealt with on Vote 1. I think it was brought forward by the hon. and gallant Member on the question that I do leave the Chair.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, that apart from that he would make an appeal to the hon. and gallant Gentleman. This matter had been discussed and the Government had agreed to the appointment of a Committee to investigate this whole question. Under the circumstances, the most satisfactory course would be to wait for the Report of the Committee.

MAJOR RASCH said, that under this Vote a sum of money was allocated to the Association for Providing Employment for Discharged and Reserve Soldiers.

THE CHAIRMAN: Do not misunderstand me. It is quite open on this Vote to discuss the subscription to the Institution referred to, but I do not think it is competent to go into the whole question of the employment of Army Reserve men.

MAJOR RASCH said, he bowed to the Chairman's ruling. He only wished to say that a great deal had been done by private institutions to which the War Office had allocated funds. The association to which he had referred had found work for 7,000 men with wages aggregating nearly £750,000. If a private institution could do as much during the last seven years, surely the Government, with all the resources of the Empire at its back, ought to do a great deal more. If the Government would devote a sum, say, of £5,000 a year, to the object of finding employment for these men, they would be on the high road towards the solution of the difficulty.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) said, he should like to know why the grant to hospitals and charitable institutions had been reduced by £800 and a new item introduced—subscription to the Army Temperance Fund, £500? He had no objection to the Army Temperance Fund, which was doing good work, receiving attention, though the sum given to it was a large one—as large as that given to the United Service Institution. What he objected to, however, was a part of the money being taken from the subscription to hospitals and charitable institutions. In these days, when everyone thought they should do so much for the old soldier, they ought not to take away £300, or 12 per cent., from their subscriptions towards Army hospitals and charitable institutions.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, the last-named subscription did not take anything from the others. The subscriptions to the different charitable institutions were proportioned to the subscriptions received from the public. He had thought it right to make a handsome contribution to the Army Temperance Society, feeling that the society, which had been carried on in India under the auspices of Lord Roberts, would do good work in advancing the principles of temperance in the Army. As the Society had just been set up in this country, he had thought it only right to make a handsome subscription to its resources to assist in its organisation. He believed that if the Association did anything in Great Britain and Ireland comparable to what it had done in India, it would be one of the greatest blessings to the soldier, and enormously increase the practical strength of the Army.

MR. BARTLEY said, he did not object to the subscription to the Army Temperance Society. He, however, thought it a mistaken policy to make the amount of subscriptions to other charitable institutions depend on the sums contributed by the public. It was hard that in times of commercial depression the soldier should suffer not only in the falling-off of subscriptions received from the public, but in a consequent decrease of the subscriptions from the Government. The system did not seem a wholesome one. Another year they must endeavour to agitate so as to ensure that the soldier should not suffer unnecessarily from bad times.

COLONEL LOCKWOOD (Essex, Epping) said, the whole Army had recognised with great pleasure this handsome gift on the part of the right hon. Gentleman of £500 towards the Army Temperance Fund.

SIR R. TEMPLE said, he wished to call attention to Sub-head B of the Vote, comprising £75,000 interest upon the Imperial Defence Loan. Under Part 2 of the Imperial Defence Act, 51 and 52 Victoria, the Government was authorised to issue from the Consolidated Fund, or else to borrow £2,600,000 for certain great works of Imperial defence set forth in the second Schedule of the Act, such as military stations, harbours, and coaling stations, and the £75,000 represented interest upon this sum at 3 per cent. This sum was paid out of the money annually provided by Parliament for Army Services. They might infer that the whole amount had been issued from the Consolidated Fund, and applied to the works. He should like to ask in passing if all the works mentioned in the Schedule had been completed. Six years had elapsed since the Act was passed in 1888. If the whole amount had been issued and all interest charged, one or two important questions arose as to the character of the debt—whether it was to be considered a permanent debt or a floating and non-permanent debt. On this point he drew attention to Sub-section B of Clause 4. By that sub-section it was provided that all dividends paid from the 1st July last in respect of the Suez Canal shares should be applied in paying the principal of the amount borrowed for Imperial defence. Nothing could be more explicit than that the dividends were to be applied to the reduction of the capital sum of £2,600,000. It was understood at the time the Act was passed that the debt was to be treated, not as a permanent debt, but as a temporary debt, and that it was to be extinguished by the interest on the Suez Canal shares. This process of extinction ought to have been begun and to be going on now; it was a matter of common knowledge that the value of the shares was very great, and that the yearly dividend was probably £1,000,000 sterling, and if that were so only a quarter of the £75,000 could be due now. Yet by some curious process, which he for one could not understand, the Chancellor of the Exchequer in this Budget was taking Suez Canal share dividend to the extent of £260,000, and adding to the Revenue for 1894-95. He could not understand how the right hon. Gentleman could lawfully make that appropriation. There was another point as to whether the debt, being considered a non-permanent one, ought not to come in for extinction under the new Sinking Fund of £25,000,000? It was of importance to know whether a solemn obligation undertaken by this House and ratified by Act of Parliament was being fulfilled.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, this was a Treasury matter rather than a War Office matter. As far as the framing of the Estimates was concerned, the estimated interest on the loan was £76,155, less a small reduction from interest on the Suez Canal shares. A memorandum he had showed how the amount of interest was made up. The amount of debt outstanding was £2,477,000. By the present Budget £2,600,000, the capital sum expended on the Imperial Defence Loan, would be paid off, and therefore the £75,000 would be saved. Of course, pending the carrying into law the Finance Bill, that could not come to pass.

Mr. Campbell-Bannerman

SIR R. TEMPLE: Are we to understand that this item will not recur again?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Not after the Finance Bill has passed.

SIR R. TEMPLE: I do not see why the Finance Bill should be brought into the matter at all.

MR. HANBURY: If the Finance Bill passes, will this money be paid into the Exchequer?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Yes.

SIR R. TEMPLE: Then the Finance Bill does not hold to the obligation imposed by the Act?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: It supersedes it.

SIR R. TEMPLE: Does it uphold the obligation?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: No.

SIR R. TEMPLE: Then what will the Government do in this respect?

MR. H. H. FOWLER: It will pay the amount at once.

MR. BARTLEY said, he should like to point out that the Imperial Defence Act, which the Finance Bill did not repeal, provided that the interest on the Suez Canal shares should on the 1st of July, 1894, be used to liquidate the Imperial Defence debt. That Act was still in force, and it would not be repealed by the Finance Bill. Yet the Government were proposing to set aside an obligation imposed by the Act! He did not think this £75,000 was wanted, and he felt that they were bound to move the reduction of the Vote by that amount in view of the very unsatisfactory explanations which had been tendered to them.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER explained that the Army Estimates had to be laid on the Table within ten days of Supply being set up, and therefore the authorities knew no more about the Budget than the hon. Member. The Army Estimates were framed on the assumption that the existing law would remain in force; but the House had now before it the Finance Bill, which upset and altered the whole of the arrangements of the former Act and provided that the Suez Canal shares should be paid into the Exchequer. Thus the loan would be at once paid off, but until the Finance Act received the Royal Assent the War Office were bound to provide for this sum of £75,000.

SIR R. TEMPLE said, that was exactly what he and his friends were contending. The Estimates were framed on the basis of the law as it stood, and that law he had read out to the House. Consequently the item of £75,000 ought not to appear in them, and he therefore moved to reduce the item by £25,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Item P, £75,000, Interest on the Imperial Defence Loan, be reduced by £25,000."—(Sir R. Temple.)

MR. A. C. MORTON thought further explanations ought to be given to the House. They were told that if the Finance Bill passed the money would not be spent, but the probability was that the War Office would treat the amount as savings, and would eventually spend it on matters not mentioned in the Vote at all. They ought to have a distinct understanding on the point, and he would suggest that the better plan would be to withdraw the item altogether, or to give a pledge that it should not be treated as savings.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, that the War Office communicated with the Treasury, who informed them that, although the Suez Canal shares were hypothecated, no money, except a small sum, would be available during the current year. Under these circumstances the sum of £75,000 was put down. The Finance Bill was not yet an accomplished fact, and the War Office could not act, in framing the Estimates, as if it were.

*MR. TOMLINSON said that, quite apart from the Financial Bill the Chancellor of the Exchequer should in his Financial Statement, that he expected to receive some dividends on the Suez Canal shares during the current year, and if so, the whole of the £75,000 could not be required.

MR. BANBURY (Camberwell, Peckham) said, that so far as he understood the point it was that the interest would terminate on the 1st July this year, and that it was necessary to take the whole amount for the year. But actually only £87,500 would be required, as interest would only have to be paid for six months; consequently they ought not to vote £75,000.

MR. HANBURY said, that when he innocently suggested that the money should be paid into the Exchequer he forgot the power of the War Office to deal with savings. If they passed this item they would be deliberately voting money for the War Office to spend exactly as it liked, for it would not be earmarked in any way, and the authorities would not be under any obligation to pay it into the Exchequer, but, so long as they got the sanction of the Treasury, they would be entitled to use the money for any sub-head in the Vote. They were, in fact, asking for unlimited discretion to spend it as they liked.

MR. BARTLEY said, he thought the Government should ride either one horse or the other; they should either stick to the Finance Bill or to the existing law. If the War Office were going on the existing law, they knew that only part of this sum could be wanted, and the Committee were asked to vote a large sum for a purpose that the Government knew it could not be wanted for. In that case they knew as members of the Public Accounts Committee that it would be applied to other purposes. If, on the other hand, the War Office were going on the assumption that the Finance Bill would become law, they knew that none of the money would be wanted. This was an attempt to obtain £75,000 under this Vote to be used for some other purpose. Such a course was contrary to constitutional practice and to the usage of the House, and he hoped the present attempt would be noted. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had always exhibited Spartan virtue in keeping sums to the year and for the purpose under which they were voted. Yet here he was taking money borrowed ostensibly to pay off a debt, and was going to use it for some other purpose.

*MR. A. C. MORTON hoped it would not be necessary to press this matter to a Division, because if hon. Members were defeated the Department would certainly do as it liked with the money. Could they not get an undertaking that if the money were not wanted for the purpose for which it was voted it should be returned to the Exchequer, and not used for any other purpose? There was, no doubt, an unfortunate practice of creating new sub-heads, and of transferring the money to other votes, and then spending on them what were called savings; and although the Treasury were supposed to protect the Exchequer, they nearly always gave way, and there was too great a tendency to expend the money in ways not previously sanctioned by the House, and thus avoid the necessity for Supplementary Estimates.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, they could not avoid making this provision, seeing that the Budget Bill had not been passed. The money could not be applied to any other purpose without the consent of the Treasury, and, as he was sure that in this case the sanction of the Treasury would not be obtained, he had no objection to give the undertaking asked for by the hon. Member for Peterborough that the money should not be applied to any purpose other than that for which it was put down in the Vote.

*MR. TOMLINSON said, he thought the Amendment must be pressed to a Division. The Government had persistently ignored their arguments that, apart from the Budget Bill altogether, this sum ought never to have appeared in the Estimates.

MR. HANBURY thought the Secretary for War had made a very unusual suggestion, and one inconsistent with the business-like treatment of the Vote. He asked the Committee to grant him the money, and he added, "I will undertake not to spend it." That was a ridiculous proposition, and he could not assent to it.

MR. BARTLEY said, he thought the best plan would be that a portion of the Vote should be withdrawn.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 26; Noes 93:—(Division List, No. 151.)

Original Question put, and agreed to.

MR. HANBURY called attention to the item £25,400 for police employed at Government Establishments. He did not understand upon what principle these police were paid for by the Government. At some of the Government establishments the police were charged under this Vote, while at others they were charged under another Vote. Where did the money come from, the War Office or the Admiralty? That was a point about which he should like to have some information.

MR. BARTLEY said, he should like to know if the police force in Cyprus was put down under this Vote?

THE CHAIRMAN said, any discussion on that matter would be out of Order.

*MR. WOODALL stated that until very recently the naval and military stores were kept conjointly. There had now been a separation, but the geographical distinction between the two was so small that it was found more convenient to have the police in charge under one organised staff.

MR. HANBURY pointed out that a general statement had been made on behalf of the Admiralty to the opposite effect.

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH explained that the Admiralty made a payment to the War Office, who paid the police in charge of Ordnance stores, whether military or naval.

Vote agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported.

Motion made and Question proposed,
"That a sum, not exceeding £257,600, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for the Salaries and Miscellaneous Charges of the War Office, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1895."

MR. HANBURY asked whether the Secretary of State for War really intended to proceed with the consideration of this important Vote? There had been a distinct understanding that Progress should be reported at 11 o'clock in order that the second Order on the Paper might be brought forward.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, the Government intended to act in accordance with the understanding referred to by the hon. Member. The reason why he had not moved to report Progress was that it was not yet quite 11 o'clock. Had he made that Motion, the objection might have been taken that he was proposing to report Progress too soon.

MR. BARTLEY asked when the consideration of these Estimates would be resumed?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : That depends largely on the hon. Member himself.

MR. BARTLEY : That answer may be very witty; but it conveys no information.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : What I meant was that the matter depends upon the course of business, and that the course of business is largely influenced by the hon. Member and his friends.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Chairman do report Progress and ask leave to sit again,"—(Mr. Campbell-Bannerman.)—put and agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported upon Monday next; Committee also report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

(No. 282.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress, 3rd July.]

Bill considered in Committee.

Clause 1.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 16, after the word "shall," to insert the words "if possible."—(Mr. Grant Lawson.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. GRANT LAWSON said, that in answer to the request of the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill and also the representations made to him by the Leader of his own Party, he ventured to make a suggestion which he hoped would accelerate the course of this Acceleration Bill—namely, that the right hon. Gentleman should see fit to make a statement to the Committee, the Committee being, he thought, at the present moment somewhat at sea as to the object of this Bill. He and many of his hon. Friends who sat around him considered this Bill a great waste of public money. The right hon. Gentleman assured him that the objection to the Amendment now before the House was that it would upset the Bill. Then it became material to consider of what value was the Bill which the Amendment would upset. It was very obvious public money would be expended in obtaining the object sought by the Bill, and it was their duty carefully to consider any proposal to spend public money. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would give them some information as to the amount of acceleration this Bill would secure; that was, by how many days would the first election of the Parish Councils be accelerated by the passage of this measure; and, in the second place, at what cost would the acceleration be effected? They knew that part of the cost would be that all the dates of registration to which people were accustomed would be upset, or at all events a good many of them. They had heard time and again there was an urgent necessity for passing this measure. First as to the necessity. He knew very well what it was, but he did not believe it had been stated by the promoters of the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman would remember that he (Mr. Grant Lawson) took a friendly interest in the discussion of the Parish Councils Bill to which this was an appendix. On Clause 84 of that Bill there was considerable discussion, and that clause mentioned the date of the election as some day to be fixed by the Local Government Board, and if he remembered rightly he thought the Secretary of State for India accepted an Amendment from his own side to insert "in 1894."

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (MR. H. H. FOWLER, Wolverhampton, E.): It was there already.

MR. GRANT LAWSON said, that at any rate it was there now. The Register did not come in until the 1st of January, so that until some method was provided for registration before 1895 the election could not take place. It was not their desire to stop an election taking place; but it was their desire that if it was to be hurried on by a few weeks or days, as he believed, at the expense of the public, it should be done with an open acknowledgment that in objecting to the measure and to Clause 84 they were right, and that the Government had made a mistake. He thought this Bill was a mere skilful Party artifice for concealing that they were persuaded during last Session to pass a Bill that would not work, and that if it was to work he supposed this Bill now before them was necessary. He would like to point out that if the Parish Councils were elected in December this year, by the first clause of the Parish Councils Act, sub-section 4, the Parish Councils were to go out in April next.

Mr. Grant Lawson

MR. H. H. FOWLER: No, no.

MR. GRANT LAWSON hoped that the right hon. Gentleman might be correct.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: It will be April, 1896.

MR. GRANT LAWSON said, he was glad to have the Secretary of State for India opposite to him, as the right hon. Gentleman knew every word and letter of the Act; but he (Mr. Grant Lawson) had looked through the provisions and found there was a provision with regard to the District Councils, but he did not come across one with regard to Parish Councils; still, he admitted that he might be wrong. The true necessity for this Bill was because Clause 84 provided for the first Parish Council being elected in 1894. He denied the immediate necessity for this measure. The date appointed by the measure was in September, and as there was nearly the whole of July and August, why should not the Local Authorities spend some of the time in carefully considering the measure?

MR. PAUL (Edinburgh, S.), on a point of Order, asked if the remarks of the hon. Member were relevant to the Amendment before them?

MR. GRANT LAWSON, on the point of Order, said, he would like to remind the Committee that the objection taken was that the Amendment would upset the whole scheme of the Bill.

THE CHAIRMAN: I cannot say that the remarks of the hon. Member have strict reference to the Amendment before the Committee.

MR. GRANT LAWSON said, he would conclude by merely asking the right hon. Gentleman to give them some information as to how far the matter would be accelerated, and what the cost would be to the country.

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE, Bradford, Central) said, that if the Bill were not passed it would be necessary to amend the Act and to provide for its coming into force on some future day in the coming year. As the Bill stood it would accelerate registration, and therefore the first meetings of the Parish Councils, by five or six weeks. The day fixed for the completion of the Registers was November 30; the first elections might take place between December 10. and 17.; and the first meetings would probably take place early in the new year.

MR. BARTLEY asked if they were to understand that these lists would be prepared by the 30th November, and that the elections were to begin about the first or second week in December?

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE: Yes.

MR. BARTLEY said, if that was the arrangement he would like to point out that it was a very inconvenient plan, as they would not be able to get the list of voters until two or three days before the election. That might be all right, but it was not the general rule with regard to these elections, and it was only fair that people should know who were the electors more than a few days before the election. It would be extremely inconvenient for all persons engaged in the election, as it must be remembered that some of these parishes were large, and extended over a vast area. Further than that, the electors were different to the Parliamentary electors, as they included ladies, so that it would be a completely different register.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE said, the point had been fully considered; and as the elections would take place somewhere between the 10th and 17th of December, it was felt that there would be time for the lists to be printed and distributed.

MR. BROMLEY - DAVENPORT (Cheshire, Macclesfield) said, the 30th of November would not see the end of the work, because, by a subsequent Amendment, a new list was to be made; still, he thought it would be possible for the elections to take place on the 10th or 17th of December. It would be equally possible, if the Register came into force on the 1st of January, for the elections to take place on the 10th or 17th of January, so that the present Bill could only accelerate the elections by one month, and what they wanted to know was what they were to pay for that? He did not know what his hon. Friend proposed to do with the particular Amendment before them, but he would suggest that he should withdraw it. He found himself in entire disagreement with the hon. Member, as his own view was that the Revising Barristers would have the heavy burden thrown upon them, and that it would not be thrown upon the Town Clerks and Clerks of County Councils. The principal work of the clerks would be to provide for the printing when the Revising Barristers had done their work, and he thought this work ought to be accomplished between the 22nd of September and the 30th of November.

MR. CROSFIELD (Lincoln) pointed out that in Municipalities no great difficulty was found in getting the lists printed and revised for the elections that took place on the 1st of November.

MR. W. LONG (Liverpool, West Derby) hoped his hon. Friend would not press the Amendment, because there could be no question that the objection of the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill was a very sound one. The Amendment was to give to the clerks the power of deciding for themselves whether they could complete their lists within the time or not, in which case no doubt some of them would say they could not. He thought it would be better for the Committee to run the risk of there being more inaccuracies in the list than anyone could desire, a risk which he did not think was very great. As the House of Commons had decided these elections should take place this year, this Bill was the simplest way of bringing them about.

COMMANDER BETHELL (York, E.R., Holderness) said, the difficulty in the way, certainly in his district, was the printing. His hon. Friend thought there was no difficulty in that, but the Clerk of the East Riding County Council assured him that the real difficulty he experienced, and which he doubted if he could overcome, was getting the lists printed in time. He did not think the right hon. Gentleman appreciated the small facilities there were for printing in small country towns. Later on, no doubt, the Parish Councils would have to set up printing arrangements of their own, and then they would be able to cope with the work, but in the meantime they had no facilities. The right hon. Gentleman said that if the Amendment were accepted it would destroy the Bill. That might be true, but if they could not be possibly carried out what were they to do? No doubt the right hon. Gentleman had satisfied himself that it could be done, but he had very grave doubts whether in a good many agricultural districts, where the facilities were limited, whether it could be done.

MR. GRANT LAWSON said, he did not desire to press the Amendment, but he must confess that without it the Bill would be left in this position; that, whether they could do it or not, they were to do it by the 30th of November. For his part, he did not quite see the objection to having the elections at different times, because the 12,000 elections would involve a good many ballot-boxes.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry) thought the Amendment was most reasonable, and ought to have been accepted by the Government. They were told that if this Bill was not passed, they would have to bring in an amending Act, but he considered, and had frequently told the right hon. Gentleman, that it would be necessary to bring in a good many amending Acts before they would make the Parish Councils Act possible. The question was whether the work could be done in the time, and he was told by a gentleman who knew a good deal of the matter, that it was impossible for him to hurry forward a matter of this sort in the way the right hon. Gentleman apparently desired. The question of area, the question of registration, the question of getting voters put upon the list according to their different parishes and localities, would not be such an easy matter; they could not arrange the voters until they had arranged the area, and the areas, as the right hon. Gentleman knew, were very difficult matters, and were taxing to the utmost the abilities of the County Councils in every part of the country. Under these circumstances, he thought they would do well to put in the words "if possible."

MR. BANBURY (Camberwell, Peckham) asked the right hon. Gentleman if he could give them any information as to the extra cost that would be occasioned by the passing of this Bill?

THE CHAIRMAN: I do not think the hon. Member can go into that, as I do not think it arises upon this Amendment.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston) said, he was informed that one of the causes of the difficulty was the number of boroughs in which the municipal borough was not co-terminous with the Parliamentary borough.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The Amendment is simply to insert after "shall" the words "if possible."

MR. TOMLINSON said, he was told that was the real difficulty, and he should like to know if the right hon. Gentleman could give them any information upon the point?

*COLONEL HUGHES (Woolwich) said, he could assure hon. Members that their fears were groundless. They had an acceleration Bill for registration purposes in 1867, and that worked thoroughly well. The officials were accustomed to the work, and the printers were able to produce the lists at the proper time. In most cases the type was kept standing from the Overseers' Lists. He thought it was very desirable these elections should take place before Christmas, and an Act of Parliament having been passed they were bound to obey it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question proposed, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

MR. BROMLEY - DAVENPORT said, that before they passed this clause he wished to point out that on Subsection 6 they came to a very important question. He believed this subsection provided for the cost of the additional Revising Barristers who were to be paid out of moneys provided by Parliament. He should like to know if the right hon. Gentleman had formed any estimate of the number of additional barristers required, and in the next place he would like to know by whom these Revising Barristers were to be employed, whether they were to be employed by the right hon. Gentleman or the Judges on Circuit? And, above all things, were the existing staff of Revising Barristers to be allowed to have any say in the matter, were they to be allowed to make any suggestions or to put in any claim for extra help in consequence of the extra work they would have to do? Further, he should like to know how much they were to be paid, whether it was upon the existing scale, and whether they were to be paid travelling expenses? It had always been a mystery to him why they were not paid travelling expenses. The Judges were paid travelling expenses when on Circuit, receiving as much as £7 7s. a day. Then it appeared to him that the sub-section was misleading, as it seemed to imply that the whole additional cost would be borne by Imperial Parliament and out of the funds of Parliament, and that no additional cost would be thrown on the rates or any other source. That was clearly not the case, and he should like to know what the extra expense of printing and other incidental items would be? The Act of 1888, which was incorporated with this Bill, recognised there were other incidental expenses, as it provided for them, but this Bill ignored them altogether. One item of additional expenditure must be the remuneration that would have to be given to the Overseers for their extra time and trouble. These Overseers in rural districts were farmers and agriculturists, and consequently their time was valuable. They had to go long distances to attend to Revising Barristers' Courts, they had to cover a large extent of ground in looking up the voters who were to be placed upon the list, and as this work might possibly have to be done in harvest time, when a farmer's time was extremely valuable, they would have to be remunerated for it, as they had been in the past, by the Revising Barristers, who always exercised their power of awarding remuneration to the Overseers for the time and labour they had expended in the work. He thought the Committee had not realised how largely they were going to increase the labours of the Overseers by this measure. The extension of the female franchise had been in itself a very large additional labour and worry to the Overseers. He had been told by an Overseer that he had had the utmost difficulty in extracting from lady-voters their Christian names. They seemed in some instances to regard a request for their names as being in the nature of a liberty, and an attempt on the part of the Overseer to obtain the disclosure of something of a domestic secret. The Revising Barristers would certainly have very considerably to increase the remuneration paid to Overseers at present. This Bill was rendered necessary by the action of Parliament, and Parliament therefore ought to bear the cost which the carrying out of the Bill involved. Owing to the length of time occupied in passing the Local Government Act of last year—[Ministerial cheers.] Yes, owing to the ridiculous folly of the Government in proceeding with it at the end of the Session instead of the beginning, it was found impossible to comply with the provisions of the Act without the additional expenditure which this Bill would involve. That being so, he respectfully asked the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Shaw-Lefevre) to see that the additional cost was borne by the Imperial Parliament and was not thrown on the local rates.

*MR. SHAW - LEFEVERE: This sub-section was inserted at the express desire of the Leader of the Opposition, and was part of the condition on which the agreement was made last Session. The number of additional Revising Barristers will, I believe, be very small. I do not think the total cost will be more than about £2,000. They will be paid £5 a day without travelling expenses, and the appointments will be made by the Judges. As to the question whether this clause should be extended to other expenses of the Returning Officers, such as printing, I may point out that that additional cost is not caused by the acceleration of the registration. There may be additional cost for bringing into effect the general Act, but even if this Bill were dropped those costs would still have to be paid. By this Bill I am giving the Returning Officers exactly the same time as they now have for printing. There may be some additional cost for printing under the general Act, but there is none under this.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) pointed out that it would be contrary to general practice to throw these expenses upon the Imperial Exchequer, although as this was an acceleration Bill he thought there was some reason for doing so. He must point out, however, that the measure had been introduced by a Government which was always talking about their great virtue in not allowing Parliamentary taxes to supplement local taxation. That was one of the cardinal principles of the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Sir W. Harcourt), although he was perhaps one of the greatest offenders in existence with regard to it. No doubt this sub-section was inserted at the suggestion of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. A. J. Balfour), but it would not have been necessary if the Government had passed the Local Government Act within reasonable time. He looked with great suspicion on this large additional expenditure, and he thought that, instead of £2,000 being needed, at least £20,000 would be required. £2,000 would only cover 400 days' work, and it seems absurd to suppose that this would be enough for dealing with the whole of the United Kingdom.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause 2.

Question proposed, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

MR. GRANT LAWSON moved, in page 2, line 40, after "purpose," to insert—

"Provided that when the name of a person is upon the existing list of ownership voters for a parish which is divided or altered by, or in pursuance of, the Local Government Act, 1894, the clerk of the County Council shall enter the name of such person on the list of ownership voters in each parish, or portion of a parish so divided, in which the qualification is situated."

He said this Amendment was moved in the Committee by the hon. Member for the Tewkesbury Division of Gloucestershire (Sir J. Dorington). Unless some such Amendment were adopted an owner whose property extended over several parishes would be placed at the mercy of the Clerk of the County Council, perhaps residing a great many miles away and knowing nothing of him. It was the policy of the Local Government Act that a man should be entitled to vote in every parish in which he had property. He thought everybody was agreed that the first Parish Council would have a great influence, for good or evil, on its successors, but many an owner of property might, under the law as it stood, be shut off from voting for the First Council by the negligence of the Clerk of the County Council. The Bill provided that owners might send in their claims up to the 30th of August. The County Councils had not in any way completed their work of dividing parishes yet, and a man might therefore have to claim to vote in a parish which did not exist on the 30th of August and might never exist.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 40, after the word "purpose," to insert the words—

"Provided that when the name of a person is upon the existing list of ownership voters for a parish which is divided or altered by, or in pursuance of, the Local Government Act, 1894, the Clerk of the County Council shall enter the name of such person on the list of ownership voters in each parish, or portion of a parish so divided, in which the qualification is situated." (Mr. Grant Lawson.)

*MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE: As the hon. Member says, this Amendment was moved by the hon. Member for Tewkesbury in the Committee. It was very carefully considered by the Committee, and rejected on the ground that it would introduce a new principle—namely, that of permission to the Clerk of the County Council to introduce the name of the owner on to the list without the possibility of an appeal to the Revising Barrister. The Committee considered that that would be a dangerous precedent, and they refused to accept the Amendment, although it was admitted that there was some reason for it.

*SIR C. W. DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean) agreed with his right hon. Friend that it would be undesirable to introduce the new principle in the way proposed, but said it was a fact that very great difficulty would occur on the subject, and it was doubtful whether an amending act would not be necessary to meet the case.

MR. W. LONG (Liverpool, West Derby) said, he was afraid the difficulty was one which could not be got over. The Amendment was open to the objection stated by the President of the Local Government Board, that it would place in the hands of the Clerk of the County Council the power to do that which nobody else could do except under certain statutory conditions. The Act of 1894 had added to the list a new class of voters, who were not to be found on the Register before—

MR. H. H. FOWLER: Only the married women.

MR. W. LONG: The right hon. Gentleman entirely ignores the owners who will vote in respect of qualifications for which their names do not appear on any existing list at all.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: They appear on the Parliamentary list.

MR. W. LONG : I have been told by numerous people who are charged with the work of registration that in many cases these owners do not appear on the Parliamentary Register, and that their names will now have to be ascertained.

MR. H. H. FOWLER : No person except a married woman can be a parochial elector whose name is not on the Parliamentary or the Parochial Register.

MR. W. LONG went on to say he was informed that there were numerous cases in which the names of men who became electors under this Bill would not be on the Register in respect of the qualifications on which they would have to vote in future. He thought one case was that of an owner of property in an electoral division, either Parliamentary or County Council, which extended into several parishes. His name would not necessarily appear on the list in respect of each of his properties, and it would have to be so entered on the list. If he was rightly informed many owners had not hitherto claimed sufficiently often to give them the votes they were entitled to under the Act of 1894. He, himself, as an owner, claimed in respect of property in a particular polling district, but he had never claimed in respect of each parish. It was, however, no good now to argue that question and he believed he was strictly out of Order in discussing it.

THE CHAIRMAN : I think the Amendment, now that I have considered it, is not relevant to the Bill. It seems to me that it is giving power to the Clerk of the County Council to put people on the Register of his own motion. It is not within the scope of the Bill. I must rule it out of Order.

MR. W. LONG : That being so, I am saved from bringing the guillotine down upon my own neck.

MR. BARTLEY moved the omission of Sub-section (2) in order to obtain an explanation of what it really meant. It seemed to him to be most extraordinary, both in English and in meaning.

Amendment proposed, to leave out Sub-section (2).—(Mr. Bartley.)

Question proposed, "That Sub-section (2) stand part of the Clause."

SIR C. W. DILKE said, the sub-section had been inserted to meet a difficulty that had arisen in consequence of the clerks of certain counties acting on a circular forwarded to them by the Association of Clerks of County Councils. That circular was based upon a mistaken view of the law. The Clerk of the Lancashire County Council had issued directions to his Overseers which were outside the existing law, and had asked the Committee to put in the sub-section in order to legalise what he had done, and to authorise the carrying on of a practice which was very convenient. It might, perhaps, be considered before Report whether the words used in the sub-section were the best.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston) said, the sub-section would be better if the concluding words were omitted.

COMMANDER BETHELL (York, E.R., Holderness) remarked, that the words of the sub-section were rather wide. It was rather a strong thing to call upon the Overseers to obey the Clerk of the Council in all matters relating to registration.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE said, he would consider the matter.

MR. BARTLEY said, it was somewhat strange that the Minister in charge of the Bill should have to hand over the explanation of the clause to a gentleman who was not in the Government. The shipshod way in which Bills and Amendments were now frequently drawn was startling. He thought the proper course would be to omit the sub-section and put in a new one on Report. He was rather suspicious of provisions that were put into a Bill in order to legalise something that ought not to have been done.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry) said, the Committee had a right to expect that some explanation should be given respecting the sub-section by the Minister in charge of the Bill.

MR. W. LONG appealed to his hon. Friend (Mr. Bartley) not to persist in his proposal to omit the sub-section, which was really necessary for legalising work that had been done in certain cases with the object of making the Register complete. It might not be strictly proper that such an arrangement should have been made; but the difficulties that had to be overcome were very great, and the sub-section had been accepted by the Committee as a whole.

MR. BARTLEY said, he was anxious that the Government should get the Bill at that sitting, and if the President of the Local Government Board would go into the question on Report he would withdraw his Amendment.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE indicated assent.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 3.

Question proposed, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

MR. GRANT LAWSON said, he had put down several Amendments to this clause, but did not intend to move them. He felt that the provisions of the Bill would involve considerable expense to the country, but the responsibility of having incurred that expense was on the heads of the Government, and the Opposition would make what capital they could out of it in the country. Clause 3 would place owners in a very awkward position, as it would make them claim in respect of a parish which did not exist.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause 4 agreed to.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Monday next.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 297.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (MR. H. GARDNER, Essex, Saffron Walden) moved the Second Reading of this Bill, which, he explained, was a short measure to simplify various matters which were now rather difficult, and to remedy some anomalies existing under various Acts of Parliament referring to this matter. The Bill proposed to give more elasticity in the way in which these Acts were administered by the officers of the Board of Agriculture, and he hoped the House would permit it to be read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. H. Gardner.)

MR. BROMLEY-DAVENPORT said, this was the first time the Bill had been before the House, and he considered Members should be afforded an opportunity of seeing the Bill before they consented to passing this stage.

MR. H. GARDNER: It has been circulated for some time, with a very long Memorandum explaining the matter.

MR. BROMLEY-DAVENPORT: Yes, but there are so many Bills which the Government have no intention of proceeding with—

MR. SPEAKER: Order, Order!

Objection being taken,

Second Reading deferred till Monday next.

HOUSE OF COMMONS (VACATING OF SEATS).

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire and report on the circumstances attending the issue of the Writ for the Attercliffe Division of Sheffield, on the 26th day of June, 1894; and also to inquire into the Law and Practice of Parliament in reference to the Vacating of Seats in the House of Commons, and whether any and what changes it is desirable should be made therein."—(Mr. Secretary Asquith.)

SIR W. LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth) considered the right hon. Gentleman ought to give some explanation of the necessity for the appointment of this Committee. He thought everybody knew of the circumstances attending the issue of the writ for the Attercliffe Division of Sheffield, and they did not require to know much more about it. What was this inquiry to be? Was it to be an inquiry into the conduct of this House in issuing the Writ? Surely this House was not going to allow itself to have its conduct inquired into by a Select Committee! Were they going to inquire into the position of "Mr." Coleridge? He did not know whether he was Mr. or Lord Coleridge, and he would call him Citizen Coleridge. Were they going to have him before the Committee, and examine, cross-examine, or inspect him to find out whether he was a Peer? It would be rather an extraordinary Committee, and he should like to hear a little more about it before they agreed to its appointment. He should think, at any rate, that they might leave out that part of the Motion which referred to the Attercliffe Division, so that the Motion should read that the Committee should be appointed "to inquire into the law and practice of Parliament in reference to the vacating of seats in the House of Commons, and whether any and what changes it is desirable should be made therein."

That was quite sufficient without all this stuff about Attercliffe. If he were allowed to move the omission of the words referring to the Attercliffe Division he would do so, so that the Motion should read as he had just indicated.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the words "report on," in line 1, to the word "into," in line 3, inclusive."—(Sir W. Lawson.)

MR. ASQUITH observed that this was a Motion which was not made by any desire of the Government, but in order to carry out an undertaking given by them and assented to in all quarters of the House to inquire, first of all, whether the Writ issued for an election in the Attercliffe Division was in accordance with the ordinary practice of Parliament, and, next, into the general question how far the existing law of vacating seats ought or ought not to be amended. He did not think the hon. Baronet ought to object to the first part of the Motion, because the Attercliffe case was a concrete case which brought to the front a great constitutional question on which the Committee could act, and inquire into the general question. The terms of the Motion did not reflect upon the competence of the House, but merely by reference to a particular case proposed to raise a question of grave importance with reference to the position of Peers, or persons succeeding to Peerages vacating seats in this House.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) said, that the circumstances in this case were precisely similar to the circumstances which rendered the seat for North Berwickshire vacant on the accession of Lord Tweedmouth to the Peerage. ["No, no!"] It seemed to him that so far as the great constitutional question to which the right hon. Gentleman had alluded was concerned it amounted really to this—"When are you a Peer and when not a Peer?" He did not think it mattered in the least to decide that question, and the undertaking which the Government had somewhat precipitately given was apparently an undertaking to satisfy the curious cravings of the hon. Member for West Birmingham, who had not taken the trouble to be in his place that night to defend the Motion which was the result of his own ingenuity. There were much more important matters requiring discussion, and it was simply a waste of time to appoint such Committee. The great constitutional question was one of small consequence, and there must have been cases of a similar kind on many former occasions.

MR. ASQUITH said, in reference to what the hon. Member for Camborne had stated, he ventured to point out that in the case of Lord Tweedmouth the Writ was issued on the allegation that he had received a summons to the House of Lords, whereas in the case of the Attercliffe Division the Writ was issued on the allegation that the hon. Member had accepted the Chiltern Hundreds.

MR. CONYBEARE: Is that true?

MR. ASQUITH: I do not know; that is one of the points into which the Committee will inquire. The matter may fairly be submitted to the Committee, and I do not really think my hon. Friend ought to object.

SIR W. LAWSON said, that he would not press his Amendment, and thus put the House to the trouble of a Division, but at the same time he regarded the appointment of this Committee as a very useless matter.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

LICENCES IN LEWIS.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY asked the Lord Chancellor whether his attention had been called to the following extract from the newspaper To-Day (26th May, 1894) :—

"My remarks upon the disgraceful attempts of the Stornoway Magisterial Bench have brought me a letter from a gentleman now stopping in Lewis, which I print, a little shortened :

" ' There are three hotels on the island, and every year for the last four years the renewals of the licences have been refused by the local Justices. No reason is given for the refusals. These fanatics have openly stated that they will vote against every and any licence being granted to anyone on the island. Now look at the results of this action. In the first place, the three hotel-keepers are compelled to travel to Dingwall and back again, a distance of 280 miles. It takes a day to get there, one day to get back again, and one day for the hearing of the appeal in court—in all, three days. Each hotel-keeper has to take his agent with him, and engage counsel from Edinburgh to plead for him. The expenses of the three people concerned amounted in all to £180, exclusive of the loss of being away from business for three days.'

"My correspondent also points out the terrible inconvenience experienced by there being only three public-houses to a population of 38,000. He tells me that from 7 to 10 on a Saturday night, when the fishermen are landing, all the three houses are literally stormed, hundreds being unable to get near them. Lewis affords a very useful object-lesson."

Whether the Lord Chancellor will cause inquiry to be made to ascertain if the facts are as stated in the extract ; and, if so, whether he will inquire of the Justices their reason for refusing to renew the licences referred to ; and if he will take steps to prevent a recurrence of the evil complained of ? He said, that he had been asked to bring this question before the Government and the House on account of the want of opportunities and other difficulties which had prevented its being raised in another place, and those who complained of the conduct of the Lewis Magistrates preferred having recourse to an unbiased person, like himself, rather than to a supporter of the brewers' interest. The advance of temperance was, no doubt, highly to be desired ; but liberty and freedom were of more importance, and if the state of things at Lewis were truly described in the extract on the Notice Paper, it would seem that much tyranny was exercised against men, whose habits and race, and whose calling as fishermen in the stormy seas that surround the Hebrides, made these restrictions more galling than they would be in the case of toilers on land less exposed to the vicissitudes of the weather. This case of Lewis exemplified one of the bad principles of the Local Veto Bill ; not that which would sanction confiscation and the suppression of public-houses without adequate compensation, but the other bad principle of a total disregard for the wishes of a minority, by the imposition of restrictions in regard to wants allowed and not prohibited by their religion. There is an error in the statement quoted in the Notice Paper ; the population in 1891 was, according to the Official Census, 27,045. The 38,000 was probably arrived at by taking the adjoining Island with Lewis. This figure, according to the Bishop of London's scale of one public-house to 600 of population, should give 45 public-houses instead of three. As he took personally the same views in these matters, generally speaking, as Sir Wilfrid Lawson, and the United Kingdom Alliance, he desired to explain why in this case he had parted company with them. It had resulted from the conviction after assiduous reading of the Alliance newspaper, that Sir Wilfrid Lawson was not a genuine water-drinker—that, in fact, he was not so fervent an admirer of Pindar as his opponents were of Anacreon—that, in other words, he subordinated his temperance views to his Radical politics. The conduct of the Alliance in thwarting Mr. Goschen's Bill was a great blow to the interests of temperance. At every annual meeting of the Alliance they appointed their chairman from among the extreme Radicals, and sometimes discredited Radical politicians. The late Lord Beauchamp had in that House led a minority of 17 upon the question of the restriction of bars in railway stations, and the Alliance had no reason, therefore, for treating the temperance question as if it was an exclusive possession of the Liberal Party. In this case there was great inconsistency; there ought to be either no public-houses in Lewis, or else a sufficient number without a fight at the doors. He would be glad of any information the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack could give upon the subject.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord HERSHELL): My Lords, my attention had not been called to the statement referred to by the noble Lord until I saw it in his Notice on the Paper. I am not aware whether the newspaper To-Day is English or Scotch—it has not before been brought to my notice. The noble Lord asks whether I will cause inquiries to be made as to the statements contained in the newspaper extract he has read, the object of the inquiry, as he points out, being, that I am to interfere in the matter to prevent the recurrence of the evil complained of. The law has committed to certain Justices the duty of determining what licences are to be granted and what licences are to be refused. Upon another tribunal is conferred the duty of hearing appeals if licences are considered to be improperly granted or withheld; and those duties seem to have been discharged by the respective Justices on the present occasion. The original Licensing Justices thought the licences ought not to be granted; the Justices to whom appeal was made reversed that decision, and granted the licences. If I, as Lord Chancellor, were to interfere in this case, I do not see what ground I should have for refusing to interfere in every case where it was alleged that licences had been improperly either refused or granted; because if the Lord Chancellor were to interfere in one class of case it is obvious he should interfere in the other. That is to say, it is suggested that he should always interfere if the appellant takes a different view from the Justices. Now, it is obvious that would be undertaking a duty quite beyond the scope of those who hold my office; and indeed it would clearly be impracticable for me to attempt to review the decisions of the Licensing Justices. If I did I should in all probability make a great mess of it, and the matter would be worse conducted than it is by the Justices who have that duty to perform.

Lord Stanley of Alderley

INCOME TAX ON LIGHTHOUSES.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY asked Her Majesty's Government how many lighthouses in England and Wales pay Income Tax; and why; and how Income Tax Commissioners are appointed; and whether Her Majesty's Government will amend the method of their appointment? He said, this question might appear to be either a conundrum or a bad joke. It was nothing of the kind, but was a serious question. He had brought the matter before their Lordships because now that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was making a concession of 12 per cent. from Income Tax on landed property for repairs and such like outgoings, and while the right hon. Gentleman's supporters were saying that was too much, those best acquainted with the subject contending, on the other hand, that it was far from sufficient, it was well their Lordships should know how great was the stress of Income Tax upon property. Everything in the shape of property was subject to it—even lighthouses. The way he discovered that fact was rather curious. He had built a covered market at a cost of £600, to afford shelter to poor women who had to sell their eggs, fish, and so on, in an uncovered market. After it was built he found it was assessed for rating purposes at £16 per annum, which, on his remonstrances, was reduced to £8. It was also assessed for Income Tax at £8, though, as a matter of fact, the market was not at all a profitable affair (indeed, it was not intended to be so), as it only produced on an average £3 17s. 8d. a year. On complaining to the Income Tax Commissioners he was told it did not signify what it brought in, because a certain lighthouse near there had to pay. He failed to understand on what principle lighthouses were charged, unless belonging to a Dock Company, and even in that case the Dock Company would probably be paying twice over, first upon their total profits, and then by separate assessment on the lighthouses. Their Lordships might not be aware that even on sheets of water Income Tax had to be paid. Every kind of property paid Income Tax, quite regardless of whether it was productive or not. His next question was, how the Income Tax

Commissioners were appointed? Many people thought the object was in order to put the screw on more severely. Upon inquiry recently from an authority of Somerset House he was told their object was to avoid friction between the Crown and the taxpayers. Last year he received a letter from a farmer and two traders at Holyhead complaining that the Income Tax Commissioners sitting for that district did not understand their business and would grant them no relief, and asking him to get a business man appointed. Accordingly he wrote to the Inland Revenue Office, and was informed that they had no authority to appoint Commissioners, but that they were appointed by the Land Tax Commissioners, who were appointed by Parliament. Such an instance of circumlocution had rarely been heard of. He then tried to ascertain who were the Land Tax Commissioners, and after a search in all the usual channels of information, Whitaker's Almanack, and similar sources of information, he at last arrived at the Commissioners for Land Tax redeemed, who referred him to a publican at Valley, the Clerk of the Commissioners. At last a meeting took place, but the gentleman who was proposed was objected to on private grounds apparently, but the excuse was that he was too much mixed up in business. That was just the very thing that was wanted. It seemed to be necessary, before being appointed an Income Tax Commissioner, to be a Land Tax Commissioner. So that here was a repetition of the old controversy—"Which came first, the hen or the egg?" It seemed that the Land Tax Commissioners must first get appointed or nominated by their County Member, and then an Act of Parliament was passed every year confirming the names of all those appointed. He recommended his correspondent, therefore, to apply to his County Member, who could do nothing. He (Lord Stanley) then wrote to his County Member, and Mr. Lewis replied that—

"The Act appointing the Land Tax Commissioners was passed in June last year, and it was now too late for him to nominate the gentleman mentioned, and that another Act for the purpose was not likely to be passed for some years."

How could an appointment be obtained under those circumstances? He should mention, however, that two vacancies having occurred among the Income Tax Commissioners instead of two gentlemen in the Holyhead district suitable for the place having been appointed, appointments were made in the Amlwch district, one being Chairman of the County Council who could not have much experience in Income Tax affairs. One of the Commissioners complained of had been paying Income Tax wrongly himself for nine years, and if he could not take care of his own interests he would not be likely to act in those of other taxpayers.

LORD PLAYFAIR : My Lords, the noble Lord asks two distinct questions here. The first is, how many lighthouses in England and Wales pay Income Tax? The noble Lord is, no doubt, aware that there are three Lighthouse Authorities: one for England, one for Ireland, and one for Scotland. All lighthouses under those three Public Authorities pay no Income Tax by Section 430 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854. They are freed from local rates or general taxes. But I suppose the noble Lord's question refers to private lighthouses, many of which are provided for harbours under local Acts of Parliament. The Government have no information with regard to those lighthouses, and therefore I cannot give a reply as to them. I can only tell the noble Lord that none of the public lighthouses under Public Authorities pay Income Tax. The second question is: How Income Tax Commissioners are appointed? The noble Lord does not seem to be aware that at the commencement of every Parliament, Land Tax Commissioners are appointed by Act of Parliament. Last year there was a special Act passed (as is done at the beginning of every Parliament) appointing them during that Parliament. Therefore, I hope the noble Lord is right in saying there will be no more Acts passed for several years, and that we may not require another Parliament before that time. The Income Tax Commissioners are appointed by these Land Tax Commissioners, and with regard to the last part of the noble Lord's question, whether Her Majesty's Government will amend the method of their appointment, we see no reason for changing the nature of their appointment. The object is to obtain Commissioners who are independent of both the Government and the taxpayers —that there may be Commissioners of an independent character acting between both. Her Majesty's Government have, therefore, no intention of proposing any method for altering the appointment of the Income Tax Commissioners.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY asked whether the noble Lord's statement was that it was not necessary for the Income Tax Commissioners to be Land Tax Commissioners?

LORD PLAYFAIR: The Land Tax Commissioners are the appointers of the Income Tax Commissioners.

UNSANITARY CONDITION OF MALTA HARBOUR.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

VISCOUNT SIDMOUTH asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention was being directed to the unsanitary condition of Malta Harbour; if so, whether any remedial measure was in contemplation? He would be glad if the noble Marquess would inform the House whether any official Report had been received of the unhealthy state of this harbour. This was a very serious question, as we had already lost a gallant and distinguished officer, Captain Hammond, whose death was reported to have been caused by Malta fever; and he was informed that a long list of officers and men who had succumbed to the malady had been laid before the public. Those who had, like himself, experienced the effect of a hot season at Malta, must be aware that the pestilential odours in that confined harbour were dreadful. Formerly the evil was not so great, for merchant vessels used to lie off the Custom House, but now, in consequence of recent improvements, most of the merchant vessels in the harbour were moored at its upper end, which was unaffected entirely by either wind or water. There was no agitation of the water there, and consequently the smell in the hot weather was terrible. He was aware that the drainage of Valetta was now carried away, but that did not improve matters for the crews of Her Majesty's ships which lay in a part of the harbour beyond the influence of wind or waves. He suggested that the noble Marquess should appoint a body of experts to inquire and report as to the best means of preventing the evil of which he complained by chemical application or otherwise. During the hot weather it would be wise to moor our ships as far from Valetta as possible. At the time he served in the Mediterranean it was a sort of "canon-law" applicable to ships of war that they should be kept as little as possible in Malta Harbour. At Dockyard Creek the Admiral could scarcely live in his house during the hot weather. He hoped the noble Marquess would consider the adoption of some course for the amelioration of the present bad condition of the harbour, and he would, if in order in doing so, move for a Return of the number of deaths at Malta, showing whether they had occurred or not from the effects of Malta fever.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (The Marquess of RIPON): My Lords, as far as any information in my possession goes, I have no reason to suppose that the lamentable deaths to which the noble Viscount has referred were caused by the insanitary condition of the harbour of Malta. It may have been so, but I hope and believe that it was not. I do not think that the First Lord of the Admiralty has received information to that effect. No recent complaint of the insanitary condition of Malta Harbour has been received at the Colonial Office. Last year my attention was drawn to a statement in a foreign newspaper with regard to the insanitary condition of the harbour, and I thought it my duty to ask the then Governor (Sir Henry Smyth) for any statement he might have to make on the subject. In April, 1893, the Governor (Sir Henry Smyth) reported as follows:—

"It has been shown by bacteriological analysis and by the expert examination of the physical characteristics of the sea water of the harbour that it is now in a very satisfactory condition. It is of a clear blue-green colour, limpid, and free from any bad smell both in summer and winter; although before 1885 it used to become of a chocolate colour in summer, and to show at the surface unmistakable evidence of fermentation. Large sums have recently been spent by the civil as well as by the naval authorities in dredging the harbour, and in embanking portions of the foreshore."

Although that Report was of a satisfactory character, the Colonial Government are not neglecting their duty in the matter. On the contrary, they are continually spending considerable sums in the improvement of the drainage system, and a

Select Committee was appointed in February of this year, consisting of three official and five unofficial members, to inquire into and report upon the further drainage works to be undertaken by the Government and the funds to be provided for that object. That Committee decided to obtain the opinion of Mr. Osbert Chadwick, C.E., on the subject, and more particularly on a project to pump the sewage out to sea through submerged pipes. Mr. Osbert Chadwick has visited Malta, the funds for his visit having been unanimously contributed, I believe, by the members of the Council, and his Report may shortly be expected. In reporting this decision on the 23rd of April, Sir Arthur Fremantle, the present Governor, said—

“I consider that no effort should be spared on the part of the Government to hasten a solution of the urgent questions to be dealt with in Malta with regard to drainage, water supply, and sanitation.”

I hope, therefore, the noble Lord will see that in the first place, the state of things is a great deal better than it was some years ago; and, in the second place, that the improvement had not led the Government of Malta to neglect their duty, as they are now taking active steps to do what is necessary for the thorough sanitation of the Island.

VISCOUNT SIDMOUTH asked the First Lord of the Admiralty if he would give instructions to the Naval Commander-in-Chief to keep Her Majesty's ships as much out of the harbour of Malta as possible during the hot weather, and whether the ships were not kept there much more than used to be the case?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Earl SPENCER): My Lords, of course the subject which has been brought before the House by the noble and gallant Viscount will be carefully considered by the Admiralty. I am not aware that there has been any great increase of fever in Malta this year. The fever varies very much. Some years there is much more of it than others. One of Her Majesty's ships was in the harbour for three months during an outbreak of fever, and hardly one of the men was struck down with it, though, unfortunately, two officers had died of the malady and another was invalided home. That will show how difficult it is absolutely to trace the cause of the fever. As my noble Friend the Secretary of State for the Colonies has said, the Colonial Government has done a great deal to improve the sanitary condition of the harbour, and the Admiralty have of late years done a great deal in the way of dredging an immense quantity of bad matter out of the Creeks. In that way they have assisted the Local Authorities in improving the condition of the place. The Admiralty will bear in mind the fact that in repairing ships of war now the men are detained longer in the dockyards than in former days, and I have no doubt that the Commander-in-Chief will do his utmost not to detain ships when there is any cause for anxiety as to fever at Malta, and in that way will carry out the views expressed by the noble and gallant Viscount.

INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS BILL.—(No. 54.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD LEIGH, in moving the Second Reading of this Bill, said, it only contained three short clauses and was intended to amend the Industrial Schools of 1866. A great deal of good had been done by that Act since it had been in existence. The Report of Colonel Inglis showed that no fewer than 85 per cent. of the poor children sent to Industrial Schools did well, and the percentage would be considerably increased if the managers had the increased powers which it was the object of this Bill to confer upon them by Clause 1. Under the Industrial Schools Act, 1866, the managers had no control over the children after they reached the age of 16. That was a most critical age, especially in the case of girls, and very often when children attained that age bad and worthless parents watched their opportunity to take them away and corrupt them. A Commission sat to inquire into this subject some ten years ago, and it was recommended in the Report that power should be given to school managers to keep children under their control for a further period of two years beyond the age of 16—that was to say, not actually to take them back to school, except perhaps for a short time, but in order to take care of and look after them. That was the recommendation of Lord Aberdare's Commission ; and in his Report for this year Colonel Inglis, Her Majesty's Inspector of Reformatory and Industrial Schools, stated that that was the one amendment needed. This Bill, therefore, proposed to extend the age to 18, as suggested by the Commission. In illustration of the danger arising from worthless and bad parents and friends taking children away at 16, he cited two cases which could be multiplied enormously. A girl, Maud Hesketh, was sent to an Industrial School in October, 1889, having lived with her aunt, who kept a brothel. She was then 12 and was now 16. Her term expired 30th October, 1893, when she was sent to service with an outfit. Within a week she ran away to her aunt, who sent her £1 to enable her to go. Nobody had any authority to take her away from the aunt, who refused to let her go. The next was the case of a boy whose parents took him away and pawned his clothes, and the boy tramped his way back to the school a most pitiable object. He would not weary the House by multiplying instances to show how desirable it was that Industrial School managers should have additional control over the children till they were 18. That power was proposed to be given in Clause 1. Clause 2 provided that "Section thirty-four of the Industrial Schools Act, 1866, shall be read and construed as if the three offences therein severally specified there were added the following offence ; namely—

FOURTH.—Knowingly assists or induces, directly or indirectly, a child living under the supervision of the managers to escape from any person with whom the child is so living, or prevents the child from returning to any person aforesaid."

Under the existing Reformatory and Industrial Schools Acts, as their Lordships were aware, power was given to Magistrates to punish parents and friends of children who knowingly assisted them to escape, and this Bill proposed to extend that power to the age of 18. He hoped their Lordships would consent to give the Bill a Second Reading.

LORD ROOKWOOD said, although some amendment in the drafting of the Bill would probably be necessary in Committee, he earnestly joined with his noble Friend, as one who had taken a considerable part in the management of these schools, in hoping that a Second Reading would be given to the measure. Managers of industrial schools had found themselves very often in great difficulty from the fact that children going out of their jurisdiction at the age of 16 fell again immediately into the hands of those who had previously corrupted them. The addition of two years would give an immense further security and safeguard to children admitted to Industrial Schools turning out decent citizens in the future.

THE EARL OF CHESTERFIELD : My Lords, on behalf of the Government, I have only to say that though in Committee it may be considered necessary to introduce Amendments, they heartily approve of the object of the Bill, and desire to give it their support.

Motion agreed to ; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

QUARRIES BILL.—(No. 149.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE EARL OF CHESTERFIELD, in moving the Second Reading of this Bill, explained that the first section of the Act was to make the Bill apply to every quarry within the meaning of the Factory Act, 1878, any part of which was more than 20 feet deep. Clause 2 provided that certain sections of the Metalliferous Mines Regulation Acts specified in the schedule to the Bill should, subject to the modifications therein specified, apply in the case of every quarry under the Bill in like manner as they applied to a mine. As the law now stood, underground quarries were under the regulations of the Metalliferous Mines Act, while open quarries were under the Factories and Workshops Acts, and were regulated by them, though not as to blasting operations and fencing of galleries and bridges. Clause 2 of the Bill proposed to bring open quarries under the Inspectors of Metalliferous Mines, and, as it had been thought undesirable to have two sets of Inspectors it was provided that in open mines the Inspectors of Metalliferous Mines should enforce the provisions of the other Acts in relation to those mines. When the Bill became law special Rules would be made as to the safety of workmen in regard to blasting, and so on. In fact, special Rules had been already drafted by the Quarries Departmental Committee appointed last year. The Inspectors of Metalliferous Mines would have the necessary technical knowledge for the purpose of enforcing the Rules. As it had been thought inconvenient to have more than one set of Inspectors acting, Clause 3 provided that in open mines the local Inspectors should enforce the provisions of the Factory and Workshops Acts, and should also apply the provisions of the Quarries (Fencing) Act. Hitherto, the provisions of that Act had been applied by the Local Sanitary Authorities, but it had been they had not been sufficiently enforced.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Earl of Chesterfield.)

VISCOUNT CROSS: I have no objection to the Bill, except in one particular. I think confusion may arise as to the depth of 20 feet specified in Clause 1. Of course, as a quarry is being worked it gets deeper every day, and the time at last will come when the Factories and Workshops Inspectors will have to be changed for the Metalliferous Mines Inspectors. I do not consider that definition to be a good one, and I hope that the Home Office will consider the point in Committee. I suggest that to avoid confusion it may possibly be better to put them altogether and place all open mines under the Metalliferous Mines Inspectors; otherwise they will never know whether the mines are more than 20 feet deep or not, and I do not know who is to send them information when a mine has reached that depth.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY thought this Bill was not very necessary. The noble Lord who had introduced it had made no provision for giving notice of accidents. Quarry accidents were not much noticed in the newspapers. As far as appeared, the Quarries (Fencing) Act had not been of much use. This Bill would have the effect of multiplying Inspectors, for a fresh set would be necessary in many parts of the country where the Sanitary Inspectors had hitherto been found sufficient. Very few quarries were less than 20 feet deep. He thought that Sub-section (3) of Clause 2, which provided that in the appointment of Inspectors in Wales and Monmouthshire, among candidates equally qualified, those having a knowledge of the Welsh language should be preferred, was put in by the Government as an electioneering provision.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

SEA FISHERIES (SHELL FISH) BILL. (No. 141.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

*LORD PLAYFAIR, in moving the Second Reading, said: Your Lordships will remember that in 1888 an Act was passed enabling the Board of Trade to appoint Committees to try and restore the shell fisheries, which very much required attention from the want of knowledge shown in dealing with them. It has been found that the powers of those Sea Fisheries Local Committees—which were otherwise working well—were insufficient to prevent considerable abuses. For instance, in part of Essex there has been a serious conflict between persons wishing to preserve the cultch in the oyster beds, and those wishing to take the cultch away to their own districts. This has become a very important matter, and it has been thought advisable by the Board of Trade to protect the cultch and to introduce a few other powers in this Bill in order to give protection to the young shell fish and prevent them being taken away while immature. One of the main objects of the Bill is, therefore, the protection of the cultch. What cultch is may not be known to all your Lordships. When the oyster spawns the spat floats in the water, but it gradually, as the shell begins to be formed by the young oyster, becomes heavier and sinks to the bottom, where if there is mud or sand it gets covered over and ceases to grow. To prevent this the bottom of the beds where oysters and other kinds of shell fish are being cultivated are covered with cultch. Generally, old oyster shells are used for cultch; but pieces of old brick, tiles, potsherds, broken earthenware are sometimes placed on the bottom, and the oysters cover them with spat, which gradually grow into oysters. When examined the pieces of potsherd are found covered all over with microscopic oysters. The Bill is to prevent unauthorised persons taking away that cultch, which is necessary for the growth of the young oysters and shell fish, in order to use it illegally for themselves. The other provisions of the Bill are very simple. For instance, if cultch has been taken away from one place the Fishery Commissioners may deposit it where more suitable—if it has been dredged up it may be taken to a place more adapted in their opinion for the growth of the oysters. This provision is also made for the advantage of oyster culture. The measure has passed the House of Commons and will confer very useful powers on the Fishery Commissioners, who are trying to revive the decaying shell fisheries of the United Kingdom.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Playfair.)

Motion agreed to ; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

THAMES CONSERVANCY BILL.

SIR T. SUTHERLAND (Greenock) said, he had a Motion upon the Paper to recommit this Bill, but he understood the Motion was out of Order.

MR. SPEAKER: Yes, that is the case.

QUESTIONS.

THE EDUCATION DEPARTMENT AND VOLUNTARY SCHOOLS.

MR. TALBOT (Oxford University): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, whether he is aware that, in the case of the North Hagbourne Church of England Schools in the County of Berks the recent demands of the Department involve the larger scale of cubic space, which was understood to apply to new schools only; the condemnation of arrangements completed within the last few years, and recently approved by Her Majesty's Inspectors; and a threatened withdrawal of the grant if alterations involving an expenditure of £250 are not completed by the end of the present year; whether he is aware that a considerable proportion of the population of the parish are migratory, owing to the varying arrangements of the Great Western Railway Company; and whether, if these statements are correct, he will reconsider the imposition of such burdensome terms upon this poor parish?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Mr. ACLAND, York, W.R., Rotherham): The accommodation of this school is reckoned at the 8 square feet scale, with the exception of an enlargement made two years ago, and then sanctioned for 29 children under Schedule VII of the Code. The average attendance of older children last year was 135 in a room sufficient for 112 only, and the usual warning was given. The arrangements condemned related to the offices. These were insufficient in number, and Her Majesty's Inspector reported that the girls' entrance was close to the boys' offices and not separated from them. I do not know how far the population of the parish is migratory, but the attendance at the school has increased very largely in the last two years. The only demand made as regards accommodation is that it shall be sufficient for the attendance. If the population diminishes the attendance will, of course, diminish also. But the managers, so far from urging that the excess of children is only temporary, have submitted plans, which have been approved, for meeting it by the provision of an additional classroom.

MR. TALBOT asked whether it was the practice of the Department that in cases of this kind the cubic space should be calculated on the increased scale?

MR. ACLAND: That is the usual practice for new enlargements.

MR. TALBOT: Is it not the case that the present condition of things at this school was approved very recently by one of Her Majesty's Inspectors?

MR. ACLAND: Well, I do not think that any Inspector would approve of putting 125 children into a room which is only sufficient for 112.

MR. TALBOT: Is that all that is wrong?

MR. ACLAND: Except the very bad condition of the offices.

Mr. Talbot

THE WEST HIGHLAND RAILWAY AND THE FORT WILLIAM FORESHORES.

SIR DONALD MACFARLANE (Argyll): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if his attention has been called to the alleged interference of the West Highland Railway with the freedom of the foreshores at Fort William, and the obstruction to the free use of the slips being caused by the embankment of the railway in question; and whether, seeing that the appropriation of the whole embankment and the fencing off of the lanes and street abutting on the embankment will practically forbid the use of the foreshores and the boat slips to the inhabitants of Fort William and the opposite shore, the Board of Trade will enforce the conditions laid down in Clause 33 of the West Highland Railway Act?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. BRYCE, Aberdeen, S.): My attention has been called to the complaint referred to by the hon. Member, and I have asked the Inspecting Officer, who is now inspecting the whole line of railway, to meet at Fort William the Municipal and the Railway Authorities together, and make inquiry into the complaint. I trust that the matter may be thus arranged to the satisfaction of all parties.

PAUPER SETTLEMENTS.

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the case of Charles Devine, who was removed from Glasgow Workhouse to Donegal Workhouse in 1892; whether Charles Devine had acquired a settlement in Glasgow under 8 & 9 Vic., c. 83; whether a person who has once acquired a settlement can, by reason of subsequent circumstances in his life, be afterwards deported; and whether he will consult the Law Officers in Ireland on this matter?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. J. MORLEY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne): My attention has been drawn to the facts of this case. It is stated in the removal warrant that the man had not acquired and retained a settlement in Scotland, but the Irish Local Government Board are of opinion that he had acquired, though not retained, a settlement in Glasgow. The Scotch Board of Supervision having been communicated with, stated that the removal seemed to have been in accordance with the law, and that on the loss of a residential settlement, by the law of Scotland the birth settlement revives. I have referred the Papers to the Irish Law Officers for their opinion, and it may possibly be deemed advisable to obtain the opinion of the Scotch Law Officers on the question.

ALLEGED INTIMIDATION IN MONAGHAN.

MR. MACARTNEY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the attention of the constabulary has been directed to a placard, extensively posted in the parish of Trough, County Monaghan, and issued by order of the Committee on behalf of the Errigal Imagh Branch, I.N.F., calling on the men of Imagh to put an end to land-grabbing which has raised its unholy head in their midst; whether he is aware that an evicted farm in the electoral division of Fergullia, Monaghan Union, has been recently taken; and whether any measures are being taken to protect the occupier from the intimidation which this placard may excite?

MR. J. MORLEY: The constabulary are aware of the posting of the placard referred to. It is the fact that the grazing of two evicted farms in the locality mentioned has been taken until November next; the tenant is receiving every necessary attention from the police, though I am informed he is not believed to be in any danger.

THE CORVÉE IN EGYPT.

MR. SAMUEL SMITH (Flintshire): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, whether the peasants compelled to work gratuitously in Egypt are punished with fine or imprisonment if they decline to work; whether any provision is made for the cultivation of their own lands while they are compulsorily detained on the corvée; whether the arrangement made for the application of £150,000 towards the abolition of corvée was under a stipulation with France that it should only last until the payment of interest on the Suez Canal shares ceased, as stated in Lord Cromer's last Report, page 2; whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to ask the Powers to take further steps towards the total abolition of involuntary unpaid labour in Egypt; and whether it is proposed by the Egyptian Government to continue involuntary unpaid labour for two years, as is apparently stated on page 9 of Lord Cromer's last Report; and, if so, whether this determination has the sanction of Her Majesty's Government?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS
(Sir E. GREY, Northumberland, Berwick):

As there may be a prosecution for declining to work, I presume there is some penalty, but Her Majesty's Government have no record of penalties or prosecutions. No provision is made by the Egyptian Government for cultivating the lands of peasants who are called out for work, but this service takes place at a time when half the country is flooded, and the mass of the agricultural population cannot work in their fields. The statement made by Lord Cromer as to the stipulation of the French Government is correct. The Egyptian Government is not at present in a position to meet the great expense which the abolition of the summer corvée would involve, and it is doubtful whether the imposition of local taxation would be preferred by the people to the present system. We do not, therefore, think it desirable to urge the Egyptian Government to address the Powers on the subject. The question now under consideration by the Egyptian Government is that of continuing for another two years the experiment of providing paid labour on a small scale. Her Majesty's Government certainly see no reason to object to this, and while admitting that forced labour of any kind is an evil, I would ask the hon. Member to bear in mind that there is no comparison between the grievance of this exceptional corvée at times of high Nile and the corvée which has been abolished.

MR. PIERPOINT (Warrington): May I ask the hon. Baronet whether the Government will communicate to this House a Report on the amount of the involuntary labour performed in 1881 and in each subsequent year, together with the laws regulating such labour and the amount of money paid for it?

SIR E. GREY : Lord Cromer's Annual Reports have dealt with the subject very fully. If the hon. Member will consult those Reports and state what further information he desires, we shall be very glad to consider any request he may make on the subject.

GRAZING ON PUBLIC ROADS IN SCOTLAND.

MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty) : I beg to ask the Lord Advocate if his attention has been called to a case tried before Sheriff Hill, at Dingwall, on 29th ultimo, in which George Campbell, crofter, of Tollie of Brahan, admitted having allowed a horse to graze on the side of the public road, and was fined 2s. with £1 1s. expenses; whether he will state in detail how the expenses are made up; whether he will state in this case, and others of a similarly trivial character, abolish or reduce such heavy costs; and, if he will state whether it is illegal in Scotland to graze a horse at the side of a public road?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR, Clackmannan, &c.): Under the Roads and Bridges Act it is an offence to graze a horse at the side of a public road, "except on such parts of any road as pass through or over any common or waste ground or land not enclosed, or arable on both sides."

The fine was less than half the maximum penalty of 5s., and the costs, which are within the scale of fees permitted by the Summary Jurisdiction Act of 1881, consisted of Court Dues amounting to 7s. 6d., and of charges for framing the complaint and attending the trial, amounting to 13s. 6d. The Crown has no power to interfere in such a case, and I do not know whether the matter was brought under the notice of the Sheriff or not.

PROTECTION OF FISHERIES IN THE WESTERN HIGHLANDS.

MR. WEIR : I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland if he will state when the new steam cruiser, provided for the protection of the fishing interests around the Island of Lewes and other parts of the Western Highlands, will visit Broad Bay, Loch Roag, Stornoway, and other districts frequented by steam trawlers?

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND : G. TREVELYAN, Glasgow,

Bridgeton) : As I have already informed the House, in reply to a question put by the hon. Member for the Ayr District, the new steam cruiser is at this moment in the Clyde. But I am informed by the Fishery Board that she has already visited Stornoway and part of the West Coast on her way to the Clyde, and inquired as to movements of steam trawlers, and will again visit these districts from time to time.

THE SALTCOATS CROFTERS SETTLEMENT.

MR. WEIR : I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland if he can now state when the Report of Sir Charles Tupper on the Saltcoats (Canada) Crofters Settlement will be presented to Parliament?

SIR G. TREVELYAN : The Report referred to by the hon. Member, in the form of an Appendix to the Fifth Report of the Colonisation Board, has been presented to Parliament to-day.

THE CASE OF JOHN SMITH.

MR. GEORGE PALMER (Reading) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been drawn to the case of John Smith, of 56, Silver Street, Reading, a watch and clock cleaner and licensed pedlar, who on 28th May took a return ticket from Reading to Aldershot, having in his possession a silver watch, two old watch movements, and an old metal watch; whether he is aware that, when offering one of these watches for sale in a public-house at Aldershot, a police sergeant who was present took Smith in charge to the police station, where he was searched and locked up, and asked where the watches came from; that a satisfactory reply was received to a telegram dispatched at Smith's request; that he was brought up next day before Major Newcombe and charged with stealing four silver watches, and was remanded till Thursday, 31st May, and was finally discharged, the Magistrate being satisfied with the telegram and explanation given; whether he is aware that all Smith's things were delivered back to him except two shillings, which were retained to pay cost of telegram, and that the return ticket being out of date he had to walk back to Reading; and whether the Home Secretary can see his way to any steps being taken to refund the money to John Smith, who was locked up in error and detained?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. ASQUITH, Fife, E.): After careful inquiry into this case I am of opinion that the cost of the two telegrams sent on Smith's behalf should be refunded to him, and I understand that this is about to be done by the Chief Constable.

SANITARY REGULATIONS AT HAMPSTEAD.

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been called to a rule issued by the Vestry of St. John's, Hampstead, that the waste pipes from all sinks, baths, lavatories, &c., and all pipes conveying foul matters to the drains from inside the house (except soil pipes), and every rainwater pipe, shall discharge over trapped gullies outside the building; whether he is aware that this rule has not been complied with in some of the new buildings on the Grand Parade, Finchley Road, N.W.; and whether steps will be taken to enforce the rules of the Local Authority?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. SHAW-LEFEVRE, Bradford, Central): I have communicated with the Vestry of Hampstead, and learn from them that the regulations referred to did not come into force until the 1st of June, 1893, and that the plans of the new buildings on the Grand Parade were approved by the Vestry in April, 1893, nearly two months before the regulations came into force.

MR. WEIR: Will the right hon. Gentleman cause inquiry to be made into the sanitary condition of these houses?

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE: No, I cannot undertake to do so.

SCHOOL ATTENDANCE COMMITTEES.

MR. H. HOBHOUSE (Somerset, E.): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education if he sees his way to carry out his undertaking of last Session to introduce a Bill transferring the powers of School Attendance Committees to the new District Councils, so as to disassociate them from Poor Law authority?

MR. ACLAND: The Bill I introduced a few days ago, and which is now in the hands of hon. Members, is meant to carry out this undertaking.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT ACT, 1894.

MR. H. HOBHOUSE: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if, under Section 43 of the new Local Government Act, duly qualified married women will be entitled to be placed on the Register as electors of County Councils, or only as electors of Parish and District Councils; whether a Chairman or an additional member of a Board of Guardians elected under Section 20 (7) from outside the Board will be entitled, under Section 24 (4), to act as the Chairman or a member of the District Council of a rural district co-extensive with or included in the Union; and whether the Chairman of a Parish Council who is not a parochial elector of the parish will be entitled, under Section 45 (2), to take the chair at the parish meeting, and to give an original or casting vote?

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE: I am advised that the answer to all of these questions must be in the negative.

DENOMINATIONAL TEACHING IN ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS.

MR. ROCHE (Galway, E.), on behalf of MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he is aware that during the last month a practice has been instituted, and is now going on, at the public elementary school at Prior's Marston, in Warwickshire, of teaching the children on Friday afternoons, at an hour during the regular course of education and when they are obliged to attend, to intone portions of the service from the Prayer Book of the Church of England; and whether such a practice is contrary to the provisions of "The Elementary Education Act, 1870;" if so, whether he will instruct the managers of the school to discontinue it?

MR. ACLAND: The practice described is undoubtedly in contravention of the Education Act of 1870. A letter has been addressed to the managers of the school, stating the matter complained of, and adding that if the practice has been instituted it must be at once discontinued.

GIFTS TO THE NATION AND THE ESTATE DUTY.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the Commissioners of Inland Revenue have received and have now a general authority from the Treasury to abstain from claiming Legacy Duty in the case of gifts to the Nation; and whether it is proposed to extend this general authority to claims for Estate Duty on similar gifts?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT, Derby): No such general authority has been given by the Treasury to the Inland Revenue Commissioners.

PAYMENT OF ELECTION EXPENSES.

MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, in view of the vote given on 25th May in favour of the payment of official expenses in connection with Parliamentary elections, it is the intention of the Government to bring in a Bill to carry out the Resolution of the House?

SIR W. HARCOURT: I would say, in reply to this and other questions, that I am unable to make any statement as to Public Business until after the discussions on the Budget are completed.

THE INHABITED HOUSE DUTY.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the Inhabited House Duty will in future be calculated as at present or on the reduced amount on which Income Tax under Schedule A will be calculated under Clause 35 of the Finance Bill?

SIR W. HARCOURT: The Inhabited House Duty is in no way affected by the Income Tax allowances under Schedule A. It will be calculated in the future as at present.

MINES (EIGHT HOURS) BILL.

MR. LEGH (Lancashire, S.W., Newton): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the Government has given any pledge to pass the Mines (Eight Hours) Bill through all its stages before the close of the present Session?

SIR W. HARCOURT: I have already said, in reply to a question, that I cannot say anything in reference to future Bills, or what course the Government will take with regard to them, until the discussions on the Budget are complete.

MR. LEGH: What I want to know is whether the right hon. Gentleman is not aware that several of his own supporters, notably the Members for Battersea (Mr. Burns), Ince (Mr. Woods), and Normanton (Mr. Pickard), have several times stated publicly that pledges have been given by the Government? I would ask why this information should be vouchsafed to these particular gentlemen and withheld from the rest of the House?

SIR W. HARCOURT: It is not intended to hold it from the House, but as to what facilities the Government will be able to give to this or any other measure I am unable to state until the Budget discussions are at an end.

MR. LEGH: What I asked was not what facilities would be given, but whether the gentlemen I have mentioned are correct in their assertions?

SIR W. HARCOURT: I assume that they are correct in their assertions, but as to the course which the Government will take I am not prepared to state.

MR. BARTLEY: Then are we to understand that the Government have pledged their word that this course will be taken?

SIR W. HARCOURT: I am not prepared to make any further statement on the subject.

DOWNPATRICK WATER SUPPLY.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the discussions at the recent meetings of the Downpatrick Board of Guardians with reference to the new water supply for the town of Downpatrick; whether a sample of the water has been submitted to Sir Charles Cameron for analysis, and with what result; whether the people intended to be benefited by this supply have, as a rule, declined to avail themselves of it, owing to the quality of the water; whether he will state the amount of the original tender for carrying out the contract, the amount already paid by the Guardians, and the amount for which the Board is liable in connection with these water-works ; and if any steps will be taken to remove the cause of complaint?

MR. J. MORLEY : Samples of the water were submitted for analysis to Sir Charles Cameron, whose opinion is that the water is second-rate, but not dangerous. The Clerk of the Union reports that, although there is some opposition to the use of the water, the majority of the people are using it. The original estimate of the cost of the water-works was £10,500, and a loan of this amount was obtained. A sum of £8,274 has already been paid on account. The Guardians' consulting sanitary officer states that the water is perfectly harmless, and will improve even if nothing further be done. The Guardians have, however, under consideration the propriety of adopting further measures to improve the quality of the water. There is at present no scarcity of water in the old wells and pumps in the town which the people can use.

THE CORVÉE IN EGYPT.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether peasants requisitioned for Nile corvée in 1894 will be compelled to supply their own tools, build booths for themselves on the Nile banks, and provide at their own cost the lanterns required for night work, and whether these men will be employed within a reasonable distance, say 10 miles, of their homes ; whether he is aware that on 10th October, 1892, 3,000 men were requisitioned from other districts and formed into a gang of workmen for the province of Chirbin, some of these men being employed at a distance of more than 30 miles from their homes ; whether the compulsion is in practice partly by personal violence, partly by fine and imprisonment ; and whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that the system has been denounced by the present Inspector General of Irrigation as giving rise to bribery and favouritism ?

SIR E. GREY : The custom has been for the peasants to supply their own tools, build their booths, which consist of only a few bundles of millet stalks, and provide their own lanterns. They are not generally employed far from their homes. In 1892 the Nile rose in the late autumn to an abnormal height, and it was, no doubt, necessary to resort to exceptional measures in order to cope with the flood. If personal violence is ever used to compel the men to engage in the work it is not within the knowledge of Her Majesty's Government. Isolated cases of the kind, if discovered, would probably not go unpunished. There are two Inspector Generals of Irrigation, who very likely share the objections of other Englishmen to the corvée system, and, as I have already explained, the Egyptian Government has begun an experiment in order to find out under what conditions and at what cost it could be dispensed with.

MR. LEGH : May I ask the hon. Member whether it is not the case that the continuance of the corvée in Egypt is due to the action of the French Government ?

SIR E. GREY : The hon. Member will find full information in Lord Cromer's Annual Reports extending over a number of years, and I cannot add anything in reply to a question.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

FINANCE BILL.—(No. 303.)

CONSIDERATION. [FIRST NIGHT.]

Bill, as amended, considered.

*SIR M. HICKS-BEACH (Bristol, W.) said, he rose to move a new clause. He had placed two clauses on the Paper when the House was in Committee, but, owing to the general desire expressed that the Committee stage should be concluded on Monday last, he did not trouble the House with either, although he thought they related to a very important question. Her Majesty's Government had admitted with regard to Estate Duty in the second sub-section of Clause 5 that "in the case of settled property, where the interest of any person under the settlement fails or determines by reason of his death before it becomes an interest in possession, and subsequent limitations under the settlement continue to subsist, the property shall not be deemed to pass on his death."

That contained the principle which he desired to give further extension to in the first clause he had placed on the Paper. It contained this principle, which he thought was a sound one, and one which should command the assent of the House irrespective of Party—that no Death Duty whether in the nature of a duty on the corpus of the estate, such as the Estate Duty was, or whether a Succession Duty or Legacy Duty payable by the successor or legatee, should be paid on an interest in expectancy which did not come into possession. Probably the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General would contend, in answer to the clause he had placed on the Paper with regard to the Estate Duty, that although an interest in expectancy might not fall into possession during the life of the person beneficially entitled thereto, yet that the interest might nevertheless be a valuable interest and might be sold in some cases, no doubt, for a very considerable sum. But if it were so sold, of course the money received and left by the person who had sold it would become part of his estate, and would pay Estate Duty with the rest of his estate. His (Sir M. Hicks-Beach's) contention was that an interest which that person did not sell, from which he received no pecuniary benefit whatever or any advantage of any kind, ought not to be charged with the rest of the estate with Estate Duty. No benefit whatever would be received because the man did not come into possession. Practically his interest ceased at his death. Therefore, it was difficult to see—having regard to Sub-section 2 of Clause 5—on what principle the Government, who had admitted in the clause that under a settlement the life interest could not be charged to Estate Duty when the life interest did not actually come into possession, could charge the interest in expectancy with Estate Duty when that interest did not come into possession. The second part of the clause related to Sub-section 4 of Clause 7, which said—

“Where an estate includes an interest in expectancy, Estate Duty in respect of that interest shall be paid at the option of the person accountable for the duty, either with the duty on the rest of the estate or when the interest falls into possession.”

If his clause were accepted by the Government it would be possible, assuming the Bill to stand in this respect as it did, that the duty might be paid with the duty on the rest of the estate on this interest in expectancy before it came into possession, and it might never come into possession. He, therefore, provided in the latter part of the clause that if duty had been paid under Sub-section 4 of Clause 7,

“the Commissioners shall repay such duty (together with the interest thereon at the rate of three pounds per centum per annum from the date of the payment thereof) to the person who paid such duty.”

New Clause—

(No Estate Duty shall be paid on interest in expectancy before it falls into possession.)

“No Estate Duty shall be payable in respect of any interest in expectancy unless such interest falls into possession during the life of the person beneficially entitled thereto, and if there shall have been paid with the duty on the rest of the estate any duty which by reason of the death of the person beneficially entitled to the said interest before it falls into possession shall not be payable, the Commissioners shall repay such duty (together with the interest thereon at the rate of three pounds per centum per annum from the date of the payment thereof) to the person who paid such duty.”—(Sir M. Hicks-Beach.)

Clause brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Clause be read a second time.”

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. R. T. REID, Dumfries, &c.) said, the clause would involve a most serious infringement of the policy of the Bill with regard to the taxation of property passing at the death of the deceased. Part of the property passing at the death might consist of an interest in expectancy, and an interest in expectancy might be of an extreme marketable value—might be worth hundreds of thousands of pounds. Indulgences of two kinds had undoubtedly been shown to interests in expectancy in the matter of taxation for Estate Duty. In the first place, it was optional to the person who was entitled to the interest in expectancy either to pay upon the present value or to wait until the time came when the interest became an interest in possession. That was a very important exception made with regard to the interests in expectancy, because of their character and because it might be difficult at the moment to get the money for the purpose of paying duty upon the expectancy. Another indulgence was shown to interests in expectancy which were the subjects of settlement. But the right hon. Baronet had asked for further benefits for interests in expectancy. An illustration was better than an argument to deal with the position which the right hon. Baronet took up. Suppose a person died leaving £100,000 in cash, and also leaving an expectancy worth £100,000. They would say, for the sake of argument, that that expectancy was £200,000 on the death of the deceased. He left three sons, and the property went in the first place to the eldest son, who died and left it to the second son, who also died and left it to the third. What would be the effect upon these two classes of property? Under the proposed new clause the effect would be that Estate Duty would be payable three times in respect of the £100,000 cash, but not in respect of interest of expectancy until the widow died. But each were worth the same; they were both of them property in every sense of the word; they were property in law, and might be turned into enjoyment at once, and he must say that he could not see why, merely because the one was in the eye of the law not in actual possession, duty should not be payable on the actual value. He thought he had treated the proposal quite fairly, and trusted hon. Members would see that he had drawn an accurate comparison.

SIR R. WEBSTER (Isle of Wight) said, he must submit that what the learned Solicitor General had urged conceded the principle of his right hon. Friend's Amendment, but offered no remedy. He would like to point out that his learned Friend had only dealt with the case of a man who chose to sell and reduce into possession the reversion or expectancy, and he suggested that if the person who would become entitled to £200,000 on the death of the widow should choose to turn it into money, he could do so, and ought to pay. If that was the real case which Her Majesty's Government desired to meet, it could be met at once by an Amendment to the clause, suggesting that if an expectancy was reduced into possession by sale or otherwise, if it was turned into money, then the Estate Duty was to be payable on the value realised. He would point out to the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the Opposition in several Amendments of a kindred character which were moved in Committee admitted that principle. What they ventured to submit was this: that supposing the individual did not turn the expectancy into money, and never got any benefit from it at all, why should he pay the Estate Duty? He would like to add a little corollary to the case the learned Solicitor General had supposed. He accepted the position, and would not argue whether it was just or not, but let them suppose that the unfortunate sons who died had never attempted to deal with the expectancy, the £200,000 which was only to fall in on the death of the widow, that they had not got a single penny-piece. Yet each of their estates was to pay not only on the £100,000 value, but on the increased value, because they would be worth more when the eldest son and the second son died, by virtue of the fact that there would be more years left of the widow's life. He wanted to know where was the equity and justice of causing the three sons, who had never received one penny of benefit from the property, who had not reduced it into possession, to pay three estate duties? That brought out in strong relief the injustice of putting in the same category property which was in possession and property which was not reduced into possession. He must respectfully protest against the suggestion that there had been inserted in the Bill, with regard to the two classes of exception referred to by his right hon. Friend, anything in the nature of a favour. The word "favour" applied to these particular provisions was a misnomer altogether. He did not think the Government had gone far enough; certainly, they had not done more than was just. The Government had no right to show favour; they should hold an equal hand. The provisions alluded to were not inserted as a matter of favour, but because Her Majesty's Government could not deny the justice of the case. They were entitled to say upon this Amendment that exactly the same injustice would be perpetrated if the Government caused people who did not get a penny-piece from the expectancy to pay as if they had turned the property into money. He submitted that the Solicitor General had in no way answered the argument of his right hon. Friend who moved the Amendment, and he hoped the House would support the new clause.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir J. RIGBY, Forfar) said, the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down had said very truly that the Government had no right to favour anyone. He himself would ask, why should expectants be favoured rather than anybody else? There were certain difficulties, no doubt, inherent in the nature of expectancies for which provisions ought to be made, and those provisions had been made. For instance, they postponed payment for their convenience, and, in the case where the expectancy was not a real vested interest, they had provided by the clause already referred to that if it failed the individual would be let off altogether. The case was, however, not the same as the one that his hon. Friend had put before them. Where the individual had the power to bring his expectancy into possession, but did not do so, he, for all that, received a benefit from it as forming at will a convertible asset, and passing on his death to other members of his family. It could not be said to differ for the present purpose from property in possession, or, if it arose out of real estate, was indistinguishable from a vested interest. It must always be remembered that an expectancy could not arise except the property it related to was bound in some way or other. In other words, if there was an expectancy there must be some document that created it. They had affirmed the principle before; they had not allowed it to be said that they taxed real estate upon the present actual income derived from it, for they took into consideration all the expectant value that it might have. They had discussed this matter over and over again, and he did not think there was anything new in it. They charged a man who was the owner of real estate whether the value or the greater part of the value of the property was a value in expectancy or not. It was strictly analogous to this case, and if they were to give up this point they would be entirely running counter to what they had done. If a man had a bag of gold he would be able to dispose of it in favour of other members of his family. He could not see the difference between the expectant value under discussion and a bag of gold which a man did not spend. That bag of gold would go to his descendants, but he might have had the money at any moment of his life. It would be an anomaly altogether to allow this freedom from duty simply because the property, though of great present marketable value, was allowed to ripen to its full value until it fell into possession.

MR. BYRNE (Essex, Walthamstow) said, there was another difficulty not yet met by the Government. The interests in expectancies, which were, in point of fact, contingent interests, might never come into possession at all. There were a large number of interests of this description which were at present of comparatively small value, but which might be of more value as years went on, and might turn out to be of no benefit at all to the person to whom they were originally given. Some of those interests were absolutely unsaleable, and could not be mortgaged; it therefore appeared to be unjust that a man should be taxed on a contingent interest independent, not upon the happening of a death, but of some future event which might or might not take place. In nine cases out of ten that was practically an unsaleable thing, and a thing upon which money could not be raised. He submitted that this was a sufficient reason for a part of the argument of his right hon. Friend who had moved the clause.

SIR W. HARCOURT was understood to say that the speech of the hon. and learned Member was practically an admission of the argument of the Government against the Amendment. If the interest were not saleable there would not be any charge upon it at all, as they only charged upon saleable value. That would meet the substance of the Amendment. The proposed clause raised a new principle, because those expectancies were now practically charged under probate. If they were to open this door everything that was not taken at its full present value, such as building land, would be let out. If a thing was saleable it ought to be charged. A man might not sell it any more than he might sell his diamonds; but any realisable value which a man possessed ought to be charged against the estate under the Estate Duty. He did not think that the right hon. Gentleman had fully appreciated the enormous loss to the Revenue which would result from the adoption of a principle of this kind, not only with reference to the Estate Duty, but with reference to the Probate Duty.

MR. J. LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet) said, he thought the right hon. Gentleman, in the illustration he had given, was rather leading the House astray, and it seemed to him that his argument was very unfair. The possessor of a bag of gold or of diamonds could make use of those commodities at once, but the possessor of a contingent expectancy would be driven into making a ruinous bargain, perhaps with usurers, in order to dispose of it at the ordinary fair marketable value. The right hon. Gentleman knew perfectly well that the purchase of a reversion of this kind was a class of business which was to a large extent in the hands of persons who did not bear the best of reputes. The new clause seemed to him extremely fair, because it did not interfere with the principle that every person was to pay on what he inherited. He hoped the House would support his right hon. Friend.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) said, he wished to call attention to the contradictory positions of the Attorney General and the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The former told them that an expectancy could only possibly arise under a settlement, whereas the latter told them that Probate Duty was payable on expectancies. Now, as no Probate Duty was payable under settlements, and only under wills, he did not see how these two statements could be reconciled.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Is not the hon. Member aware that settlements are made by wills as well?

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, he was aware of that, but apparently the Attorney General was not. All this trouble arose from the fact that the Government had departed from the old principle embodied in the Succession Duty Act. The Government might just as well, in imposing a tax on apple trees, tax the pip when it was put into the ground because some day it would grow into an apple tree. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had cited the case of Toxteth Park, and had said that no duty was charged upon it, although it sold for a large sum of money; but the right hon. Gentleman had refrained from telling the House that it was admitted by the Department at the time the duty was first claimed that the land itself had no value, and therefore it was perfectly right that no duty was charged.

SIR W. HARCOURT said, it was not Toxteth Park, but the foreshore of the Mersey. It was admitted that it did not pay income, though the foreshore was of immense value.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, it was admitted that the estate had no value. He must refer the right hon. Gentleman to the report of the case. He really thought they were entitled to complain of the way they were called upon to discuss these new clauses which were put down—

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, he would, then, only say that they were called upon to discuss them under disadvantageous circumstances, because of the purposely-adopted action of the Government.

MR. BARTLEY said, the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Solicitor General objected to the proposed clause because they said that these reversionary interests could be sold or money borrowed upon them. That might be true; but when he ventured to bring forward a similar Amendment in Committee, providing that in the case of a reversionary interest being sold or money borrowed upon it, then duty should be payable, it was objected to because it was said the duty must always be paid, as the reversion had some sort of secret value which might some day be realised. If they made the taxation of these reversionary interests so high as was proposed by the Bill it would become impossible for anybody but rich men to hold them. Take this case: the reversion of a house worth £20,000. It was held on £5 a year ground rent, and the reversion, at the present time, having 40 years to run, was worth £5,000. As it happened the house he had in his mind was the property of a millionaire, so that the Estate Duty would be 8 per cent. There would be a duty of £400 payable on that house when the present owner dropped, and yet for 40 or 50 years he would only enjoy £5 a year from it. It was obvious that if the house were held by anybody but a rich man he could not possibly enjoy that reversion, but would be obliged to sell it, because he could not afford to pay the sum of £400, or nearly 100 years' purchase, on account of the reversionary value. Every law which tended to the concentration of these properties into few hands was most detrimental, and the only possible result of this Bill, as regarded reversionary interests, must be that they must either be sold to insurance or other companies or must be held by rich people. It was a monstrous thing to make it impossible for people, unless they were rich, to hold these properties, and to make it compulsory that these properties should be sold to Insurance Companies and rich people. He supported this new clause, because he thought it was only equitable, and although they were going to tax all these properties on their gross value, surely they might fairly lay down the rule that only those properties which were really of tangible value to people should pay this duty. It certainly never was contemplated that the taxation should fall upon people who were only, as it were, a sort of pipe through which the property went to those who inherited it. If they were going to make these people pay heavy duties for property from which they derived no benefit, simply because some generations hence their descendants would inherit it, they would inflict a great injury and wrong upon them.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had compared these unrealised interests in expectancy to the possession of diamonds or pictures which brought in no income. They did resemble them in that respect but they differed from diamonds and pictures in the fact that there was no present enjoyment from the unrealised reversions. That was a fundamental distinction which went to the very root of the Amendment. He felt a doubt with regard to the bearing of Sub-section 4 of Clause 7 of the Bill on the question raised by his right hon. Friend. His right hon. Friend desired to stop what he could not help but regard as a breach of fundamental equity in this Bill—namely, the provision by which a man was taxed upon that which he never enjoyed. He understood that Sub-section 4 of Clause 7 was intended in part, at all events, to meet that particular case. It stated that—

“Where an estate includes an interest in expectancy, Estate Duty in respect to that interest shall be paid at the option of the person accountable either with the duty on the rest of the estate or when the interest falls into possession.”

So far the words seemed quite clear. He wanted to know whether they carried with them the corollary that upon every interest in expectancy which did not fall into possession during the life of the person who succeeded the original testator or settlor, the duty would be paid at all, supposing his option was to defer the payment until the expectancy did fall into possession. If the true interpretation of Clause 7, Sub-section 4, was that where a man elected to defer the payment of the tax on an expectancy until the expectancy was realised, and if they were to take that statement as carrying with it the conclusion that if it never fell into possession during his lifetime he would not be called upon to pay at all, then he thought his right hon. Friend's case would be entirely met, and it would not be necessary to press the clause to a Division, his object being carried out by Clause 7, Sub-section 4, as so interpreted. But he might be wrong in thinking that was the interpretation, and the interpretation of the Government might be that the duty thus remaining unpaid was to be charged on the estate, going on through any number of lives, however many lives there might be falling in before the expectancy was realised. If that were the interpretation by the Government of their own clause he thought that obviously there was a great inequity in the Bill which they hoped to remedy, and he hoped his right hon. Friend would divide. If, on the other hand, the Government could assure them that the man who never enjoyed an expectancy was not to be asked to pay on that expectancy, and his estate charged as if he enjoyed it, then all they desired would be carried out, and it would not be necessary to trouble the House to divide upon it.

SIR J. RIGBY : Undoubtedly a man may die before the expectancy is realised, but that does not get rid of the responsibility. He may not be made personally to pay because he is dead ; but his estate will be liable, and his expectancy will be liable, and the duty will be payable whether he lives or dies.

*SIR M. HICKS-BEACH : May I ask, as a corollary to that question, will not the result be this : If a man dies before he has enjoyed the interest in expectancy, having opted to pay that duty when that interest falls in, then the unpaid duty will remain a charge upon that estate, and will have to be paid perhaps with two or three other duties by some subsequent person who will eventually come into the interest, so that the duty will be paid several times over because of the several interests into which the estate is split up?

SIR J. RIGBY : It will be like any other property or any other estate.

Question put.

The House divided :—Ayes 130 ; Noes 189.—(Division List, No. 152.)

*SIR M. HICKS-BEACH moved the following new clause :—

(Legacy and Succession Duties on interests in expectancy in certain cases.)

"Where an interest in expectancy in any real or personal property to which any person shall become entitled on any death shall, before such interest falls into possession, have passed by reason of death to any other person or persons, then one Legacy or Succession Duty only shall be paid in respect of such interest, and shall be due from the person who shall first become entitled to such property in possession, but such duty shall be at the highest rate which, if every such person had been subject to duty, would have been payable by any one of them.

He said, this clause did not relate at all to the Estate Duty, and therefore stood on quite a different footing to the clause which the House had just negatived. It dealt with the same subject—namely, the payment of cumulative duties in cases where the interest had not come into possession, but it was based on a very much stronger argument than that of the previous clause, because the Government, with regard to the Estate Duty, had contended all along that that was a duty chargeable on the corpus of the estate of the deceased and not upon the interest taken by the successor or legatee. The Succession and Legacy Duties were duties charged upon the interest taken by the successor or legatee, and therefore, although the Government might contend that it was right and necessary that the Estate Duties should be cumulative where an interest in expectancy had not come into possession, he did not think it was possible for them to contend that the Succession or Legacy Duty ought in any fairness to be cumulative under similar circumstances. Of course, neither the successor nor the legatee took anything but the interest to which he succeeded by his succession or legacy. It made not the smallest difference to him whether the succession or the legacy had nominally, though not actually, passed through half-a-dozen people before him or not. What he took was the particular thing to which he succeeded or which was left to him, and therefore he ought not, in common fairness, to pay duty more than once on that to which he succeeded. As his hon. Friend the Member for King's Lynn had already pointed out, that principle was completely recognised in the Succession Duty Act of 1853. Under that Act and the existing law a single duty only was payable in respect to any succession which before it fell into possession devolved to a new successor. This was effected in the case of personalty by a special clause in the Succession Duty Act, which he had practically copied in the clause he now proposed, and, with respect to realty, by the nature of the provisions of the Succession Duty Act itself. Of course, the House was aware that under the provisions of the Succession Duty Act, as it stood at the present moment, the succession to real property could only be a succession to a life interest; that the value of the succession was calculated on the capitalisation of so many years' purchase of the annual value of that life interest, and therefore until the interest in any realty which was liable to Succession Duty came into possession it was impossible that any Succession Duty could be chargeable. In the first place, he was advised that so far as regarded realty which was liable to the Succession Duty, the liability to cumulative duties would be imposed, though, he thought, not intentionally imposed by the provision in this Bill, which stated that where a person was competent to dispose of an estate he was to be charged Succession Duty on the principal value, and not on his life interest. He knew that certain words had been inserted in the clause on the suggestion of the hon. and learned Member for the Isle of Wight to meet that point, but he would venture to submit to the Government that as Clause 18 now stood that point was not met. The clause stated—

"The value for the purpose of the Succession Duty shall, where the successor is competent to dispose of the property, be the principal value of the property, and duty shall be charged thereon."

And then the clause went on to say that the duty should be payable with interest from the expiration of 12 months after the date upon which the successor became entitled to possession on succession. He fancied it would be contended that those words, limiting the payment of interest to the date from the expiration of 12 months after the date on which the successor became entitled in succession to possession, would also prevent the Succession Duty being charged in a case where the successor never became entitled in succession to possession. But he would venture to submit that these latter words solely related to the payment of the instalments and to the date from which interest had become payable, and that the duty was charged by the first few lines of the clause which stated that the value,

"Where the successor is competent to dispose of the property, shall be the principal value of the property," and therefore if the Government did not accept this clause it would be necessary on Clause 18 to insert some additional words to make it perfectly clear that the Succession Duty when charged on the principal value, as provided by the first few lines of the clause, should not be charged until the interest came into possession. That was what he proposed with regard to the Succession Duty, simply to leave the law as regarded cumulative payments of duty on its present footing and to secure that there should be no Succession Duty charged where the interest did not actually come into possession either on realty or on personalty. He came to the other and more important portion of his clause which dealt with the Legacy Duty. He ventured to submit to the House that there was nothing—and he did not think there ever had been—more anomalous or more unfair in their present system of Death Duties than the way in which cumulative duties were charged with regard to the Legacy Duty, although they were not charged with regard to the Succession Duty. He was not now contending for land as against other property, or for realty as against personalty. He was only asking that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, when he put realty and personalty on an equal footing with regard to the Death Duties, should place them on an equal footing with regard to the non-payment of cumulative duties in the case of Legacy and Succession Duty. He need not dwell on the administrative difficulties that had resulted from the present state of the law. It might often happen that a life interest in a legacy would exist for 60 or more years, and that the original legatees, when that life interest had ceased, and the time came for the payment of the duty, might be dead, and it might be impossible to trace their executors and heirs. Consequently, there had been enormous difficulties in the administration of the Legacy Duty owing to the cumulative system. But he would like to quote one example well known to lawyers which showed the extreme unfairness to the legatee of the present system. He referred to the decided case of "The Attorney General v. Maxwell." These were the circumstances: A person, whom he would call A, settled £16,000 on himself and wife (whom he would call B) successively for life, and then for younger children in equal shares, and in the event (which happened) of all such children dying before they reached the age of 21, on himself absolutely. He died intestate, leaving a wife, B, and three children, C, D, and E, surviving him. The three children were the sole next-of-kin, the wife being barred by settlement. But all three children died while under age and intestate, and last of all the wife died leaving another person, whom he would call F, as universal legatee and executor, in whom the settled fund became vested in possession. F thereupon had to pay Legacy Duty—first, on the devolution of the entire fund from A to the three children; secondly, on the devolution of the share of C, who died next, to B, D, and E; thirdly, on the devolution of the share of D, who died next, to B and E; fourthly, on the devolution of the share of E, who died next, to B; and, fifthly, on the whole fund as passing under the mother's will to the executor and legatee. The property passing under each of the first four devolutions was solely an interest in expectancy which never came into possession, and yet the legatee had to make no fewer than five payments of Legacy Duty. Nothing could more strongly prove the extreme unfairness of the law. It had always been asserted that one of the principal objects of this Budget was to do away with anomalies such as these, and to place realty and personalty on an equal footing as regarded the payment of Death Duties. But the right hon. Gentleman had not placed them on an equal footing with respect to the payment of cumulative duties, nor could there be anything like equality so long as this gross injustice on personalty was allowed. He ventured to submit that in common fairness to future legatees, in order to place them on an equal footing with successors to realty, the Chancellor of the Exchequer ought to do away with the iniquitous proceeding by which as many as five, or even ten, cumulative Legacy Duties might be charged upon the unfortunate legatee who would ultimately benefit by the legacy simply because that legacy had come to him through half-a-dozen or more persons who never enjoyed it at all. This was a very complicated matter, and not being by profession a lawyer he had felt somewhat diffident in bringing it forward; but he was so much struck with the injustice during the short time he was connected with the Treasury as Chancellor of the Exchequer, that he made up his mind to bring it forward whenever opportunity offered.

New Clause—

(Legacy and Succession Duties on interests in expectancy in certain cases.)

“Where an interest in expectancy in any real or personal property to which any person shall become entitled on any death shall, before such interest falls into possession, have passed by reason of death to any other person or persons, then one Legacy or Succession Duty only shall be paid in respect of such interest, and shall be due from the person who shall first become entitled to such property in possession, but such duty shall be at the highest rate which, if every such person had been subject to duty, would have been payable by any one of them.”—(Sir M. Hicks-Beach.)

Clause brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Clause be read a second time.”

SIR J. RIGBY said, a great deal was heard about the unfortunate people who had to pay these duties; they ought rather to be considered fortunate people who had any property on which to pay them. The unfortunate legatee who could not by possibility have got his legacy, but for the testamentary dispositions of A, B, C, and D, was set up as a sort of financial martyr, because he had secured the goodwill of each one of those persons in succession.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: That is not so.

SIR J. RIGBY said, if it were not so, he did not understand the case. Did the right hon. Gentleman wish there should be only one Legacy Duty paid, although the property passed under the wills of A, B, C, and D successively?

*SIR M. HICKS-BEACH: In the case cited there was no will at all. The money was settled; but as it was left in equal shares for life to the children, it had to be traced through them.

SIR J. RIGBY said, he had often heard it remarked—and with truth—that no one was so technical as a layman. This was a pure technicality. It was a well-understood rule in law that intestacy was a statutory will. Hon. Members surely could not suppose he had forgotten all his law. The legatee came into this property through the wills—not necessarily the written wills—of A, B, C, and D, any one of whom might have deprived him of it.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: How?

SIR J. RIGBY: By giving it to someone else. This was another illustration of the method in which right hon. and hon. Members supported the Amendments they brought forward. They took a general rule, and then selected hard cases arising under it. There would always be hard cases under general rules. It was conceivable that half-a-dozen owners with fee simple in succession might die within a week, but if they were to make exceptions in all such cases they would have to make hundreds of thousands of exceptions; they would be discussing the Bill for years, and eventually they would produce a measure perfectly unworkable. For 100 years past the rule of which the right hon. Gentleman complained with regard to Legacy Duty had existed. Probate Duty and Administration Duty had always been payable, however frequent the devolution might be, because there was no principle they could seize upon to relieve them. They must take the average cases, although undoubtedly there might be individual instances of what hon. Gentlemen opposite called hardship on the ultimate receiver. This was not a Bill to alter the Legacy Duty Act, and, even if it was, the proposal in the Amendment did not point the direction in which they should alter it at all. The Amendment involved the fallacy of supposing that because the property could not be got at in specie it could not be enjoyed at all.

MR. J. LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet) said, the hon. and learned Attorney General was no doubt correct when he told them that intestacies must rank in the same category as wills, but he had failed to deal with the case put by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Bristol, in which a number of remaindermen had died one after the other without ever coming into the inheritance. He had told them that the person who eventually succeeded had derived advantages from the good will and benevolent intentions of those who had died just as much as if they had made him their heir by written will. He told them that each one of these persons had conferred an advantage on the eventual legatee, but how?

SIR W. HARCOURT: By dying.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had supplied the link which was entirely wanting in the argument of the Attorney General. Although they were told that hard cases might occur, he would affirm that if any so hard as that put by the Attorney General, of several successors dying in a week, really did occur, and if Succession Duty were known to be levied on each death, the public conscience would rebel against such an iniquity. The present Chancellor of the Exchequer, and indeed any Chancellor of the Exchequer, would not allow it to be paid; and if such a case were brought to the knowledge of Parliament, that would prevent the duty being paid, or, if it had been paid, would lead to its being refunded. A case of hardship which had already occurred had been mentioned, and in view of the possible recurrence of such cases, he trusted the House, despite the statement of the Attorney General that he was not prepared to meet them, would deal with the matter in a practical and equitable spirit.

SIR W. HARCOURT said, the right hon. Gentleman had supplied an answer to his own argument by assuming that if an extreme case really occurred Parliament would not be indisposed to grant a remedy.

MR. J. LOWTHER: I was, of course, referring not to the case quoted by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Bristol, but to that put forward by the Attorney General of different persons succeeding to a property dying within a week. I said the public conscience would revolt at that.

SIR W. HARCOURT said, the law to which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bristol referred had been in force for more than 100 years, and if any cases of practical hardship had occurred a remedy would have been demanded long ago. The fact was, these extreme cases were very exceptional, and they could not be legislated for. What it practically came to was that the last survivor had to pay for the benefit which he received by the extinction of intermediate interests upon which Legacy Duty was properly payable. That had been the principle of the Legacy Duty which had stood fire for 100 years, and he was not prepared to alter that principle now; and, therefore, he could not accept the proposed Amendment.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was brief and intelligible, and the only criticism he would make upon it was that the right hon. Gentleman had contented himself simply by stating that the law had been in existence 100 years. He had not dealt with one of the arguments advanced by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Bristol. The other speech from the Treasury Bench was a much more elaborate one, and he found it very difficult to criticise it, because the Attorney General seemed unconsciously to involve himself in the technicalities he affected to avoid, and wrapped up his argument in phrases which were nothing if not technical, and from which his meaning had no chance of emerging into the light of day. He claimed to be the one untechnical man in a technical House of laymen. It reminded him of the question sometimes raised by men of unsound mind as to whether they were not sane and the world generally mad. The conflicting parties in the controversy had never been able to settle the dispute to each other's satisfaction, and so in like manner the question of the Attorney General's untechnicality would remain undecided. If it were right to do as we now did under the present Succession Duty—namely, not to charge for every intermediate life which had not enjoyed the property—then it could not be right to charge Legacy Duty in every such case. If it were right to charge Legacy Duty, then Succession Duty ought to be charged. To make a man who succeeded to a property pay Estate Duty upon a series of intermediate lives, not one of which had enjoyed a sixpence, was not only inconsistent with the Succession Duty, but was inconsistent with obvious justice. The principle had not stood the fire of criticism for 100 years, because it had long been recognised that our whole system of Death Duties was anomalous, and no one had thought it worth while to criticise them in detail except for Party purposes. Those who had had to deal with our finance had wisely thought it prudent not to touch these duties until they could be dealt with broadly, and at last we had a heaven-born Chancellor of the Exchequer who essayed to do it. Certainly he told them that the Legacy Duty did not happen to be a subject which his great scheme was to deal with, and that he meant to leave it in the anomalous position it had always occupied. He would point out that, anomalous as the duty was in its existing incidence, it would be ten times more anomalous and burdensome under the changes introduced by the Government. It was monstrous that in such a case as that mentioned by his right hon. Friend payment should be made on the lives of four people who never enjoyed the property at all; but, at all events, the beneficiaries in that case only paid on the life interest of these four people. What were the Government doing? As he was advised, they were altering the law so that in future in such a case as that the payments would have to be made not on the life interest, but on the capital value in all the four cases in regard to each of the individuals. He said this on the authority of his hon. and learned Friend (Sir R. Webster), who, no doubt, would defend his view. His hon. and learned Friend's opinion was that not only would they leave this gross anomaly and injustice uncorrected if they refused to accept the Amendment, but that they would add to them a new injustice in that the duty would be charged not on the life interest of the various persons who never enjoyed the property, but on the capital value, supposed by a technicality to pass on each separate occasion through a whole series of those persons who died under age. How was this to be justified? The Attorney General had told them that the whole scheme was analogous to the Estate Duty. All through their arguments the Government had said, however, that the Estate Duty was to be paid on one principle and the Legacy and Succession Duty on another; therefore, it was absurd to bring forward in defence of the Legacy Duty these points as to the Estate Duty. He thought their theory as to the Estate Duty was unjust and absurd; but that was not the point. The point was whether it should be transferred to the Legacy and Succession Duty from which the Government had always distinguished it. The Opposition were of opinion that they had here anomalies which it was possible to deal with. Their case was that hardships would be produced, and that the Government did not deny it. The Opposition proposed a remedy against which no argument had been advanced, and they asked in the interests of unification of the law, in the interests of common justice, and in the interests of a plain interpretation of the equities of the case which, he thought, in spite of the Attorney General, they ought to aim at, that the Amendment of his right hon. Friend should be accepted or some other Amendment which would have the effect of preventing cases as grossly unjust as that his right hon. Friend had brought before the House over and over again. He hoped that the Government, if they meant to accept this Amendment, would at all events condescend to argue the case. Do not let them put hon. Members off either with the cloudy technicalities of the senior law officer, or with the brief, though he admitted concise, appeal to precedent of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Let the Government argue—as he was sure they could if they chose—in favour of their own proposal, and show that it was in accordance not merely with the practice of the past 100 years, but with the principles of equity by which they professed to have been animated in reconstructing the whole system of Death Duties.

MR. R. T. REID was understood to say that he was not confident of being able to explain this matter to the satisfaction of the right hon. Gentleman, seeing that his colleagues, who were far more competent than himself, had failed. However, he would endeavour to answer the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman asked if it was true, as his right hon. Friend had stated, that the rule as to Succession was distinct from the rule as to Legacy Duty. It was true that there was a distinction, and that in certain cases a series of Legacy Duties had to be paid. This rule in regard to legacies, to his mind, was fair and just. He failed to see the hardship in the case of a man standing, say, fifth in succession coming in, through the death of four other people, to £100,000 being asked to pay the duty on the four lives. If he stood fifth in succession he should think his chance of enjoying the money very small, and if, from the position of having an expectancy worth practically nothing, he came into possession of £100,000, he should be perfectly willing to pay the Legacy Duty in regard to lives of predecessors who, unfortunately for themselves, had not lived long enough to enjoy the money they came into. He thought it quite fair, there being three legacies passing from A to B and from B to C and from C to D, that the Legacy Duty should be paid by the ultimate successor in respect of each life. It was a case that would not often arise, and the man would be exceedingly fortunate in coming into the property. The right hon. Gentleman opposite did not seem to think that precedent was an argument in favour of this, but yet this had been done without a sense of hardship or grievance for 100 years in the case of Succession Duty. If the Government had endeavoured to remedy every dissimilarity that existed on various kinds of property within the compass of one Bill, the time that would have been required to pass the measure would have been enormous.

MR. GOSCHEN said, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had suggested that this was an old tax and an old system, but he thought the argument by which the right hon. Gentleman and the Solicitor General had defended it was a new argument, and that was, that they were to tax a man according to his luck. They were going to tax the last man all that the others would have had to pay simply because the others had rendered him the service not of leaving him the money, but of having died. The position of the Government seemed to be that it was fair to tax the last man because he had been so lucky. They seemed to say that he should not look a gift horse in the mouth, but should be glad to pay the duty in respect of all the intermediate persons. He should be grateful to them for the services rendered to him. He (Mr. Goschen) could not admit that it was fair to tax the intermediate persons who never received any enjoyment whatever—who, in fact, might never have been aware that the property was coming to them at all. This was an extraordinary proposition, and one that they could not agree to. No doubt the anomaly had existed when he was Chancellor of the Exchequer, but the Bill added another anomaly to the list that taxation already presented, and he submitted that no more important duty attached to the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer than that of removing, whenever possible, instead of perpetuating, anomalies and hardships in our system of taxation.

SIR R. WEBSTER said, he was extremely glad the House had an opportunity once more of expressing an opinion on this point. He himself had raised it in Committee, and he was extremely glad that the right hon. Member for Bristol had put the clause down again. He must remind the Solicitor General that the answer he had just given was, as he understood it, a very different one to that he had given in Committee. The new clause dealt with two matters, Succession Duty and Legacy Duty, and it was necessary that these two things should be kept entirely distinct. He would, in the first place, deal with the Succession Duty, as to which he had not heard the whole of the arguments of the Attorney General, but he had heard the answer of the Solicitor General. With regard to the Succession Duty, he understood that the only difference that had been made by the Government was that the duty should be calculated on the capital value instead of on the life interest. The Leader of the Opposition had pointed out that the Bill would accentuate the hardship of the method in which the tax was at present being levied. Under the old system it was thought advisable to insert Section 14 in the Succession Duty Act of 1853. The clause now proposed was a repetition in connection with the new Succession Duty of the provision of that 14th section of the Act of 1853, and he did not hesitate to say that if it was necessary in the former Act it was all the more necessary in the present Bill. It was stated that the protection they required was already given in the Bill. That could only refer to Clause 18, and he (Sir R. Webster) had been asked whether he thought the words which had been inserted in that clause were sufficient to meet his point. The best opinion they could get was to the effect that they were not sufficient. They did not render the Bill clear on the point in question. It looked very much as though the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer were leaving himself a door open for the future. He did not tell them whether he approved of the Legacy Duty Law or the Succession Duty Law. He said he was satisfied with the Legacy Duty Law as it had existed 100 years, and, therefore, he did not propose to disturb it; but here they were face to face with the question in connection with the new Succession Duty. Did they intend the old Succession Duty Law to apply or not?

*SIR W. HARCOURT: I do not alter it. What the Amendment proposes is to alter the Legacy Duty Law.

SIR R. WEBSTER said, that showed the point of his observation that the two things should be kept distinct. With regard to the succession, the clause as it now stood would render it possible for a future Government to hold that the old Legacy Duty Law applied under this Bill in cases of simple succession. The Government ought not to be content to leave the Legacy Duty in the same anomalous condition as it was in before this Bill passed into law. They should either substitute some other duty for it, or else assimilate it to the new law. No one asked the Government to reform the whole of the Death Duties—to go into every hole and corner and rake out every grievance. But the same rule should apply in the case of succession legacies as were intended should apply to Succession Duty. The Government had stated that they intended to make no alteration in the application of the law as now laid down in Section 14 of the Succession Act of 1883. The Solicitor General had said that it was not necessary to repeat that section here, and he (Sir R. Webster) was bound to accept the hon. and learned Member's dictum.

Question put.

MR. CHAPLIN (Lincolnshire, Sleaford) said, he wished to propose a new clause enabling land to be taken in lieu of duty in certain cases. It would be remembered, he said, that he raised that suggestion in the course of the Debate on the Second Reading of the Bill. It was his intention to have moved an Amendment giving effect to it in Committee, but it so happened that a general and wider Amendment which preceded his was held to include that branch of the subject with which he proposed to deal, and he was consequently prevented by the Forms of the House from carrying out his intention. In the first place—now he had the opportunity on the Report stage—he would endeavour to explain as briefly as possible what would be the effect of his proposal. In the first place, it related solely and exclusively to agricultural land, and the definition of such land was that given in the Small Holdings Act of 1892. In the case of such land, where an owner found himself, by reason of circumstances connected with a particular estate, in such a position that he had no means whatever of paying the duty with which he was charged, except by a forced sale of the land, he proposed to allow him to require the Commissioners to make a valuation of any specified part or parts of any such land separately; the Commissioners thereupon to make such separate valuation, and give particulars thereof to the owner of the land, who might call upon the Commissioners to accept, in lieu of the duty, the transfer of so much of the land as was equivalent to the duty which he would otherwise have to pay. The next stage was that the Comptroller of Inland Revenue was to be the trustee of the land, and the title to it should be registered at the expense of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue. Of course, if it were found that the title was not good the arrangement would fall through, and the Commissioners would still have full power to recover any duty that might be due. That was, briefly, the effect of the proposed new clause. He was perfectly well aware that he was advocating a novel principle in our legislation in this country, though it was not novel, he believed, in our colonies and in other countries. The reason why the clause related almost exclusively to agricultural land was because land at the present time was in a wholly exceptional position, and owing to the great depression from which agriculture had been suffering for a great number of years it differed from almost every other kind of property. A very large proportion of the landed estates in this country were encumbered with mortgages and other charges; and, though in many cases there was a margin left, it was often wholly inadequate to enable the owner to raise upon the security of that margin the sum which might be necessary to pay the Estate Duty. While, at the same time, it was impossible to borrow for that purpose, land was practically unsaleable, and the owner would be forced to sell at a time when practically there was little or no market for land of this description, and the owner might be compelled to take a nominal sum for his estates. In fact, he was apprehensive that this tax would become what was foretold by the right hon. Member for Midlothian—nothing but an engine for the dispossession of the owners of property. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian had pointed out that taxation of this kind on the capital value of the land would be unjust, unwise, offensive, and odious in the extreme; and he had never heard any attempt on the part of any Minister on the Treasury Bench to meet that statement. It might be said, in reply to his remarks, that if there were no market for the sale of the land no duty would be imposed. But that theory, which the Chancellor of the Exchequer was perpetually putting before the House, was wholly unsatisfactory, because it was left to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue to decide what the valuation should be, and he was persuaded that if there were any margin at all—no matter whether it was useless for the purpose of raising money to pay the duty or not—the Commissioners would never consent to the estate being held as of no value. That raised another question which supplied a most admirable argument in support of the proposition he was making to the House. Any valuation, under the circumstances, must be a matter of the greatest delicacy and difficulty; and the greatest hardships were not only possible, but extremely probable. For arriving at a fair valuation to both sides, could any better plan be devised than that which his Amendment suggested? The Commissioners would naturally not put too low a value on the land; and they would be debarred from putting too high a value on it by the liability to take the land at their own valuation. It might be said in answer to his proposals that they would bring about the very thing he objected to—namely, the dispossession of the owner of property. He admitted that to some extent, even under this Amendment, the dispossession of the owner of land would be inevitable, but that was not his fault, it was the fault of the Bill; and while under the Government's proposal the owner would probably be dispossessed of the whole estate, under the Amendment, if it were accepted by the House, he would only be dispossessed of a part. The right hon. Member for Midlothian, in introducing his Budget, recognised enormous difficulties in dealing with real property, and used very conciliatory language on the point. He said—

“As long as the equal contribution of all kinds of property was kept intact, we have a very open mind as to the method of giving effect to the principle.”

He asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer to keep that open mind now, and to give effect to it in this particular case. His Budget was likely to give rise to most serious and cruel cases of hardship, aye, and even of gross injustice. Could he not, in order to meet such cases, accept the Amendment, or frame some plan which would meet such cases? The right hon. Gentleman had taken the great principle of graduation from the example of the Australian Colonies. Why not take another principle from them? He would explain what that principle was. He had in his hand the Land Tax and Income Tax Assessment Acts, 1891 and 1892, of New Zealand, and the House would find that not only were they very interesting, but that they bore on the point he had been laying before the House. These two Acts, which were amalgamated, laid down a procedure to be followed in cases where there was a difference between the landowner and the Commissioner as to the value of the land to be taxed. If the Commissioner were dissatisfied with the owner's return, if he thought it too low, he could make an assessment; and if the owner did not assent to that, the Commissioner could recommend the Governor within 30 days to acquire the land at that assessment. If the owner accepted the notice well and good, the valuation was made in the manner prescribed in the Act, and there the matter ended; but if, on the other hand, he did not consent, then the Governor might, within a reasonable time, declare, by Order in Council, that the land was vested in Her Majesty. But the owner had these safeguards. He could appeal to a resident Magistrate to determine the fair actual value of the land; or he could give notice to the Commissioner that he required him, in the event of his refusing to reduce the assessment of the amount specified in the Return, to acquire the land at the assessment which the Commissioner had made upon it. Thus an automatic system was set up which was calculated to ensure the fairest valuation as between the two parties. He ventured, therefore, to suggest to the right hon. Gentleman, as he had taken one principle for the Australian Colonies, he should follow their example in another respect, because such a system, if adopted in the Bill, would give the greatest possible safeguard to the owners of the land for fair treatment; and no one could deny that under the Bill as it stood they would be liable to much hardship and injustice. After all, this was but the merest act of justice, and it would relieve owners from an intolerable difficulty which he was sure that Parliament would not willingly inflict upon them. For the necessity of such a proposal as that which he made the Government were responsible. The Government had apparently chosen to ignore the statements made over and over again by the great master of finance in this country, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian, as to the insuperable objections to taxation being levied on the capital value of land; and, therefore, they could not be surprised that the landed interest should take every legitimate opportunity of making proposals for their relief from the heavy burden placed on them. His proposal would have this advantage: that it would give the Commissioners of Inland Revenue some measure of practical insight into the great difficulties of the agricultural situation, which he did not think they half realised at the present time. There was another matter to which he wanted to call the attention of the House. It was an object for which he had provided expressly in the Amendment he was about to propose, but he understood from the Chair that it would not be proper for him to move the last clause of his Amendment. That, in his opinion, made very little matter. The object he had in view was to call upon the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, when they had acquired land, to give notice to the Local Authorities that it would be at their disposal in order to facilitate the distribution of land amongst a greater number of people, and for the provision of allotments or small holdings. Whether that was included in the Bill or not really did not matter, because the Government would have the same opportunity of offering the land for these purposes to the Local Authorities. He hoped most earnestly they would use their power, because if this Amendment was accepted—and he was sanguine enough to hope it would be, judging from the reception it met with from gentlemen sitting on the other side of the House, and from the fact that there seemed to be a general feeling of sympathy with it—one of the effects would be that land would be coming into the market in all parts of the country, which in all probability would be specially adopted for the purposes of allotments, in quantities which would, no doubt, largely facilitate the distribution of land. And although he had advocated this proposal chiefly on the ground that it did but bare justice to the owner of land, and to enable him to escape from the position of intolerable hardship in which he was placed under the Bill, yet he could not shut his eyes to the fact that it would bring with it the other advantages he had enumerated, and under all the circumstances he commended the Amendment with confidence and hope to the consideration of the House.

New Clause—

(Land to be taken in lieu of payment in certain cases.)

“Where any part of the estate consists of land used for the purposes of agriculture, or cultivation within the meaning of "The Small Holdings Act, 1892," and the owner of the land is able to show to the satisfaction of the Commissioners, or to the High Court upon appeal, that he is unable to pay the Estate Duty in respect of such land otherwise than by a forced sale of the same, or of part thereof, he may require the Commissioners to make a valuation of any specified part or parts of such land separately; and the Commissioners shall thereupon make such separate valuation, and shall give particulars thereof to the said owner of the land.

Such owner may at any time within twenty-eight days after the said particulars have been received by him give notice in writing to the Commissioners that he requires them to accept, in lieu of the duty or of any part thereof payable in respect of any land of the description in this section mentioned, a transfer of such portion or portions of the land to which the said particulars relate as will, taken at the value placed thereon by the Commissioners, be an equivalent to the said duty.

The Comptroller of Inland Revenue for the time being shall, by virtue of his appointment, be 'the Inland Revenue Trustee,' and such trustee shall, for the purpose of taking, holding, conveying, and transferring any land which shall become vested in him in pursuance of this section, be a corporation sole by the name of 'the Inland Revenue Trustee,' and shall have perpetual succession.

The Commissioners shall, upon receiving the notice in this section mentioned, be deemed to have contracted to acquire the land specified in the notice for the sum stated in the said particulars to be the value thereof, and the owner of the land shall forthwith apply, under 'The Land Transfer Act, 1875,' or any Act amending the same, that the Inland Revenue trustee may be registered as proprietor of such land with an absolute title, and shall do, or cause to be done, all acts, matters, and things requisite or proper for effecting such registration.

If such registration is effected all costs, charges, and expenses properly incurred by such owner in effecting the same shall be recoverable by him from the Commissioners, and may be deducted out of any sum payable by him for Estate Duty in respect of any property passing upon the same death.

If the said application to register fails, then the Commissioners shall have the same right to recover Estate Duty in respect of the said land as if the notice mentioned in this section had not been given.

Whenever land shall be registered in the name of the Inland Revenue Trustee as proprietor with an absolute title in pursuance of this section, such land shall be accepted by the Commissioners, so far as its value as specified in the said particulars shall extend, in lieu and in satisfaction of the Estate Duty payable in respect of any land of the description in this section mentioned forming part of the estate, and the provisions of this Act shall apply with the necessary modifications as if the said duty had been paid in money.

Where land has become vested in the Inland Revenue Trustee in pursuance of this section, it shall be the duty of the Commissioners to give notice to the Council of every parish, district, and county in which such land is situate that applications may be made to the Commissioners for the acquisition of such land, or any part thereof, for the purposes of allotments or small holdings, and such Councils may proceed for the acquisition of such land for the purposes aforesaid under the powers conferred on them respectively by the Allotments Acts 1887 and 1890, 'The Small Holdings Act, 1892,' and 'The Local Government Act, 1894,' or any of them."—(Mr. Chaplin.)

Clause brought up, and read first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

SIR W. HARCOURT: I am perfectly convinced of the entire sincerity of the right hon. Gentleman when he says that he bases the proposal of this Amendment exclusively in the interest of agricultural land.

MR. CHAPLIN: I said I advocated it mainly, not exclusively, in order to relieve the owners of land from the intolerable injustice and hardship that would inevitably be inflicted upon them in the future.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Why are the owners of land alone to be relieved of this intolerable hardship? The right hon. Gentleman never thinks that hardship occurs to anybody in the world but the owners of land.

MR. CHAPLIN: None like these!

SIR W. HARCOURT: The right hon. Gentleman says "None like these." But suppose a man is the owner of a number of shares which he finds a difficulty in selling, the principle of this Amendment and every word of it applies equally to him. Is he to go to the Inland Revenue Commissioners and say "I can't sell my shares, and therefore you may value them and take them and keep them"? Take the case of iron-works. Very often they do not pay any more than agricultural land. But it never enters into the minds of hon. Gentlemen opposite that any class in this community has any difficulties except the owners of agricultural land. I want to know, in the case of a mill-owner who cannot pay Death Duty except by a forced sale of the mill, why he is not to go to the Inland Revenue authorities and say, "Take my mill; keep it, or sell it if you like." It is difficult to argue such a question seriously. The real truth is, there are other classes in this community that have suffered quite as seriously and quite as long as the owners of agricultural land. Why is a debt to the State to be put on a lower footing than a debt to anybody else? Are you going to ask your butcher and your baker to take a piece of your land in liquidation of your debt? I will put an illustration that will appeal to the right hon. Gentleman. Are you going to say to Mr. Tattersall or Mr. Webb, "I cannot pay my bill at this moment for the engagements of my horses. Take a piece of my land in discharge of my debt to you."

MR. CHAPLIN: I should be responsible for the engagements of my horses. But in this case the Government is making my engagements for me.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Therefore, a debt to the Government is to be repudiated in this form, and you are going to give to the Government this security which you will not give to an ordinary debtor. In my opinion, a debt to the State is quite as high as, if not higher than, any contract debt. Are you going to put a debt to the State in this position only in the case of agricultural land? The state of mind of gentlemen who seriously make propositions of that kind is to me wholly unintelligible. They really seem as if they were the inhabitants of a different planet altogether, and expected to be placed under different conditions to everybody else. What is the Inland Revenue to do with this land when they get it? The right hon. Gentleman says it may be sold to Local Authorities. But if the Inland Revenue can sell it, why cannot the owner sell it? Does the right hon. Gentleman seriously in the House of Commons make the proposal that the Inland Revenue authorities are to take this land all over the country? I have the highest respect for the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, but this is about the last work I should be disposed to ask them to engage in. When the right hon. Gentleman says the land is to be valued, I suppose he means it is to be valued at its selling price. But why cannot the owner sell it himself? If it is to be taken by the Inland Revenue authorities at its selling price, it is on the assumption that the owner can sell it at quite as much as the Inland Revenue. This subject was discussed in Committee, and there was really no attempt to support the proposal. We cannot agree to put agricultural land on a different footing to any other property which there is a difficulty in realising. We cannot put a debt to the State on a lower footing than a debt to any other creditor. For both these reasons it is absolutely impossible that we can entertain this Amendment.

MR. JEFFREYS (Hants, Basingstoke) said, the Chancellor of the Exchequer asked why the land should be put upon a different footing to any other security. Why it should be put upon a different footing with regard to payment of the Death Duty was that land was not a marketable security.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Nor are iron-works.

MR. JEFFREYS, continuing, said, that while land had always a certain value, it was not a marketable security. In that respect it differed from other descriptions of property, and they therefore were entitled to ask that the Government in levying the Death Duties should apportion the estate, and take a portion of it which they might realise when they could. His right hon. Friend had pointed out that a similar condition to that which he proposed was carried out in the colonies, and he could see no reason why it should not be adopted in this country. In fact, seeing the eagerness which hon. Gentlemen opposite had shown to secure land for allotments for the agricultural classes, and the difficulty they alleged there was in obtaining it, he was surprised that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not gladly taken advantage of the proposal. It would afford him an easy way of obtaining land, and the desire for allotments would afford him an easy way of disposing of it. There was not an acre of land in the country which did not pay taxation under Schedule A of the Income Tax; therefore, all land had a value, though it could not be realised for the moment. But the case was altogether different in this respect with regard to shares and such-like property, and the two classes of property could not be put in comparison. He thought the proposal made in the new clause was a very reasonable and practicable one, and hoped the House would adopt it.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton) said, he seldom remained in the House to listen to the speeches of hon. Members opposite because it seemed to him they always said the same thing. They did not understand what the connection of land and value was. He did not know whether the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down owned any land, but if he did he was prepared to give him the coin he had in his pocket for it. What hon. Gentlemen opposite meant by land being unsaleable was that they could not get what they wanted for it. Hon. Gentlemen on the other side appeared to be under the impression that it was the business of the country to maintain estates from generation to generation in the same hands. His own opinion was that it was a matter of absolute indifference to the State whether an estate remained in the same family or passed on to others. He was one of those who thought it was desirable that estates should be handed over occasionally to others. He would do as a French Judge did on one occasion during the Revolution, who had two persons come before him in a dispute about the ownership of an estate. One of the litigants said, "This estate has been in my family for ten generations." The Judge replied, "Say no more. Your family have had their turn of it. Turn the estate over to the other side." [Laughter.] He did not go so far as that, for he was not one of those persons who believed that the land should be handed over to other people, but hon. Gentlemen opposite seemed to go to the extreme in the other direction. If the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman was adopted with regard to land they would have to carry it a great deal further. We should have the tea merchant handing over his tea because the market for it was not good. Let them take the case of newspaper proprietors. They would be very glad if the Chancellor of the Exchequer would introduce a clause enabling them to pay their Death Duties and Income Tax in copies of their newspapers, old copies that would not sell by preference, but which had a value as waste paper. The whole argument on the part of hon. Members opposite was nonsense, and proceeded upon an altogether erroneous basis. The landed interest had for generation after generation managed to arrange matters in regard to taxation for their own benefit. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had brought in a good, sound, democratic Budget, and he was very glad that the right hon. Gentleman was going to make the landowners pay like the unfortunate owners of newspapers and such-like unhappy people. Amendments were put forward day after day based on the idea that some concession ought to be made to landowners simply because they were landowners. He had no desire to do them injustice, but surely they were not entitled to exceptional treatment.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (Manchester, E.): The hon. Gentleman has made an excellent speech; but I think he must have mistaken his audience. The hon. Gentleman must have been rehearsing some performance subsequently to be placed before his friends at Northampton. For a Northampton audience, or for the hustings, it might be an appropriate performance; but as a speech or argument made in a serious spirit to a serious Amendment it was a singularly poor contribution to this Debate. The hon. Gentleman, like the Chancellor of the Exchequer, has endeavoured to drag in, as he always does, some ancient controversy about the landed interest in this country, and he endeavours to hide under a cloud of words based on these old controversies his own want of real knowledge of the subject. I shall not follow him in that respect. I am not going to deal with this subject on any claims of the land to exceptional treatment, nor shall I argue a point which has been argued before, and may be argued again, as to whether land has received in the past specially favourable treatment in the matter of taxation. The hon. Gentleman has said that landowners have had the management of taxation in their own hands for many generations. The result is, that they have had far too heavy burdens, and the time has come for inequalities to be redressed. The hon. Gentleman has left out of account some heavy local burdens attaching to it, such, for example, as that of education, which has nothing to do with the land. When the hon. Gentleman can show that newspapers have made a similarly heavy contribution to the education of the country—when he can show that the back numbers of Truth have made the immense contribution to the education of the people that the landowners have done, then he will be able to say that newspapers ought to be put on the same footing as landed estates. But I do not for a moment think that this general discussion about the burdens of land, or the distinction between personalty and realty, is at all relevant to the Amendment, nor were the arguments which were advanced to the House by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The right hon. Gentleman appeared to think that there was something intrinsically ludicrous in the proposal of my right hon. Friend. That was a very delicate compliment to the democracy of New Zealand. I do not say that I approve of all the proposals for taxation which are adopted in the colonies, but I have never treated with insult and contumely the financial arrangements made in the colonies, nor do I think it consistent with the dignity of this House to do so. The right hon. Gentleman has asked what is the difference between land and such property as shares, or mills, or ships for the purposes of taxation. I will tell him. I do not attach much value to the argument that landed estates, as a whole, are unsaleable; because, if they are unsaleable, then, under this Bill as it stands, the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not have the right to levy a single sixpence of duty upon them. If the Inland Revenue authorities really carry out the provisions of this Bill, as of course they intend to do, and as the Courts of Law will compel them to do, then in every case in which it can be shown that a landed estate is unsaleable, that estate, on the death of the deceased, will not have to pay one sixpence to the State. So far I grant there is no particular hardship. But observe that in many cases under this Bill an estate will have to pay on the value arising out of it as a whole, though fragments of it might be wholly unsaleable. In the case of an estate which was subject to taxation under this Bill, a farm upon it might be wholly unsaleable. A similar state of things will not prevail with regard to other forms of property. There may, of course, be individual cases, such as that in which a great owner possesses, say, large ironworks; but such cases are rare. Great commercial concerns are nowadays mostly held by limited companies in shares, and those shares are saleable without any interference with the rest of the property, whilst the saleable value of the various fractions of the shares will be a measure of the saleable value of the property. In other words, if the capital value of certain ironworks is £100,000 and the duty on that is £6,000, the owner would be able to sell £6,000 worth of shares so as to pay the duty. It will be admitted that what is true of mills is also largely true of ships. Ships are constantly held in shares, so that it is possible to sell a fragment of a share without destroying the whole property. What, however, are you going to do with property which has a value as a whole but of which the fragments are unsaleable, and which, because there is a first and perhaps even a second mortgage upon it, you cannot raise another sixpence upon? That is a case which has to be met, and it is undeniable that it is a case of hardship. Of course, if there are cases in which large ironworks, or other works are held by individuals and not in shares, the hardship will be as great in such cases as in the case of a large estate, and if you can find a method of meeting such cases I will vote for it. As a matter of fact, however, we all know that day by day the number of great concerns that remain in the hands of private individuals is growing less and less. Great banks, great ironworks, cotton mills, and other commercial concerns are more and more being turned into Joint Stock Companies, and, as a consequence, their value is divisible in shares saleable separately in the market. I venture to think—only this is a parenthesis in my general argument—that landowners would do well to consider whether it would not be worth while to turn their estates into Joint Stock Companies. That is a plan which I think would have a great many advantages, and which would probably redound to the benefit of every class of the community and of everybody except the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I doubt whether he would gain by the change, but I think it is one which landowners ought very seriously to consider. But, in the meanwhile, this plan has never yet been carried out, and you have this immense class of property which is not held in shares and cannot be cut up for the purpose of paying this duty. I quite admit that there would be no hardship in the case of a landowner as compared with the owner of any other property if he could sell, say, a tenth part of his property for a tenth part of the total value of the property; but that would not be the common case. The common case would be that a man would not be able to sell a portion of his estate to pay the duty on the whole of the estate, and in that case he would be subject to what everybody, except the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), will admit is a great hardship—namely, the sale of his property as a whole or else he would have to raise money upon it. I am told it would be extremely difficult to raise money if the land was already mortgaged, and the proportionate interest that would have to be paid would be very great. Where, therefore, is your equality of treatment between different kinds of property? You always utter a shriek of despair if real property is compared with personal property. Take, then, the case of a man who has got a mortgaged estate, the whole value of which for the purposes of duty depends on the amenity of the estate, and which would be destroyed if a portion of it were sold; and then take another estate consisting of building land, a small portion of which can easily be sold by the owner. The one man would either raise money on his building estate without difficulty or would sell his quarter acre or whatever the amount may be and pay the duty. The other man would be placed in the cruel position of having to part with the whole of his land in order to pay the 5 per cent. duty which the Government exact from him. To tell me that these two men are treated equally is to abuse my intelligence and to ask me to accept a position which every man here knows to be false. Now, I have made out that there is a real case of hardship for this particular kind of landed property, and no man in this House will have the courage to say that I have not done so. Whether my right hon. Friend's method of dealing with the case is the best one I will not say, but it is one that has been tried, which has worked practically, and which really meets the difficulty we have to deal with. For this reason, if my right hon. Friend goes to a Division, I shall certainly support his clause.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. H. H. FOWLER, Wolverhampton, E.): I can hardly regard the speech of the right hon. Gentleman as a serious argument in support of a serious Amendment. He asked us at the end of his remarks to reply to his declaration that he has made out a case of real hardship, although he practically guarded himself against expressing approval of this particular mode of meeting that case. The only serious argument I could observe in the right hon. Gentleman's speech was the novel, the interesting, and perhaps fruitful suggestion that the landed estates of this country should be turned into Joint Stock Companies. That suggestion was given as an illustration of the contrast between landed property and such property as cotton mills and ironworks. I think the right hon. Gentleman is misinformed with regard to the latter class of property. I think that a large proportion of the great commercial enterprises of this country are at the present time in the hands of private owners. It is, of course, a question of opinion, but with some means of knowledge I certainly express that opinion. The right hon. Gentleman said that there was no alternative in the case of landed estates but the sale of the property in order to meet this charge. The Government by this Bill, however, have met that difficulty. They have put landed property in an exceptional position to all other property, by giving the owners of land eight years in which to meet the charge. The owner of personal property, such as shares or pictures, has not eight years in which to pay the amount, and, admitting that there is a possibility in specific cases of hardship on account of the sale of the estate for the purpose of paying duty, I think the eight years' system remedies that to a great extent. Well now, what does the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Sleaford (Mr. Chaplin) propose? He wants to prevent a forced sale. A mortgagee is not compelled to fall back on the property on which he has lent his money until he has had the advantage of a forced sale. The right hon. Gentleman says the Crown is not to receive payment of its debts if a forced sale is the only means of obtaining payment. Let me take the case of the mortgaged property to which the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. A. J. Balfour) has alluded. He says there will be a difficulty in raising money on the property in order to pay the duty. I will point out that there will be no duty payable except on the margin of the property after all the mortgagees are paid, and if the property be heavily mortgaged there will not be much duty to pay, while the owner will have eight years in which to make the payment. The right hon. Gentleman did not, after all, touch the question why the ownership of this specific class of property should be treated differently from the ownership of other property. There are difficulties of realisation whatever your property may be. The right hon. Gentleman appeared to express some doubt with reference to ironworks. I can tell him that within the last three weeks one of the most memorable ironworks in Staffordshire, and one which was subject some years ago to a well-known litigation—a property that cost hundreds of thousands of pounds, possessing a large amount of plant and machinery—was put up for auction, and not a man would make a bid for it. I believe the same thing would happen if a great many of the other ironworks in Staffordshire were offered for sale, and it is well known that waves of depression go over properties of this kind from time to time. I can tell the right hon. Gentleman that in the case of other property besides land it is much more difficult to sell part of it than to sell the whole. I do not, however, think it is so difficult to sell a portion of a landed estate. The estates that have been cleared off the register during the last three months, irrespective of the sales by auction, have been those that have been sold in small quantities which the tenants could buy. The difficulty is in selling the large estates and not in selling the small holdings. This Amendment would practically amount to enacting in other words that where a landowner does not choose to pay the Estate Duty no Estate Duty shall be payable. You might just as well ask the State to free from duty every other description of property which is liable to pay it. Even if you are not content to admit the force of this reasoning, you still have to show why the landowner is to be dealt with differently from other owners. The landowner has means out of the income of his property to pay in eight years the instalments of the duty. I am astonished at the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. A. J. Balfour) lending his great weight to the fallacy which underlies this Amendment. If it be wrong to impose duty on landed property at all, the wrong will not be evaded by proposals of this kind. If it be wrong, say so at once, and let us settle the question. If, however, you once admit it is a right and just thing to tax all descriptions of property, I do not see why you are to interpose insuperable difficulties in the way of recovering the payment of the tax.

SIR R. TEMPLE (Surrey, Kingston) said, that as one who had something to do with small allotments, he wished to say a few words. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had asked why this Amendment should be proposed with regard to the particular land it dealt with. Surely the wording of the Amendment supplied the answer to that question. The Amendment applied to land that was held in small holdings under the Act of 1892. This was land with which the Legislature for special reasons of high policy which were acceptable to Members opposite undertook to interfere, and the very reason which justified the policy of 1892 justified the policy of this Amendment. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had asked what the effect of the Amendment would be upon the Inland Revenue Commissioners. The effect would be that they would be very careful to put a just and proper valuation upon land, because they would know that if they put an unfair value upon it they would be hoist with their own petard, and would have to take the land themselves. The fact was that landowners did not now have, and were not likely to get, a fair and proper valuation of their land. The hon. Member for Hampshire had referred to estates which nobody would buy, but there was no doubt that the Inland Revenue Commissioners put some value upon those estates. The hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), arguing that land was not unsaleable, said he would give the coin in his pocket for the price of the land. That was exactly what the Opposition said—namely, that land could only be sold, if at all, for a song. The hon. Member for Northampton had spoken of land being sold for the Death Duties. To hear the hon. Member speak one would suppose the hon. Member would not care if the entire estate was sold to pay the Death Duty. But what else would that be but confiscation? The policy of the Small Holdings Act of 1892 and of this Amendment were both designed for the purpose of facilitating the distribution of the land among the population. He believed that without an Amendment of this kind a very severe blow would be inflicted on the system of small holdings. When they went to their constituents hon. Members on that (the Opposition) side of the House would point out to the agricultural community that when they introduced a reasonable Amendment like this to protect the small landowner and ensure the distribution of the land amongst the people, it was the Liberal Government that opposed it.

SIR J. LUBBOCK (London University) said that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Sleaford had admittedly brought forward a case of hardship. But the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for India had objected to that case of hardship being met because, as he said, there was another case of even greater hardship. Suppose it were so, what argument was that against the case presented by the Member for Sleaford? No doubt there was great force in what had been said by the Secretary for India, but surely that was a reason for meeting the case he had brought forward and not for declining to meet the case brought forward by the right hon. Gentleman opposite. The case of creditors had been referred to. What happened when a man had the misfortune to become bankrupt. Why the value of the securities was called for and the creditor had the option of taking them over for the price at which he valued them. That system might be adopted in this case. If the Government valued the land at a particular sum why should they not take it over at that sum? They asked what was the difference between the owners' holding and the Commissioners' holding? Why, the difference was that the Commissioners could hold it as long as they liked and sell it at the most convenient time, whereas the owner would be obliged to sell to pay the duty. There was another reason in favour of the Amendment which had not yet been alluded to—namely, the facility it would afford for arriving at something like the true value of the land. If the Commissioners valued the land at a certain price and the owner did not choose to hand it over, that would be evidence that the Commissioners had not over-valued it. On the other hand, if the owner did not accept it, it would be evidence that the Commissioners had put a fair price on it. In his opinion, one of the greatest difficulties would be that of determining a fair price. It was in that that land differed so much from Stocks and shares. No doubt there were many Stocks and shares not saleable at all, but, so far as the great majority were concerned their approximate value could be ascertained by looking at the Stock Exchange list. But they had absolutely no such facility for arriving at the value in the case of land. He believed that some such provision as that suggested by the right hon. Gentleman opposite would be of great advantage in arriving at a satisfactory value of land as between the owner and Commissioners, and if the Amendment went to a Division he should give it his support.

COLONEL KENYON - SLANEY (Shropshire, Newport) said, there was one other little practical point that seemed to have escaped those officially connected with the Bill—namely, that the main difficulty when they carried the Bill into law would be to provide a market for land. The Government had been unable to see how directly the Amendment bore on the question of providing a market for the land. If land could be used for the payment of Death Duties they would multiply by ten the ease by which land could be bought and sold. If a man knew that he could buy a piece of land, and that when the proper time came it could be sold away from his estate he would be much more eager and willing to buy than he was at present. As the Bill stood, if a man bought land he would subject it to all the iniquities and hardships of the Government proposal; but if he knew that it would be broken off from his estate at his death and be made to pay the Death Duty, there would be more buying and selling of land than obtained at present, or would obtain after the passing of the Bill as at present drawn. Therefore, putting on one side the flippant nonsense talked by the hon. Member for Northampton, he submitted that by this Amendment they would be rendering land more liquid, so to speak—more easily bought and sold. They would be producing an effect which they wanted to produce, and doing that which was good instead of that which was evil.

Question put.

The House divided :—Ayes 147 ; Noes 187.—(Division List, No. 154.)

MR. HENEAGE moved to insert the following Clause, after Clause 4 :—

(Provision for Estate Duty by Life Insurance.)

"When the deceased has, during his own life, expressly provided for payment of the Estate Duty on any property passing at his death, or for any part of such Estate Duty, by insuring his life for that purpose, such sums of money as shall be payable to his estate under such insurance policy shall not be aggregated with any other property for the purpose of determining the rate of Estate Duty, and no Estate Duty shall be payable thereon."

His object was to except an insurance policy, taken out for the express purpose of paying Death Duties, from aggregation and graduation, providing that the premiums were properly paid during the life of the deceased. He thought it would be very hard indeed if, when a person had had the foresight and thrift to provide payment of the Estate Duty, that money should be brought into the property and aggregated in order to increase the scale of valuation. A person having a property might think it desirable to relieve the younger children from Estate Duty, and would not desire to impose the burden upon his residuary legatee or the person who inherited the property in land, and he therefore provided in this Amendment that the insurance, whether for the Death Duties of the whole of the property, or for a portion only, should not form part of the property passing at the death of the deceased. He thought it was a cruel thing to ask a person not only to pay the Estate Duty by instalments during his life, but also to ask him to pay a second and increased duty when they aggregated this property ; therefore, in justice and fairness any money provided by insurance for the payment of Death Duties ought to be exempted from being added to the estate for purposes of Estate Duty. The answer given by his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General, during the course of the Committee, showed what he thought was the equity of the case, because according to his answer he thought it was not included under the Bill, therefore he (Mr. Heneage) would ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he did not think it would be better to omit these policies, earmarked for the purpose, from the process of aggregation ? From a Treasury point of view he thought it would not be a bad precedent, for by inducing people to be thrifty they would prevent a great deal of what had been contemplated as likely to take place under this Bill. It had been said that houses might be shut up, labourers thrown out of employment, and thus the revenue from the Income Tax would be reduced. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would favourably consider what he could not help thinking was a perfectly fair Amendment. It would induce the keeping together of capital both in landed estates and in commercial undertakings which would in itself be a means of increasing the Revenue, as that would increase the amount payable by way of Income Tax. It would also have the advantage of encouraging thrift amongst owners of property, and for all these reasons he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would see his way to accept the Amendment.

New Clause—

After Clause 4, to insert the following Clause :—

(Provision for Estate Duty by life insurance.)

"When the deceased has, during his own life, expressly provided for payment of the Estate Duty on any property passing at his death, or for any part of such Estate Duty, by insuring his life for that purpose, such sums of money as shall be payable to his estate under such insurance policy shall not be aggregated with any other property for the purpose of determining the rate of Estate Duty, and no Estate Duty shall be payable thereon."—(Mr. Heneage.)

Clause brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

SIR W. HARCOURT, who was very imperfectly heard in the Gallery, was understood to say that the difficulty about this Amendment was the same difficulty that they had often stated before in respect of the dealings with insurances on a different footing from that of any other provision. There were some people who were able to insure, and when they could do so it was a good thing, but there were other people who were not able to insure. As he had pointed out before, there were a good many people who might be compelled to employ their money by putting it into their businesses, and therefore why should they give this preference to this particular method of making a provision? If a man had property, clearly that property was available for the payment of duties. It might be more convenient for a man to save the money to pay those duties by other means than by insurance, and they ought not to put those other forms of saving at a disadvantage as compared with insurance. Therefore, for the same reason they were not able to accept previous Amendments, they could not accept the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman.

SIR M. HICKS-BEACH said, he was very sorry the Chancellor of the Exchequer was unable to give some favourable consideration to the proposal, though he agreed with him in thinking that there was something to be said against making a special exception in favour of insurance, as distinguished from other kinds of saving. Still, as had been pointed out in the course of the Debates on this Bill, insurance would be the best and proper way of making provision for the payment of the largely-increased duties which were sanctioned by the Bill. It was also the easiest way, always provided that the person was in a position of health and at a time of life to insure upon reasonable terms. There was this difference between this and other kinds of provision—if a man insured, he was practically bound to continue the payments till his death; but, if he merely put by a sum annually, he was tempted to utilise the money in some other way. But he would take the argument from the Chancellor of the Exchequer's own point of view. He contended that any sum put by, whether by insurance or savings, alienated for the purpose of paying Death Duties, ought not to be aggregated with the rest of the property and ought to be free from the payment of duty. As the Chancellor of the Exchequer had shown himself so fond of precedent to-night he would venture to offer the precedent of the Legacy Duty. He believed he was right in asserting that a fund allocated for the purpose of Legacy Duty was not itself liable to Legacy Duty, and he believed that under the existing law the same principle would apply to Succession Duty. Then why could not the Chancellor of the Exchequer take that precedent when it was favourable to the taxpayer and apply it to the Estate Duty as he was ready to apply precedents not favourable to the taxpayer, but which the right hon. Gentleman considered favourable to the Exchequer? He hoped even now it might be possible for the right hon. Gentleman so far to reconsider this matter as to promise to make some proposition in the Bill, before this stage was finally concluded. He hoped the Government would consider with favour what he thought was the very reasonable principle laid down by his right hon. Friend, the only objection to which that had been raised was that it did not go far enough.

SIR W. HARCOURT said, perhaps he might be allowed to say, by way of explanation, that he would favourably consider any scheme that could be provided, before the Bill left the House, by which a fund could be set apart for the express purpose of paying Death Duties, and which should be inalienable. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Grimsby (Mr. Heneage) would be satisfied with that.

MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin) said, the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer was important, and it was well they should know what it amounted to. He did not wish to show any distrust of the right hon. Gentleman, but they did not hear very clearly what it was the right hon. Gentleman said. As he understood the right hon. Gentleman, he was favourable to any scheme which exempted from taxation for Estate Duty a fund expressly provided for the payment of Death Duties.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Yes, a fund that is so absolutely secured as to be inalienable.

MR. COURTNEY said, he understood the right hon. Gentleman that if a fund were provided for the express purpose of paying Death Duties, the right hon. Gentleman would look upon that proposal with favour, and see if he could not exempt it from Estate Duty. He thought his right hon. Friend the Member for Grimsby (Mr. Heneage) would do well to accept that proposition.

Sir W. Harcourt

SIR W. HARGREAVES was understood to say that the Motion must be withdrawn.

MR. COURTNEY said, that if they went to a Division it might be held that a provision of that sort had been negatived by the House, and he wished the mind of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to be kept perfectly open; therefore he thought his right hon. Friend would act wisely in accepting the suggestion, and withdrawing the Motion, rather than pressing it to a Division.

MR. HENEAGE said, he was quite prepared, under the circumstances, to withdraw the Motion.

MR. W. LONG (Liverpool, West Derby) said, he felt so strongly the desirability of obtaining some concession from the Government that he joined his right hon. Friend in urging the withdrawal of the Amendment. He sincerely hoped the right hon. Gentleman would not put them in the position of having the question excluded from all consideration at a future stage. He thought they were all agreed as to the condition that the money should be inalienable so far as the sum that was required for the Estate Duty. Any amount above that required for the Death Duties the State would consider as property belonging to the other property to be aggregated. For his part, he would be glad to see the exemptions extended to all forms of savings, and further to see that that part set apart for the payment of Death Duties should not be available for disposition by the owner for any other purpose whatever, and that the residue should be available for aggregation. Like other hon. Members, he felt that in many cases the burden of making this provision would be a very heavy one, and fall in many cases upon men who had lived a considerable part of their lives already, and had come to a time when they could only make this provision with very great difficulty, and it seemed a great hardship not merely to call on them, in some degree, far in excess of self-denial, but also to cast on his successors additional taxation. He hoped that during the report stage the Chancellor of the Exchequer would either suggest himself some method or accept some suggestion which would relieve money which was distinctly earmarked as money provided for the payment of Death Duties from aggregation; and thereby lighten the burden which would fall upon those who could only provide this money by acts of self-denial.

*MR. JOHNSON-FERGUSON (Leicester, Loughborough) ventured to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer to consider this proposal favourably before the further clauses of the Bill were reached. The proposal would, he believed, materially assist in meeting a difficulty that would certainly arise in districts such as he knew in Lancashire where a large proportion of leasehold cottage property is owned by the working classes, and in other districts small farms were held by the same class. No form of investment was more popular among the working classes of Lancashire than this cottage property, and it would be found that in Lancashire Town the larger portion of cottage property was owned by this class. From experience he had had he was convinced that considerable difficulty would arise among this class and to the Inland Revenue when on death taking place money had to be raised to meet the Death Duties. These small owners being exceedingly thrifty would, he felt sure, avail themselves of such a provision as was proposed by the Amendment; he believed the great bulk of these would insure their lives specially earmarking the policy as providing for the payment of Death Duties. A few years ago a considerable amount of cottage property came into his possession, and this he privately sold to men in his employ. In every instance the men paid about half the purchase-money, borrowing the remainder from Building Societies in the town. It would be perfectly impossible for these men within a short period to raise a further amount, to effect a further mortgage for the purpose of paying the duties payable on death. But in such a case, if this proposal were adopted—and such cases would often arise, for when this class of property was offered for sale it was usually purchased by working men—a provision such as this would be largely availed of, and no difficulty would arise. He admitted there ought to be a stringent provision for earmarking the policy so that it could not be alienated; and no doubt the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Heneage) would concur in that. He hoped that before the consideration of the Bill closed the Chancellor of the Exchequer would see his way to meet the desire he was sure was felt on both sides for some such a proposal as this.

SIR MARK STEWART (Kirkcudbright) considered it would be of great advantage to persons who were trying to make a start in life and to become the owners of a little property if this provision were adopted. Speaking for the class who were just a little above those who bought cottage property—namely, the purchasers of their own farms, he would point out that they did not pay the whole sum, but left a heavy mortgage on a large portion of the purchase-money, and to expect them to pay Death Duties would be not only an impossibility but almost an absurdity. The adoption of some such proposal as that suggested would really put more money into the pocket of the Chancellor of the Exchequer than almost any other way which was provided in the Bill. There would be great interest taken in this question throughout the country, and especially by the smaller proprietors. They would immediately insure their lives or their sons' lives, and in that way would not try to evade the Bill when it became an Act, as large numbers would do if a proposal like this were not accepted. He trusted, therefore, that before the Bill left the Report stage the Chancellor of the Exchequer would carry out what they believed he had foreshadowed in his remarks as being willing to do. He was satisfied that it would be the best thing he could do in the interests of the Exchequer, and would make the Bill more popular than it otherwise would be.

MR. HANBURY expressed a hope that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would realise that it was not large properties only which were affected by this proposal, but that it touched just as much yeomen farmers who had bought their own farms and the operatives in Lancashire towns who had purchased houses or cottages. They, above all others, would be the class who would benefit if a clause such as had been suggested were adopted, because they had probably got no money beyond the amount they had invested in the purchase of cottage or small farming property. He believed that in certain cases, such as those to which he alluded, there were exemptions from the Succession Duty, and if that were so the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not be creating new exemptions but only following the rule with regard to the Legacy and Succession Duty.

MR. BYRNE observed that under a proposal such as this the money would be applicable for the payment of the Death Duties before anything went to the executor at all, so that it would be ear-marked from the first, and the Inland Revenue authorities would get their money paid straight away.

MR. BARTLEY remarked that a proposal of this kind would meet cases of great difficulty. He suggested the omission of the words from the proposed clause, "by insuring his life for that purpose," and also the words "under such insurance policy." The clause would then read—

"When the deceased has, during his own life expressly provided for payment of the Estate Duty on any property passing at his death, or for any part of such Estate Duty, such sums of money as shall be payable to his estate shall not be aggregated with any other property for the purpose of determining the rate of Estate Duty, and no Estate Duty shall be payable thereon."

Then some proviso could follow to this effect: "Provided that the fund so provided shall be in the joint names of the Commissioners and the deceased." The money which had been so specially provided would not then be aggregated, which was possibly the worst part of the offence, because it was very hard that a man who had been thrifty and had carefully provided for the payment of the Death Duties should thereby be put just over the margin and compelled to pay at a higher rate than he would otherwise have had to pay.

SIR JAMES WHITEHEAD (Leicester) hoped that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, before expressing himself in favour of this proposal, would seriously consider that this would be establishing a new precedent which would tend to carry the principle much further than at the moment was anticipated. All who had engaged in business were aware that business men were obliged to pay Income Tax on Income Tax, or, in other words, they were not allowed to deduct Income Tax paid as part of the expenses of carrying on business. Now, he conceived that if this principle were established in connection with these duties, business men would be perfectly justified in demanding that Income Tax should be treated as an expense incident to carrying on business, and that in future the payment of Income Tax on Income Tax should cease. Again, he called the attention of the House to another point concerning the way in which this principle, if adopted, would work. Men of business who purchase a concession extending over a certain number of years usually set aside year by year a sum as payment of the amount originally laid out in acquiring the concession, and they had felt it to be a very great grievance that each year Income Tax had to be paid on this sum thus set aside. Now would not every argument in support of the principle on which the Amendment was founded equally hold good in respect to repayment in the case mentioned or to repay the cost of a lease? It certainly appeared to him that the acceptance of the principle would open up a very wide field of operation in the direction he had indicated, and he hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would very seriously consider the principle involved before accepting the suggestion of the right hon. Member for Grimsby.

MR. HENEAGE said that, after what had fallen from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he should withdraw the clause, but he desired to explain that the reason he thought such a difference ought to be made between insurance and other modes of making provision for the payment of the duty was because a person who insured his life really paid the whole of the Estate Duty during his lifetime.

Motion and Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, S.) moved the following clause:—

(Exemption of estates of £5,000 of persons killed in discharge of public duty.)

"Estate Duty shall not be payable on an estate the principal value of which does not exceed five thousand pounds, in the case of any person killed directly or indirectly in the performance of his duty, either in the Army or the Navy, or who loses his life in the performance of an heroic act of saving, or attempting to save, another person from danger, disease, or accident."

The question of the exemption of men in the Army and Navy from Estate Duty in the case of death on active service was debated to a certain extent on the Committee stage of the Bill. The objection that was then raised to the proposal was that inasmuch as some of the men in the Army and Navy were rich persons whose estate could well afford to pay duty it was not desirable to exempt them from the payment of duty, even though they lost their lives in the performance of their duties. He did not agree at all with that argument. It seemed to him that when a man was killed in the service of his country the relative amount of his means was a question of insignificance compared with the loss to his family of his life, and should be no bar to the exemption proposed in the new clause. But what he desired to protect from the new duties was the properties of men in the Army and Navy who were not rich men. He felt that the one great evil of the Bill was that it seemed to treat the rich man as if he were a criminal by reason of his wealth. He thought that was a mistake; but not being himself in the category of rich men he had, of course, more sympathy with the smaller men. He thought his clause removed the objections that were raised to the exemptions in Committee; for he limited the action of the exemption to estates that did not exceed £5,000, which could not be considered a large estate. The present rate of interest on money left for widows and children could not be taken to be much above 3 per cent., so that the clause would give exemption from Estate Duty only to the properties of those who, dying in the discharge of their duty to their country, or in the performance of some heroic deed, left their widows and children something under £150 a year. It was said during the Debate on the question in Committee that the men in the Army and Navy were paid to be killed. It was true that for the sake of protecting us, of protecting the interests of their Queen and country, those men were paid for running the risk of being killed; but it should not be forgotten that they were not paid much, and that because of their profession they paid more for the provisions they made for their wives and children by life assurance than civilians. The fact that the men of the Army and Navy were paid was no reason why the nation should not be grateful for their deeds of self-sacrifice and bravery, and make the lives of their widows and children as easy as possible. Therefore, it was not in any way unreasonable that they should exempt from the Estate Duties the properties of those men of the Army and Navy who died in the performance of their duty, and left their widows and orphans £100 or £150 a year. Take the case of the disaster to H.M.S. Victoria. Surely they ought to consider the lives of the men who went down with that ship as sacrificed for the good of the country, and therefore that it was not right or just that whatever provision the humble officers of the ship might have made for their widows and children should be taxed. The Bill continued in operation the provision by which the properties of private soldiers and able-bodied seamen, whether they died in active service or not, were exempt from duty; and he saw no reason why the properties of officers whose financial position was often but little better than the financial position of the men should not have the same privilege. His clause, however, went a little further. It was not limited to the Army and Navy. Some might think that that was a mistake; but he did not think so, because the history of the country was full of the records of heroic deeds; and many more deeds equally heroic were not recorded at all. The clause was not limited in its scope to the Army and Navy, but was intended to include acts of heroism in connection with explosions in mines, lifeboat rescues, acts of valour by firemen, and saving from drowning. Was it reasonable in those cases where men met their deaths in the performance of such acts and left small sums to widows and orphans that this paltry duty should be claimed, especially as the clause only suggested exemption if very little was left? In the case of an explosion in a mine amongst the first to volunteer for the work of exploration and rescue were such men as sub-managers—men who had saved a little money and had insured their lives. It was useless for ordinary miners to go without someone to lead them, and the leaders as a rule were men who had risen from the ranks. Why should not these men be assured, when volunteering for this dangerous duty, that the little provision they had been able to make for their wives and children would not be reduced by calls from the Exchequer in the event of their losing their lives? Surely it was not wise, under such circumstances, to tax the money left behind by these people. The class of persons affected by the clause would be comparatively young men, belonging to the best of the lower middle classes. Elderly men would not be sufficiently active or physically strong enough. The lives lost would be those of young men who in their short careers had not been able to make much provision for those who were to come after them. These acts of heroism should not be allowed to become a source of gain to the Exchequer. The families of men like Braidwood—a man who had brought the Metropolitan Fire Brigade to such a high state of efficiency, and who lost his life in the execution of his duty at the great Tooley Street fire—should not be made to pay a tax in consequence of the heroism of the parents they had lost. He did not, of course, imagine that the carrying of the clause would stimulate to the performance of heroic deeds. Thank God, in this country acts of heroism would always be forthcoming, however deficient the State might be in recognising them! It would be an insult to our brave countrymen to suppose for a moment that they would be influenced in their action by the thought of how they or their families were likely to be treated. Still, they ought not to have it in their minds that, if they lost their lives through acts of heroism the State would come down on the property they left behind them, and make a claim for a share of it—a claim which it could not make if these men did not render themselves martyrs to their duty. The Exchequer, in a sense, was the nation. What would the nation lose by granting the exemption for which he pleaded? In the event of this country being engaged in a war the exemptions might amount to a little, but the expenditure on war was so enormous that this loss would be a mere bagatelle when considered in relation to it. Ordinarily, there would not be more than 100 people in the course of a year who would come under the clause, and suppose the average amount they left behind was £2,000, at 3 per cent. the loss to the State would not amount to more than £6,000, a sum too paltry to discuss. The Chancellor of the Exchequer might say that he was short of money, but the nation was not so short that it should avail itself of this insignificant way of raising it. The working classes of the country were always disposed to act with generosity to those who sacrificed themselves in the manner he had indicated. He was confident the public would willingly pay a small extra sum in order to admit of these exemptions being made. He did not wish to bind himself to the wording of the clause so long as its principle was accepted. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer or the Solicitor General thought that the wording was not sufficiently precise he would agree to an alteration of it. But he maintained that the nation would only be too glad to assent to the principle of the clause.

New Clause—

(Exemption of estates of £5,000 of persons killed in discharge of public duty.)

"Estate Duty shall not be payable on an estate the principal value of which does not exceed five thousand pounds, in the case of any person killed directly or indirectly in the performance of his duty, either in the Army or the Navy, or who loses his life in the performance of an heroic act of saving, or attempting to save, another person from danger, disease, or accident."—(Mr. Bartley.)

Clause brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be now read a second time."

MR. R. T. REID said, that it would be very agreeable to everybody if it were practicable to adjust taxation according to the personal merits or demerits of the person who had to pay it; but the hon. Member would agree that this clause was only the thin end of the wedge and could only be justified on the basis that they ought in these matters to have regard for the characteristics of the individuals. He was aware that there was on the Statute Book an exemption in favour of soldiers and seamen slain in action, but he could not see a precedent in that statute for claiming exemption in the case of estates up to £5,000 for persons who had distinguished themselves by heroic conduct. If men behaved with that gallantry which often distinguished people in all the ranks of life, they could be repaid in no better way than by the esteem and admiration of their fellow men.

Whatever might be his personal sympathies—and if it were possible he would like to see all persons with small incomes and all widows and children exempted from taxation—they were there for the purpose of discharging business duties, and the Amendment, though honourable to the hon. Gentleman who proposed it, could not be accepted.

SIR J. GORST (Cambridge University) said, he sympathised sincerely with the Solicitor General in the very disagreeable duty that he had had to discharge. They knew very well that he could not accept the clause, because the authority who was able to accept it was not present, and had left his instructions behind him.

MR. R. T. REID: Will you allow me to say that I most cordially agree in the impossibility of accepting it?

SIR J. GORST said, that he had not said that the hon. and learned Gentleman did not agree in that opinion; but, before the arguments of the hon. Mover of the clause were heard, it had been decided that it could not be accepted. He (Sir J. Gorst) should not have risen at all if the refusal to accept the clause had not been based upon the idea that they should not graduate taxation according to the merits of the person by whom it was to be paid. That was a pure invention on the part of the Solicitor General himself. No such argument as that had appeared in the speech of the mover of the clause. What the hon. Member had put before the House, and what he (Sir J. Gorst) should like to put before it—and what, no doubt, the Secretary to the Treasury would like to put before it—was, this was not a question of the character of the people who paid the tax, but of the character of the Exchequer which received it. The Exchequer—a Government Department—as well as an individual, had a character for honour and honesty to maintain, and the proposition before the House was that when a man sacrificed his life in the public interest it was a mean thing for the Exchequer to take advantage of that death to exact the Death Duty from the widow and children of the deceased. That was the position. It was not a question of the merits of the person who died, but that the public ought not, in honour and honesty, to take advantage of a death caused under these circumstances to put a sum of money into its pocket. That was the simple position, and he was quite certain that if the mass of the people of this country, who were very generous, could be brought to understand a question of this kind, and brought to vote, ay or no, on it, they would by an overwhelming majority declare against exacting Death Duty in the case of a person whose death was caused by his devotion to the public interest.

COLONEL KENYON - SLANEY (Shropshire, Newport) said, the House could not but have felt how cruel was the contest going on between the official and the man as the Solicitor General was speaking. The hon. and learned Gentleman, he supposed, was bound by the trammels of officialism to give them the answer he did. He (Colonel Kenyon-Slaney) was sure that if the right hon. Gentleman had felt himself free he would have given a very different reply. What was asked was that in the case of a man who sacrificed his life in the public interest those he left behind him should not be fined for that sacrifice. One of the conditions of the Public Service was that, if necessary, life should be sacrificed in the performance of duty. But the fact of a man so sacrificing his life brought him under the fine of this Bill. He hoped and trusted that, later on, he would have a chance of elaborating still further the claims of the Army and Navy to consideration in this respect. But others were to be considered besides the soldier and sailor. Take the case of the fireman who, to save the lives of others, sacrificed his own. If he had saved up a competency the measure would fine his wife and children for his having done an heroic act. If he had not done that act of gallantry, humanly speaking, he would have had many years of life in which to increase his savings. Surely the wife and family, who might be deprived of so much, had a right to the consideration which the Amendment would extend to them. Again, take the case of the volunteer who volunteered for rescue work in a fiery mine. Probably no more heroic act could be performed than that, or one that enlisted more thoroughly the sympathy of the public. Yet it was extraordinary that when it was proposed that in relation to such acts as this an exemption should be made from Death Duties—an exemption that 99 per cent. of the people would be willing to grant—they should be met with this official non possumus. If the laws of this country were to be framed and administered so as to meet the wishes of the majority of the people, the Amendment ought to be accepted. Look at the influence for good or for evil the acceptance or rejection of the clause would have on the characteristics of men in the country! He did not mean to say that men would consider such inducements as the Amendment offered in the performance of acts of heroism, but surely the fact that a life lost in such circumstances was recognised by the State would be some encouragement to that conduct on which so much, at times, depended. The Government would be shortsighted to reject the Amendment. He urged them to reconsider a decision which did not, in his opinion, redound to their credit or find an echo in the hearts of the people.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) said, the question divided itself into two parts. The last part of the clause introduced a new precedent, but surely it was a good one. All the hon. Member asked was, that if a man performed an act of heroism and lost his life the State should not take advantage of that fact to mulct his relatives in Death Duties. That was a reasonable ground to take up. But in regard to the first part of the clause there was precedent for it all through, and that went further than the hon. Member suggested. An Act of George III. exempted from Stamp Duty soldiers, sailors, and marines who lost their lives in the service of the State. He presumed that this Act was not repealed.

SIR W. HARCOURT: No.

MR. HANBURY said, that Act went further than anything suggested. It affected not only the soldier who died on the battle-field, but the soldier who died in the service of the Crown in time of peace. He held that existing exemptions ought to be maintained. They were told that the exemption from Stamp Duty allowed to the common soldier or marine, whether in time of peace or of war, was to be continued, and he would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he could not allow exemption from Probate Duty in the case of officers dying on service. This was not a very large matter after all. At present exemption was allowed in the cases of officers and soldiers dying on service where the surplus estate did not exceed £100, and preferential charges such as those for illness and military debts, servants' wages, were allowed, although such deductions were not permissible in the case of a civilian. Why could not this exemption be continued in the case of the Estate Duty? These exemptions were not confined to the Naval and Military Services, for until last year they extended to ordinary civil servants whose arrears of pay amounted to not more than £100. Last year, however, a change was made, and the exemption now only applied to civil servants connected with the Admiralty. Of course, that was an anomalous state of things, but altogether he maintained that his hon. Friends had good precedents for the claim he was making. Indeed, he did not think he had gone far enough. The claim ought not to be limited to the cases of men dying in the Naval and Military Service of the Crown; it ought to apply also to the Civil Service generally. Possibly he had gone a little too far in fixing the limit so high as £5,000, but the principle he was advocating was a good one, and had been embodied in our legislation in the past.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I would suggest that this matter would be more properly discussed on Clause 8, and I may say that we think that that clause maintains existing practices as to exemptions.

*SIR M. HICKS-BEACH said, that if the right hon. Gentleman had been present throughout the discussion he would not have supposed that all they desired was that existing exemptions should be continued. Of course, they could not expect him to be always present in the House, but he would like to remind him of what the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Cambridge University had well said—namely, that the people of this country like to be generous in such matters as this. He did not believe personally that there would be any objection on the part of the public to some reasonable extension of the existing exemptions, provided always they could find a good stopping point. His hon. Friend now proposed that the exemption already enjoyed by seamen and marines should be extended to all persons, whether officers or private soldiers, or sailors, who served in the Army and Navy. Now, he thought that that was a very reasonable proposal indeed. In Committee he ventured to point out the injustice of depriving officers and non-commissioned officers of the benefits of the exemption enjoyed by common soldiers and sailors. But his hon. Friend also argued that there was a much larger class of persons who lost their lives through some voluntary and heroic action in saving the lives of others, and who equally deserved to share in the exemption of the Estate Duty. He doubted whether exemption would be given in such cases, for it would be very hard to draw the line. Men in the Civil Service and in private life often lost their lives in doing their duty; doctors especially did many heroic acts, which would not come within the words of his hon. Friend. But he ventured to suggest to the Chancellor of the Exchequer that before Clause 8 was reached the Government should consider whether they could not merely re-enact the existing exemptions with regard to soldiers and sailors, but so alter the law as to make it applicable to all persons engaged in the Services, with a limitation, of course, as to the amount of property left by any one person to whom the exemption might apply.

MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin) then moved a new clause providing that when Estate Duty had been paid in respect of any property, and within eight years after the decease of the person upon whose death the duty became payable, any person to whom any part of such property passed died, then, in respect of so much of the said property, whether real or personal, which so passed to the second person as should have been maintained unchanged by him and passed at his death, one-half only of the Estate Duty otherwise authorised by this Act should be leviable. He said that this proposal differed materially from the one which had been comprehensively discussed. The Attorney General had spoken of the tendency of laymen to indulge in technicalities, but on this question they need not consider any technicalities at all; they had to examine in order to understand these things properly what was the basis of the proposed Estate Duty, because he put this clause before the House not as a plea for an allowance in a case of hardship, or as an application for mercy, or alleviation in special instances, but as a working out of the principles the Chancellor of the Exchequer had himself advocated. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had said that the Estate Duty was the equivalent of the real unpaid taxes, and if that were so it followed that the House would be going beyond the proper limit of the tax if it imposed the tax in the case of quickly recurring deaths. The proposal he made was simply that in cases where Estate Duty had been paid in respect of any property, real or personal, and the duty again became payable on the same property on any part of the property, within eight years, the amount of duty imposed should be only half that levied in the first case, and in passing he would remind the Committee that by a clerical error in the last line of his Amendment, as it appeared on the Paper, "five" was substituted for "eight." His point could most forcibly be illustrated by taking the case of a son dying by accident or otherwise shortly after his father, on whose death the Estate Duty had been paid. It would be obviously unjust that the full duty should be again levied on the decease of the son, who might possibly have enjoyed the property left him for a few weeks or days only. Other cases of the kind, involving equal injustice, might arise. The clause he had moved might not be the best way, but at any rate it was a reasonable and practicable way of redressing what would otherwise, under the Bill, be a great injustice. If any hesitation was felt about applying the clause to personal property on the ground that personalty was much more difficult to follow than realty, he would point out that in these days persons invested their money in many forms of personal property which had a character of permanence as well as realty—railway shares, for example. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had laid down a principle which necessarily involved the application of many injustices, and he (Mr. Courtney) suggested that he should remedy the injustice in respect of one considerable class. His right hon. Friend had already approved of the underlying principle of the clause, because he had introduced into the Bill a provision in respect of settlements which, although going in the direction of his clause, was of a very injurious and impolitic character, encouraging as it would the perpetuation of settlements. Why had the Chancellor of the Exchequer introduced this clause? Mainly, he thought, because he felt that to tax to the full extent property passing rapidly in succession would be to perpetrate an injustice which he could not defend. This new clause was really an attempt to apply the same principle which was involved in the case of settled property to unsettled property—that was to say, if it remained intact, and could prove its claim, there should be the same diminished pressure of taxation on subsequent devolutions, when they came in a short time, as in the case of settled property under the scheme of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. There was no particular magic in the figures which he had used, but he thought the period of eight years was a reasonable one, and that a diminution of the duty to one-half would be also reasonable. He would put the clause to the judgment of the House, because he thought that upon its merits it claimed that the principle involved in it should be considered.

New Clause—

(If estate becomes again leviable within eight years half duty only to be charged.)

"When Estate Duty has been paid in respect of any property, and within eight years after the decease of the person upon whose death the duty became payable, any person to whom any part of such property passed shall die, then, in respect of so much of the said property whether real or personal which so passed to the second person as shall have been maintained unchanged by him and passes at his death, one-half only of the Estate Duty otherwise authorised by this Act shall be leviable; and this provision shall apply in respect of all successive deaths occurring within five years from the decease of the person first named in this section."—(Mr. Courtney.)

Clause brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Clause be read a second time."

SIR W. HARCOURT said, the right hon. Gentleman had founded himself upon what was already in the Bill with regard to settlements, but had omitted all mention of the circumstance that 1 per cent. more would have to be paid in respect of that property than would have to be paid in respect of unsettled property.

MR. COURTNEY: I have reduced the amount by one-half and taken off the 1 per cent. altogether.

SIR W. HARCOURT, continuing, said, that in inserting the provision alluded to by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bodmin, the Government had no desire or intention of encouraging settlements. He quite understood the point of view from which his right hon. Friend approached this subject. He had said his plan was a rough-and-ready way of dealing with the matter, and that it could not be dealt with with methodical accuracy. That rough-and-ready way of taking one thing with another no doubt brought out an average, but his right hon. Friend dealt with only one view of the subject. In striking, in his rough-and-ready way, an average period of devolution, he had omitted to take into consideration the amount that the Revenue would lose in cases where a man lived to 80 years of age in consequence of the property not being devolved during that period. It would be impossible for the Inland Revenue Department to trace back property during a long period in order to find out whether there had been a change of the character of the investment.

SIR J. LUBBOCK said, the Chancellor of the Exchequer objected to this Amendment on the ground of the analogy of the further Estate Duty. He said that in that case 1 per cent. extra was charged, and that in the present Amendment his right hon. Friend (Mr. Courtney) was making no proposal for any such compensation to the Revenue. That was true, but his right hon. Friend did not propose a reduction of the whole duty in the case of unsettled property, but only of one-half. That was more than the allowance made in the other case. The right hon. Gentleman complained that his right hon. Friend only dealt with the cases which were in favour of and not those which would tell against the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He understood that his right hon. Friend spoke of cases where the deaths might follow in the same generation. The case of a man who lived until he was 80 years of age was met by the consideration that upon the doctrine of averages it was quite certain that the next heir would succeed and die sooner, so that things upon the whole would be balanced.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Supposing he is succeeded by his great-grandson?

SIR J. LUBBOCK said, that a man must have married very young if he died at 80 and was succeeded by his great-grandson. At any rate, such cases were so rare that for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to advance that as an argument went strongly in favour of the Amendment. As to the second argument of the Chancellor of the Exchequer—where claims were made, the onus probandi would of course rest with the persons who made them in order to show that the property was unchanged. He thought the House would see that there was no more in the second than in the first. Then, as to the valuations leading to litigation, it should not lie in the mouth of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to bring forward that argument. Of course the difficulty arose as to the time at which the valuations should be made, and no doubt that might lead to litigation, but the argument as applied to this clause was weaker than the other two.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he thought they were familiar, and almost too familiar, with a certain class of argument addressed to them by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. When he could find no other reason for rejecting an Amendment, he rejected it on the ground that Somerset House was too foolish to work it. He thought the officials there were competent to do their business, and perfectly well able to discover whether property had been maintained unchanged or not. What his right hon. Friend who moved the Amendment desired to procure was that in case of personal property, where there had been no tampering with the capital value, and where it had not been expended for the use of the person on whose death the tax was claimed, there should be this remission. Surely the proposal of his hon. Friend was not beyond the comprehension of that important Department of which the right hon. Gentleman was the head and on which he seemed to throw discredit. The right hon. Gentleman should remember that he had not to deal with the average which went into the Exchequer;

he had to deal with the equities as they touched the individual. They were told the other day of the story of Mr. Scarlett, afterwards Lord Abinger. [Sir W. HARCOURT: I told it.] Then he should not repeat it. They had here an injustice which ought to be remedied, and his hon. Friend only proposed that if the duty became leviable within eight years an allowance should be made. He did not believe that that would make much difference to the Exchequer, while it would prevent an individual hardship. If the Exchequer would suffer by the acceptance of the Amendment, it was because the case it sought to meet was a very common case. Conceive proposing a tax of which a large element consisted in making a number of exactions on the capital value of a property in intervals of less than eight years! The thing was a scandal and an outrage. He was convinced that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, if he considered the matter, would feel that the interval of eight years was so much less than the average on which he expected to exact Death Duties that he might well grant the principle of justice contained in the Amendment without damaging the financial interests of which he was the guardian. He could not help thinking that, if the right hon. Gentleman was not entirely lost to any sense of justice, except that which might be described as Treasury justice—which looked upon mankind as an insurance office, looked at them and treated them upon tables of averages and not of individuals—he would feel that one of the main duties of every Government in the taxation of the community was to see that justice was done, not only as between class and class, but as between every class and the Exchequer, and that no individual, so far as they could prevent it, should be compelled to contribute more than his fair share to the cost of the government of the community. Unless the Government adopted that system, they likened themselves to those who levied blackmail upon people who were incapable of defending themselves, and who did not attempt to institute any broad and simple principle by which all members of society should contribute, according to their means, towards the cost of carrying on the business in which society was concerned. He greatly regretted that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not seen his way either to accept the Amendment or to modify it; and he hoped that, if they had an opportunity of bringing forward the question again, the right hon. Gentleman would treat with a more favourable spirit the main object which the right hon. Member for Bodmin had in view.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 127; Noes 165.—(Division List, No. 156.)

MR. BYRNE moved the following new clause:—

(Remission of Estate Duty on property passing to wife or husband.)

“If the Estate Duty payable in respect of property passing on the death of the deceased to his or her wife or husband for his or her own use or benefit shall not exceed the Estate Duty payable in respect of one-third of the property passing on such death, the whole of such duty, or, if such duty shall exceed the Estate Duty payable in respect of such one-third, the amount of the excess, shall be remitted or repaid by the Commissioners to such wife or husband.”

He said, he had understood the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the course of the discussions on the Bill, to express his intention of viewing favourably any proposition dealing with the cases of husbands or wives. There was a great deal to be said about family provisions, but the case of the widow of a poor professional man who had had to work hard all his life, or of a tradesman who had saved his £5,000, must appeal to everybody. She would under this Bill have to pay comparatively heavy duties which might be a severe burden to her. It was recognised in the Succession Duty Act and the Legacy Duty Act that property passing between husband and wife ought not to be heavily taxed, and the principle had also been recognised to a certain extent in this Bill. He did not want to deal with the case of the millionaire, but he thought that in cases of estates of £10,000 to £15,000, and still more in cases of estates of £5,000 or £6,000, it was a very hard thing if a widow who succeeded to one-third of her husband's savings had to pay the full Estate Duty. Undoubtedly in recent years, for a great number of purposes, the Legislature had more and more regarded the husband and wife as separate persons, but Parliament had never yet reversed that theory of married life which had endured ever since anything like civilisation had been known in the world—namely, that it was the duty of the husband to provide for the wife. The State had recognised that it was good not only for the family, but for the State itself, that men should be encouraged in every way to make proper provision for their wives. The same principle did not apply to such a degree to the case of property passing from the wife to the husband, but the legislation of all civilised nations regarded the lives of husband and wife as if they were one life. Regarded from the point of view of averages, their lives were not like two ordinary lives. Sometimes people married persons much younger than themselves, but that was not the usual state of things, and as a rule the two lives together were very near the average of one ordinary good life. He hoped that the House would perform the act of justice proposed in his clause.

New Clause—

(Remission of Estate Duty on property passing to wife or husband.)

"If the Estate Duty payable in respect of property passing on the death of the deceased to his or her wife or husband for his or her own use or benefit shall not exceed the Estate Duty payable in respect of one-third of the property passing on such death, the whole of such duty or, if such duty shall exceed the Estate Duty payable in respect of such one-third, the amount of the excess shall be remitted or repaid by the Commissioners to such wife or husband."—(Mr. Byrno.)

Clause brought up, and read the first time."

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

SIR W. HARCOURT: The fallacy, if I may say so without offence, on which this clause is founded is that the Estate Duty is paid by those who succeed to the property. I am almost ashamed to repeat over and over again that it is a deduction from the property itself and is totally irrespective of the person to whom it passes. This clause carries us back again to the attempt that was made on the other side of the House to introduce a totally different principle and to regard the matter from the point of view of the benefit derived by the individual. That is the point of view on which the Legacy Duty and the Succession Duty are based, but we have endeavoured from the very first to show that the Estate Duty is founded on the principle on which the Probate Duty is founded—namely, that of taking the payment from the estate itself regardless of the person to whom it passes. This Amendment affects not only the Estate Duty, but the payment of the Probate Duty to an enormous extent. The proposal of this Amendment is one that affects hundreds of thousands of pounds. It is one of the most serious Amendments as regards its effect upon the Revenue that have been moved, and if it were carried it would be absolutely necessary to alter the system of graduation in order to make up for the harm done by it. All the hardship to which the hon. Member has referred exists at present. There is under the Probate Duty no exemption of property passing from husband to wife or from wife to husband. That is now the law, and would have continued to be the law if this Bill had never been proposed. I am not aware myself that there ever has been a proposal to alter the Probate Duty in this respect. When we are asked to abandon any additional Revenue that might be obtained by the Estate Duty, we are asked to abandon an enormous amount of the Revenue that will be derived from the increased taxation. That is not a proposal that is reasonable at a time when we are called upon to raise a large additional sum of money, especially when it is accompanied by a proposal actually to cut down the existing Revenue. The right hon. Gentleman opposite just now attacked me for regarding simply the results to the Exchequer. I am obliged to regard the results to the Exchequer. The House of Commons ordered me to find between £4,000,000 and £5,000,000 more money, and therefore I am obliged to resist proposals the effect of which would be to cut down the existing sources of revenue. It is said that hardship is done in this case. The hon. Member, however, does not appear to observe what great exemptions and benefits are now actually given to the very class of persons we are speaking of. The Estate Duty altogether clears the Succession Duty and the Legacy Duty in regard to these persons, and that is an immense boon. I am bound to tell the House that this proposal is not consistent with the interests of the Revenue and with the raising of the sum of money we are called upon to obtain. It would invade and break down even the existing sources of the Revenue, and it would be inconsistent with the principle of the Bill, which is to raise the money out of the property regardless of individuals. I must, therefore, oppose the clause.

MR. COHEN (Islington, E.) said, the right hon. Gentleman had stated that the Estate Duty had no regard to the individuals to whom the property passed. This was about the most encouraging remark that had proceeded from the right hon. Gentleman during these long Debates, and he thought the House must welcome the state of mind at which the right hon. Gentleman confessed he had at last arrived. After his confession, it was to be hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would eventually arrive at such a state of humiliation at the iniquity of some of his proposals that he would see his way to accept Amendments. The right hon. Gentleman could not expect the House to accept as an argument why a widow should be unjustly taxed the fact that the right hon. Gentleman was called upon to find £5,000,000. Were the widows to find the deficit? He almost thought that the Opposition could, if the occasion had been opportune, have found more reasonable sources to which to apply for the millions required by the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman said that the Estate Duty cleared Succession Duty and Legacy Duty, but he could not expect the House to be grateful to him for taking off 2 or 3 per cent. and putting on 7 or 8 per cent. The right hon. Gentleman ought either to accept the clause or to give the House some more valid reasons for rejecting it.

*MR. BUTCHER (York) said, the right hon. Gentleman had attempted to justify his refusal of the Amendment by reasons with which the House had now become familiar. But by being the more familiar they did not become more acceptable. On the contrary, he should be disposed to say that the more familiar they became with the Chancellor of the Exchequer's reasons the less they liked them. What were the right hon. Gentleman's reasons? The first was a play upon words. They were told that the Estate Duty was not Estate Duty, but a deduction from the property. What consolation was it to a widow to be told this Estate Duty was not regarded so much as a tax paid by her as a deduction from the property passing to her? That was no more consolation to the widow than it would be when she called for bread to give her a stone.

SIR W. HARCOURT: It is done now.

*MR. BUTCHER said, that was the right hon. Gentleman's second argument. As to the argument that the Bill made no change in the incidence of existing taxation, what did it come to? Because there were anomalies now, therefore they were to be continued and continued in an aggravated form. They were told "The widow has to pay under the existing Probate Duty. It may be wrong and an injustice, but we justify our imposition of the Estate Duty on the existence of the present anomaly." When the Chancellor of the Exchequer was remodelling the Death Duties he ought to endeavour to remove anomalies which pressed hardly upon widows and children instead of increasing them. Might he appeal to the right hon. Gentleman to have regard to the colonial analogy? The colonies were in advance of us in this matter. In New Zealand no duty was payable on property passing from husband to wife or wife to husband. In Victoria such persons paid only one-half what others paid. In South Australia by the Act of 1893, the latest and most stringent of all the colonial Acts, there was a very large exemption for widows and children. Was it an unfair thing to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer even at the risk of some small loss to the Exchequer to signalise the advent of this great democratic Budget by the removal of some of the anomalies which had hitherto disgraced the financial legislation of the country.

MR. GOSCHEN said, the Chancellor of the Exchequer based his opposition to the Amendment on the effect it would have on the Revenue, but had not told the House what that effect would be. In fact, the House had been placed in a very disadvantageous position by the way in which the right hon. Gentleman had lumped together the whole of the Revenue which would be derived from the changes under the Bill, and it was impossible to realise what effect any particular change would produce, either with regard to the

Estate Duty, the Probate Duty, or from the graduation that was to be carried out. They had been given large figures, but not any details. They were not told how much the Chancellor of the Exchequer expected this year and how much next. What he continually said was, "You must grant me this money or I shall not be able to pay my way," but he did not say how much he would require next year, so that all his appeals lost their effect. The right hon. Gentleman might fairly appeal to those of them who had held responsible positions, and might say, "You will make me insolvent unless you grant me this duty." But he did not say that. This statement was repeated until it began to lose its effect. This was not one of the questions which affected the millionaire; it was one of the questions which affected the smaller and the professional man. Hon. Gentlemen opposite were always taxing the Opposition with their partiality for the landed interest. They could not do so, however, on the present occasion, when his hon. Friends and himself were supporting the cause of the widows of the professional men. They had here a case which would appeal to the general sense of the House. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said that the adoption of the Amendment would cause an enormous loss to the Revenue; but he had given them no idea of the sum to which the loss would amount. Would it be a matter of £200,000 or £250,000? They were entirely in the dark, and had been in the dark during the whole of these Debates. Supposing there was a slight loss this year, how far would that loss extend in future years? Let them remember that they were not legislating, unfortunately, for the present year; they were changing the Death Duties for a whole series of years, and they should, therefore, consider whether what they were sanctioning now would be right and equitable in future years. As one who had been responsible for the expenditure of the country in times past he did not think too much weight ought to be attached to the right hon. Gentleman's argument that if this particular Amendment was passed a deficit would result. They must get over that as best they could, but in order to be able to square the expenditure of this year they must not pass any legislation which would be undesirable and inexpedient in future years. The argument of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the proposal which had been made would affect the finances of this year was, to his mind, not sufficient to meet the arguments which had been urged from his side of the House.

SIR J. LUBBOCK said, he could not remember during the whole course of his experience in this House a Bill which had been so little listened to by its supporters, or one in support of which so few arguments had been adduced. Here they had had a most important argument brought forward upon an Amendment which went to the root of our social life and affected entirely new principles in our social legislation, and yet there was not a single supporter of the Government who said a word. They all knew, however, that if they went to a Division those gentlemen would all vote as one man against the Amendment. He had observed upon all the Amendments they had brought forward when the Chancellor of the Exchequer had nothing whatever to say against them he fell back upon the statement that they were opposed to the principles of the Bill. Of course they were, but the question was whether they were opposed to justice and right. The right hon. Gentleman said that the Bill did not take money from the widow but from the estate. What consolation was that to the widow? Could anybody get up and explain how it was they were not taking this amount from the widow? It was ridiculous to say so. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said it had nothing to do with the benefit to the heir. That was a fallacy—he might say it was a mockery to make a statement of that kind. They were dealing with the heir, and could not help doing so, whatever was said to the contrary. It was not a question of benefit of the heir but of injury to the widow. If one took it from the estate one took it from the widow. That was proved by the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that this Amendment would affect the Revenue to the extent of hundreds of thousands of pounds. The statement was very surprising, but if the proposals in the Bill were unjust that only showed how great the injustice was. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had told them over and over again that he had got to find the money.

of the Government was not to find the funds, but to find them. How did the Chancellor of the Exchequer treat the cases of husband and wife? When it suited him to do so he treated them as two persons, when he could get more out of them the other way he said they were one. The right hon. Gentleman ought to make up his mind on the subject, as both positions could not be right. The proposal to treat widows like other legatees was opposed to our previous legislation, and, indeed, to that of almost all other countries. He supposed the supporters of the Government would all vote against the clause, however, because he had noticed that throughout the whole discussion on the Bill they had never troubled themselves to listen to any of the arguments that had been urged in the cause of justice from the other side of the House. In fact, in his experience no important Bill had ever been brought in by any Government which they seemed so unable or so unwilling to support by any kind of argument at all. In this case undoubtedly a great injustice would be done to widows. There was one remark which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had made, however, which he fully agreed with—it was that the Bill had been framed regardless of the interests of the individual. [Cries of "Oh!"]

SIR W. HARCOURT: I never made any such statement. [Opposition cries of "Oh, oh!" and "Question!"] I remember the time when a gentleman who rose in this House of Commons to correct a misstatement was always listened to in silence and his correction accepted. I am sorry that a new practice seems to have arisen. What I said was that this Estate Duty was founded upon the same principle as the Probate Duty, which paid no regard to the person who inherited, but only took cognisance of the estate out of which the duty was to be paid. That is a very different thing to saying that this Bill is framed regardless of the interests of the individual.

SIR J. LUBBOCK said, that had he not been interrupted he had intended to say that such a statement was no argument against the present Amendment. He understood the right hon. Gentleman to have used the words he had quoted, but of course if his right hon. Friend said that he had misunderstood him he did not wish to press the point any further.

MR. BYLES (York, W.R., Shipley) said, the reason why those on his side of the House had not considered it their duty to enter more fully into the discussion on this Bill was because the matter had been abundantly explained by the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the law officers. The reason why he liked the Budget and did not think widows would be treated unjustly was because it was proposed to defer the taxation of the property until it fell in, and then, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer had explained, it would bear the share of taxation which was due from the estate. It had been pointed out again and again that it was not the successor who paid the Estate Duty. He succeeded to whatever property the deceased left after his debts had been paid by his executors to the State as well as to private individuals. Nearly all the Amendments they had been discussing ad nauseam were Amendments the principle of which had been determined in previous Debates. He protested against the suggestion that the supporters of the Government were afraid to defend the Bill, and that they were merely mechanical voters because they refused to provide fresh fuel with which the Opposition could keep up this perpetual obstruction. If the principles contained in the Bill had not been abundantly debated then he would ask what hope was there for any Government ever getting any legislation passed. He submitted that, considering the business before the country, the House could not afford more time for the discussion of principles of this Bill, and it was only with the view of saving time—which was not observed by hon. Members opposite—that he and his friends had abstained from further wearying the House.

Question put.

*MR. BUTCHER (York) moved the following clause :—

(Friendly Societies (exemption).)

"(1) Estate Duty shall not be payable on the death of the deceased in respect of any capital sum not exceeding two hundred pounds, or any annuity the principal value of which does not exceed two hundred pounds provided by the deceased in his lifetime under the rules of any friendly, provident, or industrial society of which the deceased was a member, and payable on his death by the trustees of such society, and for the purpose of this section the Customs Annuity and Benevolent Fund shall be deemed to be a friendly society.

It was, he said, hardly necessary for him to say one word in favour of Friendly Societies in general, but he felt that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, for the sake of the widows and orphans and relatives of the poor persons of the class who belonged to Friendly Societies, should allow this small exemption from the Estate Duty. He had often heard it said that the Government did not want to give encouragement to any special class of providence or insurance; but this was a case in which they might make a special exception. He felt sure the concession he asked for would involve a small loss to the Exchequer, but the social gain would be far greater than any loss which might be incurred. The reason he had chosen the sum of £200 was because that was the limit of the amount a man could insure for in the Friendly Societies. This clause was really to a great extent the corollary of the one which was carried at the instigation of the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the purpose of exempting annuities of not more than £25 a year. If they exempted an annuity of that small amount was there any reason why they should not exempt the capital sum of £200, which was somewhat less than the capital value of £25 a year. If they exempted one they ought to exempt the other. Among the Societies which would receive the benefit of this clause was the Customs Annuity and Benevolent Fund, started more than half a century ago for the purpose of enabling the poorer class of Customs and Revenue officers to make provision for their wives and families. The sums assured were very often the only sums available for the benefit of the wife and children of these people, and for those sums not exceeding £200 it was not unreasonable to say they should be free from the clutches of the Inland Revenue as regarded Estate Duty. Might he make an appeal to the Chancellor of the Exchequer and ask him not to act the part of Pharaoh towards this class and not to harden his heart on this occasion, but allow these people to go without exacting this Estate Duty from them? It was not unreasonable to ask that thrift and providence in the shape of Friendly Societies should be encouraged by giving what was, after all, but a small concession.

New Clause—

(Friendly Societies (Exemption).)

"(1) Estate Duty shall not be payable on the death of the deceased in respect of any capital sum not exceeding two hundred pounds, or any annuity the principal value of which does not exceed two hundred pounds provided by the deceased in his lifetime under the rules of any friendly, provident, or industrial society of which the deceased was a member, and payable on his death by the trustees of such society, and for the purpose of this section the Customs Annuity and Benevolent Fund shall be deemed to be a friendly society.

(2) The duty mentioned in the second paragraph of the First Schedule to this Act shall not be payable in respect of any property which would but for this section be chargeable with Estate Duty."—(Mr. Butcher.)

Clause brought up, and read the first time."

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

SIR W. HARCOURT thought the heart of Pharaoh must not have been very hard upon these small estates. Let them see what the Bill already did. Estates under £100 paid no duty at all; estates over £100, but not exceeding £300, paid 30s.; and an estate of £500 paid 50s. Those were the provisions of the Bill. Could it be said, therefore, that the Bill was hard on small properties? There never had been a Bill in which the allowance of exemptions had been so liberal, and that was a feature of this Bill. Having made the charge upon £200 only 30s., the hon. and learned Member proposed to superadd to that by making a special exemption in regard to Friendly Societies. There was nobody—and he believed the Friendly Societies would bear him witness in that respect—who had taken a more active part in promoting the interests of Friendly Societies than he, but he could not say, with reference to Friendly Societies, any more than he had said with reference to Insurance Companies, that they ought to give them a special and distinguishing advantage other kind of investment. It was that a man might have a small sum, and it would answer him better to put his £200 into his shop than into the Friendly Society. It might be that he desired to put his £200 into the Savings Bank or into investments which were now permitted through the Savings Bank; or he might put it into his own house, than which there was no better investment for a poor man, and yet they were asked to charge him for the £200 in his own house, and to exempt the particular investment in the Friendly Societies. There was no reason for that, and it was not good finance. They were not putting any excessive burden upon these men. The man for whom the hon. and learned Member asked this exemption was already charged 30s. for the whole and it cleared him, and he could not help appealing to responsible financiers opposite whether they thought it was a wise and proper thing to make this exemption, not with respect to property of a particular figure, but in respect of property invested in a particular manner, and that not by any means the only good manner, for there were investments equally as good, and even better, which they left without any exemption. He did not think it would be a sound principle upon which to go, and therefore he could not accept the Amendment.

MR. BARTLEY was not surprised at the Chancellor of the Exchequer, because it would be very difficult to be surprised at any view the right hon. Gentleman took upon these matters. But the matter was not one which ought to be looked upon in this way. The question was were they not in every possible way to do all they could to promote thrift, habits of saving, and the extension of Friendly Societies throughout the country? That had been the policy for a good many years, and although he admitted that the payment of 30s. on £200 was not a large sum, still they must have regard to the people who had to pay it. Many of the persons would regard the tax as a considerable tax, and one which would prevent them joining Friendly Societies and providing for the future. Was it wise to put this little and annoying tax upon the people just when they had trained them into the habit of joining and interesting themselves in these Friendly Societies? There were many instances in which by small beginnings people had bought their own houses, and by putting a small sum in the Friendly Societies in the Savings Bank, and in other small ways, made provision for the future, and might thus have £400 or £500 to leave to their wives and children. When such was the case the property would at once come in for aggregation, and instead of having to pay 30s. if the sum was over £500, the amount chargeable for Estate Duty would be £10.

SIR W. HARCOURT: That is not touched by this Amendment.

MR. BARTLEY thought it was, because, as he read the Amendment, the Estate Duty was not to be payable to the Friendly Society up to £200. When that amount was saved it would not be aggregated, but would be a special fund by itself, and would be exempt from the Estate Duty, therefore these considerations were clearly pertinent to the present new clause. He was very anxious that they should do whatever they could by every possible means to make people provide for themselves. He believed that was the best way of replenishing the Exchequer. It was infinitely wiser to promote habits of thrift than to grab these small sums by way of duty. If they taxed small sums in Friendly Societies although logically it might be right and fair so to tax them, the practical result would be that people would avoid these means of saving, and the indirect harm which would be done in that way would be infinitely greater than any small financial benefit which the Exchequer might receive.

*SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.) desired to say one word in reply to the argument of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the Amendment was inadequate in not protecting other forms of investment. That was a well-founded observation; but the answer was that they could reach larger classes of people through Friendly Societies, whereas they could not practically deal with other forms of investment of a very much more limited character. That principle was enforced by the legislation which had taken place in favour of Friendly Societies, which were exempt from Income Tax and other forms of taxation simply because they could thus deal with whole classes of people and accomplish what they could not in other smaller directions. The hon. and learned Gentleman who moved the clause spoke of the social gain to the State. He did not put it merely on social grounds. He believed that the State gained most materially by the foundation of institutions of this character and the more they could encourage them the more did they contribute to that real material gain which accrued to the State. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said that many forms of small investment were already covered by the Bill, that small businesses below £100 were exempt and there were reductions of duty up to £500. All these cases touched, most rightly, what he should speak of as perhaps the lower middle class, not the working class. In this particular case of the Friendly Societies they were supported chiefly by the artizan and working classes, and under these exemptions they received practically no benefit at all.

SIR W. HARCOURT: They will be all included. The money in the £200 will be included in these exemptions.

SIR A. ROLLIT said, yes; but in dealing with the Friendly Societies they were dealing with much more considerable sums than those of £200, £300, £400, and £500. In Societies of that kind artizans invested small earnings; their all was practically invested in this small form of property, and, inasmuch as they did undoubtedly give advantages to the middle class by the exemptions in the Bill—which he welcomed, and which relieved tradesmen, clerks, and others to a considerable extent—he thought they ought to pursue that saving principle further for the sake of the working classes, who were chiefly interested in the Friendly Societies.

SIR R. TEMPLE (Surrey, Kingston) considered that the mass of property invested in Friendly Societies represented a very important interest, worthy of encouragement by the Legislature, inasmuch as the corporations of which they were made up composed a vast agency for organising thrift. He, therefore, supported the clause.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston) considered this was emphatically a case in which the House might grant this small concession to Friendly Societies, which were productive of such a vast amount of good.

MR. GERALD BALFOUR (Leeds, Central) said, the Chancellor of the Exchequer said that £200 only paid 80s., and the argument of the right hon. Gentleman appeared to be that it was undesirable and unfair that the special class represented by the Friendly Societies should be selected for special benefit. He would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he was not prepared to extend the principle of the Amendment to other forms of thrift as well, because if it was really true that it did not pay at all to collect 30s. from fortunes of £200, what was the use of exacting this tax, which must be in its nature irritating, if it brought in nothing to the Exchequer? He would, therefore, ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he could not extend the principle of the Amendment, inasmuch as it appeared that by doing so the Exchequer would not lose, whilst those to whom the fortunes were left would certainly gain?

The House divided:—Ayes 132; Noes 163.—(Division List, No. 158.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

Objection being taken,

*SIR A. ROLLIT said, that some misapprehension as to the nature of the Bill existed. It merely provided that where there was a change of ownership there need not be a re-examination of the master or mate as pilot. But as the Bill was not an Unopposed Bill, and could not be expected to be taken as such after midnight, he moved that the Order be discharged and the Bill withdrawn.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

*Tuesday, 10th July 1894.*PREVENTION OF CRUELTY TO CHILDREN BILL.—(No 144.)

REPORT.

Amendments reported (according to Order).

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord HERSCHELL): My Lords, I have to move several Amendments to this Bill. They are practically drafting Amendments, and do not make any alteration in the object or scope of the Bill. The great bulk of them consist of Amendments in procedure. As the Bill stands Section 6 of the English Act is to apply to depositions taken under this Act. The English Act does not apply to Ireland, and it therefore became necessary either to have a further reference to make the English Act apply to Ireland, or to state its terms so far as regarded the provisions of this Act, which would be an awkward and clumsy procedure, or to set out the provisions in the English Act in this Act, in which case they would become applicable both to England and Ireland. Though it makes the Bill a little longer it seems to be the more satisfactory course to introduce these Amendments, and therefore I move that they be agreed to.

Amendments moved, in Clause 7, page 4, at end of the Clause insert—

“(3.) Boards of Guardians, and, in Scotland, Parochial Boards, shall provide for the reception of children brought to a workhouse in pursuance of the principal Act or this Act.”

Clause 14, page 7, make sub-section (1) a separate section with marginal note (“Power to take statement of child in writing”).

Line 25, after (“child”) leave out all to the end of line 27 and insert (“on oath and shall thereupon subscribe the same and add thereto a note of his reason for taking the same and of the day when and place where the same was taken, and of the names of the persons (if any) present at the taking thereof”).

“(2.) The Justice taking any such statement shall transmit the same with his note—

“(a) if the statement relates to an offence for which any accused person is already committed for trial, to the proper officer of the Court for trial at which the accused person has been committed; and

“(b) in any other case to the clerk of the peace of the county or borough in which the statement has been taken; and the clerk of the peace to whom any such statement is transmitted shall preserve, file, and record the same”).

Make sub-section (2) a separate section with marginal note (“Admission of deposition or statement of child in evidence”).

Clause 14, page 7, line 34, after (“1848”) insert (“or the Indictable Offences (Ireland) Act, 1849, or the Petty Sessions (Ireland) Act, 1851, or this Act”).

Line 34, after (“taken”) leave out all to the end of line 41 and insert (“by a Justice under this Act shall be admissible in evidence either for or against the accused person without further proof thereof—

“(a) if it purports to be signed by the Justice by or before whom it purports to be taken; and

“(b) if, in the case of any such deposition, it is proved that the same was taken in the presence of the person accused, and that he, her, or his counsel or attorney had a full opportunity of cross-examining the child; and

“(c) if in the case of any such statement it is proved that reasonable notice of the intention to take the statement has been served upon the person against whom it is proposed to use the same as evidence (whether the prosecutor or the accused), and that that person or his counsel or attorney had or might have had, if he had chosen to be present, an opportunity of cross-examining the child making the statement”).

Page 8, line 1, make sub-section (3) a separate clause with marginal note (“Power to proceed with case in absence of child”).

Line 4, leave out (“crime”) and insert (“offence”).

Clause 17, page 8, line 30, after (“health”) insert (“in the principal Act”).

Leave out from (“kind”) in line 35 to the end of line 38, and insert (“and in the definition of place of safety in Section 17 of the principal Act the words ‘by bye-law’ shall be repealed”).

Clause 18, page 8, line 28, leave out (“the Local Government Board for Ireland shall be substituted for the Local Government Board”).

Leave out all after (“State”) in line 29 to the end of the Clause.

Clause 19, page 9, leave out all after (“Scotland”) in line 33 to the end of line 34.

Clause 20, page 9, line 42, insert as new sub-section (2):

ADVERTISING POST OFFICE SAVINGS BANKS.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY asked the Lord President if he would provide that the inducements and facilities for thrift offered by the Post Office Savings Banks be advertised in the railway stations in language more easily understood than the language of the Postal Guide and advertisements exhibited in the post offices? He said, though he had withdrawn the Notice on the Paper, he desired to explain why he had placed it there. On the 14th June a letter appeared in The Standard newspaper from the manager of a voluntary school, headed "Mr. Acland Again," and referring to children's deposits in Savings Banks. Following it was an editorial note that what had been done was in contravention of the Post Office Rules. The next day another letter appeared in the same newspaper saying that the statement only applied to school banks, and he found that in fact Mr. Acland had nothing to do with the matter. These questions had been going on since 1877, but their place in the papers sent out had been changed, and this school manager thought they were new questions. From the information supplied to him he had what was really a good case against the Education Department, but he had reason to believe that one of Mr. Acland's colleagues in the Cabinet intervened and two years' grace had been granted by the Education Office. Still, any day he might have another case to bring forward, and should it be so he must entreat the Lord President to derogate in his favour from the customary delegation of his duties to the noble Lord in Waiting. However good a complaint might be, all the life was taken out of it by its delegation to some one who was not responsible, and only stated what he was informed had been done. When that was the case the only resource was to fall back on the time-honoured maxim to "abuse the plaintiff's attorney"—

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY AND LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (The Earl of ROSEBURY): I rise to Order. The Notice on the Paper is something with reference to Post Office Savings Banks.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, he was coming to it. He must appeal to the noble Earl not to leave these matters to persons who knew nothing about the subject. A devolution of duty should be accompanied by a devolution of salary. He had asked the noble Lord (Lord Playfair) if he would be content with the winnings of Ladas, and he said he would; that was before last Friday. He was now coming to the question.

THE EARL OF ROSEBURY: Hear, hear!

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, as the thunderstorm had now cleared the air, he hoped the noble Earl would be satisfied with the running of Ladas as before. No doubt the Post Office Authorities had much improved their procedure, and had made their advertisements plainer, and their business had increased. Forms in larger print were hung up in the post offices, but they were not sufficient. The public Press had long complained that it was impossible to make out the Postal Guide, and he hoped Her Majesty's Government would induce the Post Office Authorities to advertise more efficiently in railway waiting-rooms, especially the third class. What could any of their Lordships make of this announcement—

"Life assurances from £5 to £100 can be granted to persons between 14 and 65 years of age. Children between eight and 14 years of age can be insured for £5."

Some of their Lordships were good mathematicians and arithmeticians, but none of them would be able to find any co-relation between those figures. It would be much better to follow the Belgian plan, and put up prominent placards stating that upon payment of certain sums from certain ages an old-age pension would be secured at 60 or 65. Not only so, but these advertisements should be in popular language, as—"If you have a legacy left you, why waste it by going on the spree? Invest it in obtaining a cottage rent free for the rest of your life." He had corresponded on the subject with Sir Reginald Welby, who agreed with him that more advertisement was wanted, but made the usual Treasury excuse that he "did not know where the money was to come from." He might read several more Post Office advertisements equally difficult to understand, but he had called attention to one of the worst. The Postal Guide was not quite so unintelligible as it had been. Other improvements were that £50 instead of £30 might now be paid into the Savings Bank; and £100 in Stocks, though when that change was announced in the House it was impossible to understand it, and he had only discovered the working of it upon investing money for a person unable to do so for himself. The Postal Guide was not easy for anyone to understand.

THE EARL OF ROSEBURY: My Lords, it is really a little difficult for me to deal with the vast variety of topics over which the noble Lord has ranged. From my salary as President of the Council he passed to other topics even more dubious in their nature until he at last lauded at the grammar of the Post Office Authorities. I rather agree with him that the present Rules are not easy to understand, and I will call the attention of the Post Office Authorities to the matter. I am, however, authorised by them to say that they will gladly listen to any practical suggestion from the noble Lord for making their language more generally comprehensible to the general public. For myself, except in the instance quoted by the noble Lord, I do not find any difficulty in following that language, and therefore I have some difficulty in agreeing with his general conclusion. With regard to the advertisements, the Post Office Authorities say that the Railway Companies will not advertise for nothing, and that they have no funds applicable to a large and general system of advertising, but that they believe their advertisements are as wide as they could wish them to be without recourse to a method of advertising which I believe would more than tax their finances. With regard to the noble Lord's complaint that I do not answer all his questions, but that the replies are usually delegated by Government to the noble Lord who answers for the Department concerned, I have nothing more to say than that I pursue the usual course adopted on such occasions, and that if the official representative of the Department in this House does not answer the noble Lord's questions to his satisfaction, I shall be happy, as a second jine, to come to his assistance.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 10th July 1894.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

THAMES CONSERVANCY BILL.
CONSIDERATION.

Order read for resuming Adjourned
Debate on Amendment proposed [28th June] to Question, "That the Bill be now considered."

And which Amendment was, to leave out the words "now considered," in order to add the words "re-committed to the former Committee." — (*Mr. J.
Stuart.*)

Question again proposed, "That the words 'now considered' stand part of the Question."

Debate resumed.

MR. J. STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton) said, that since the Debate of 28th June an endeavour had been made to bring about a friendly arrangement between the promoters of the Bill and the representatives of the London County Council with a view to coming, if possible, to a reasonable settlement under existing circumstances. Therefore, he should ask the leave of the House to withdraw his Amendment for the re-commitment of the Bill. That being done, he proposed subsequently to move certain Amendments which had been agreed upon, the net effect of which would be that the number of representatives of the Corporation and of the County Council on the Conservancy Board should each be increased by two.

Question put, and agreed to.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill considered.

Amendment proposed, in Clause 5, page 9, line 5, to leave out "thirty-three," and insert "thirty-seven." — (*Mr. J.
Stuart.*)

Question proposed, "That 'thirty-three' stand part of the Clause."

SIR F. DIXON-HARTLAND
(Middlesex, Uxbridge) said, with regard to the remarks of the hon. Member for Hoxton, he might say that this arrangement was understood to be a reasonable and final settlement of the question under present circumstances.

MR. STUART : Final ?

MR. BENN (Tower Hamlets, St.
George's) : Final under present circumstances.

SIR F. DIXON-HARTLAND said, he would put it that the settlement was a final one upon all points under existing circumstances.

*SIR C. DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean) said, that if it was supposed that this settlement was a final one he must point out that whatever agreement might be made between the Conservators and the London County Council there were Members in the House who, like himself, could not be bound by their arrangement and accept the present compromise as a final settlement. If, for instance, the Conservators should ask for fresh financial powers, it would be necessary then that they should re-open the whole question.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. BRYCE, Aberdeen, S.) said, he thought it might save time with regard to this matter—which had been brought very constantly under the consideration of the Board of Trade—if he stated what were his views upon it. He was very glad that the promoters of the Bill had assented in a fair and reasonable spirit to the compromise suggested. He gathered from the hon. Member for Shoreditch, on the part of the County Council, that if the four additional members were placed on the Board he would withdraw further opposition to the Bill here, and would take no steps to have it opposed in the House of Lords. He thought that, upon the whole, this was a perfectly fair compromise, and one that the House might accept with satisfaction.
Of course, it was impossible to say what might emerge in the future. It was quite possible that the financial question might emerge again, or that the shipowners' case might assume a new aspect, and he did not understand that anything more was meant by "final settlement" than this: that the matter was to be deemed as settled, circumstances being what they were. He would like to offer his tribute to the great care and pains which the Committee had taken with the Bill and the services rendered to the cause of pacification by the Chairman and the right hon. Member for Leeds and his hon. Friend who sat behind him.

*SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.) said, he should like to mention that while the shipowners were heartily glad that there had been a compromise, and would now endeavour to forward the Bill by every means in their power, they entirely demurred to the word "final" as applied to the settlement which had been arrived at. The question of the administration of and improved access to the Port of London was a matter of such vital consequence that should new circumstances arise, and especially should any claim for pecuniary powers be brought forward, the question must be re-discussed, and, in any case, there ought to be inquiry by a Royal Commission or Committee, and that without delay.

SIR T. SUTHERLAND (Greenock) said, he might inform the House that he intended to raise the whole question of the administration of the Port of London by objecting to the suspension of the Standing Orders, and so preventing the Bill from being read a third time until he had ventilated this issue. In the compromise which had been arrived at between the Thames Conservancy Board and the London County Council he had no share or part. He represented in the House large and important interests concerned in the administration of the Port of London, and in order that their views might be laid before the House he should object to the suspension of the Standing Orders, which would enable the Bill to be now read a third time.

*MR. JACKSON (Leeds, N.) said that, as Chairman of the Committee, perhaps he might be allowed to say a few words. He regretted that the right hon. Baronet opposite (Sir T. Sutherland) had thought it necessary to issue a note of warning that he did not adopt the settlement which had been arrived at. He could not pretend to say that the settlement was not one which would not commend itself to his mind on its merits. He certainly understood, and he thought the members of the Committee understood, that the representatives of the London County Council did accept this settlement, and he believed his opinion would be shared by Members of the House who were also representatives of the London County Council. He would like to say a word respecting the comments made by the President of the Board of Trade with reference to the labours of the Committee which investigated this question. No one could deny that the Committee had attended to the details placed before them with the greatest assiduity. They commenced their labours on the 23rd of April and finished them on the 13th of June. If he might so far presume, he should like to say that no Chairman ever had upon his Committee Members who gave more undivided attention to the circumstances as they were placed before them. When he said that the Committee were unanimous, that there never was a division of opinion, he thought it was strong testimony that they had endeavoured as far as they could to understand the case presented to them, and to decide it upon its merits. He should be extremely sorry—indeed, he would not anticipate otherwise—if the County Council should do otherwise than accept the compromise as a final settlement under what the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade described as "the circumstances of the case." Of course, they could not bind their successors, but as to the thoroughness of the inquiry which had been made there could be no doubt. All the parties were most ably represented, and every point was fought most tenaciously. As matters had turned out, the compromise appeared to him to be the best course to adopt, and he repeated that he hoped the County Council would accept it.

SIR G. RUSSELL (Berks, Wokingham) said, that during the many years he had sat in the House he had always supported the judicial decisions of Committees of the House. He had resolutely set his face against the system of private canvass, against bringing private interests to bear to upset judicial decisions; but when that influence was gradually coming to be exercised by powerful bodies like the London County Council, who not only brought private influence but pressure to bear on those who had to rely on their support possibly for continuance in power, then the danger had assumed the gravest proportions. Like the Chairman, he also reluctantly acquiesced in this arrangement. He felt he was submitting, not to a judicial tribunal exercising its judicial office, but to a tour de force. He could not but express his opinion that this practice was tending to bring Committees, and even the House itself, into discredit.

MR. MOULTON (Hackney, S.) justified the action of the London County Council. The speech of the hon. Baronet who had just sat down would, he said, have been more appropriate as a first edition in 1890, when a very strong Committee gave five representatives to the County Council, and a vote of the House struck them out amid the silence of the hon. Baronet, who now, when it was the other way, felt his conscience deeply touched. He did not wish to embitter the discussion, but he must say that the action of the County Council had been from the first perfectly consistent.

MR. W. LONG (Liverpool, West Derby) said, he could not congratulate the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Fletcher Moulton) upon the tone which he had adopted after having expressed his intention of saying no word that would embitter the discussion. The hon. and learned Gentleman might have done worse than to have left the hon. Baronet behind him alone. He might say that he and his friends were no more satisfied than was the London County Council with the exact arrangement made by the Committee, but they were prepared to accept it as the result of the decision of a Committee which had had all the evidence placed before it. They had been invited to examine some of the points of view from which the London County Council approached this matter. Well, they were not going to do anything of the kind. They did not acquiesce in this arrangement, but they were not anxious to put the House to inconvenience and trouble, nor did they think that they would be justified in opposing the terms of the compromise which had been arrived at. All the points in dispute were reviewed by the Committee. The London County Council put in their claims, and claims were put in by the other parties interested. Evidence was heard, and the Committee, having heard all that was to be said, arranged the representation upon what they conceived to be an equitable basis. He would like to add that he cordially and entirely agreed with the wise words of the hon. Baronet behind him (Sir G. Russell), because he was certain that if the House, under the pressure of combinations, upset time after time the decisions of Committees upstairs, judicially and equitably given, the House would have more cause to regret it than the parties interested, seeing how unbusiness-like and impolitic a character was given to proceedings in respect of which a decision was arrived at upon ex parte statements instead of upon sworn evidence such as was given upstairs.

MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.) said, he thought the worst enemies of Committees upstairs were those who wished to make fetishes of them. In 1890 representatives from the whole of the districts concerned in this Bill, irrespective of politics, came to Westminster and begged the House to reject the conclusion at which the Committee of that year arrived, and the House did so. From the point of view of those who opposed the settlement arrived at in this Bill this demonstrated that it was wise for the House to keep the power of determining the shape which Private Bills should assume in its own hands. Since 1890 there had been another Bill on which the House differed from the Committee in its conclusion and also from the promoters of the Bill in their original clause. He did not, however, contend for a moment that all the decisions of Committees should be challenged. It had been said that the settlement now arrived at was a final settlement. He did not consider that this Bill adequately dealt with the whole question of the Thames Conservancy either with regard to the upper or the lower part of the river. He thought it would be necessary to have a body who would deal with the conservancy of the port and harbour, and another body who would deal with the conservancy of the upper portion of the river. Under these circumstances, while he accepted the compromise he wanted it to be distinctly understood that

Sir G. Russell

Estate Duty, the Probate Duty, or from the graduation that was to be carried out. They had been given large figures, but not any details. They were not told how much the Chancellor of the Exchequer expected this year and how much next. What he continually said was, "You must grant me this money or I shall not be able to pay my way," but he did not say how much he would require next year, so that all his appeals lost their effect. The right hon. Gentleman might fairly appeal to those of them who had held responsible positions, and might say, "You will make me insolvent unless you grant me this duty." But he did not say that. This statement was repeated until it began to lose its effect. This was not one of the questions which affected the millionaire; it was one of the questions which affected the smaller and the professional man. Hon. Gentlemen opposite were always taxing the Opposition with their partiality for the landed interest. They could not do so, however, on the present occasion, when his hon. Friends and himself were supporting the cause of the widows of the professional men. They had here a case which would appeal to the general sense of the House. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said that the adoption of the Amendment would cause an enormous loss to the Revenue; but he had given them no idea of the sum to which the loss would amount. Would it be a matter of £200,000 or £250,000? They were entirely in the dark, and had been in the dark during the whole of these Debates. Supposing there was a slight loss this year, how far would that loss extend in future years? Let them remember that they were not legislating, unfortunately, for the present year; they were changing the Death Duties for a whole series of years, and they should, therefore, consider whether what they were sanctioning now would be right and equitable in future years. As one who had been responsible for the expenditure of the country in times past he did not think too much weight ought to be attached to the right hon. Gentleman's argument that if this particular Amendment was passed a deficit would result. They must get over that as best they could, but in order to be able to square the expenditure of this year they must not pass any legislation which would be undesirable and inexpedient in future years. The argument of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the proposal which had been made would affect the finances of this year was, to his mind, not sufficient to meet the arguments which had been urged from his side of the House.

SIR J. LUBBOCK said, he could not remember during the whole course of his experience in this House a Bill which had been so little listened to by its supporters, or one in support of which so few arguments had been adduced. Here they had had a most important argument brought forward upon an Amendment which went to the root of our social life and affected entirely new principles in our social legislation, and yet there was not a single supporter of the Government who said a word. They all knew, however, that if they went to a Division those gentlemen would all vote as one man against the Amendment. He had observed upon all the Amendments they had brought forward when the Chancellor of the Exchequer had nothing whatever to say against them he fell back upon the statement that they were opposed to the principles of the Bill. Of course they were, but the question was whether they were opposed to justice and right. The right hon. Gentleman said that the Bill did not take money from the widow but from the estate. What consolation was that to the widow? Could anybody get up and explain how it was they were not taking this amount from the widow? It was ridiculous to say so. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said it had nothing to do with the benefit to the heir. That was a fallacy—he might say it was a mockery to make a statement of that kind. They were dealing with the heir, and could not help doing so, whatever was said to the contrary. It was not a question of benefit of the heir but of injury to the widow. If one took it from the estate one took it from the widow. That was proved by the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that this Amendment would affect the Revenue to the extent of hundreds of thousands of pounds. The statement was very surprising, but if the proposals in the Bill were unjust that only showed how great the injustice was. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had told them over and over again that he had got to find the money.

of the Government was not the funds, but to find them. Now did the Chancellor of the Exchequer treat the cases of husband and wife as two persons, when he could get more out of them the other way he said they were one. The right hon. Gentleman ought to make up his mind on the subject, as both positions could not be right. The proposal to treat widows like other legatees was opposed to our previous legislation, and, indeed, to that of almost all other countries. He supposed the supporters of the Government would all vote against the clause, however, because he had noticed that throughout the whole discussion on the Bill they had never troubled themselves to listen to any of the arguments that had been urged in the cause of justice from the other side of the House. In fact, in his experience no important Bill had ever been brought in by any Government which they seemed so unable or so unwilling to support by any kind of argument at all. In this case undoubtedly a great injustice would be done to widows. There was one remark which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had made, however, which he fully agreed with—it was that the Bill had been framed regardless of the interests of the individual. [Cries of "Oh!"]

SIR W. HARCOURT: I never made any such statement. [Opposition cries of "Oh, oh!" and "Question!"] I remember the time when a gentleman who rose in this House of Commons to correct a misstatement was always listened to in silence and his correction accepted. I am sorry that a new practice seems to have arisen. What I said was that this Estate Duty was founded upon the same principle as the Probate Duty, which paid no regard to the person who inherited, but only took cognisance of the estate out of which the duty was to be paid. That is a very different thing to saying that this Bill is framed regardless of the interests of the individual.

SIR J. LUBBOCK said, that had he not been interrupted he had intended to say that such a statement was no argument against the present Amendment. He understood the right hon. Gentleman to have used the words he had quoted, but of course if his right hon. Friend said that he had misunderstood him he did not wish to press the point any further.

MR. BYLES (York, W.R., Shipley) said, the reason why those on his side of the House had not considered it their duty to enter more fully into the discussion on this Bill was because the matter had been abundantly explained by the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the law officers. The reason why he liked the Budget and did not think widows would be treated unjustly was because it was proposed to defer the taxation of the property until it fell in, and then, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer had explained, it would bear the share of taxation which was due from the estate. It had been pointed out again and again that it was not the successor who paid the Estate Duty. He succeeded to whatever property the deceased left after his debts had been paid by his executors to the State as well as to private individuals. Nearly all the Amendments they had been discussing ad nauseam were Amendments the principle of which had been determined in previous Debates. He protested against the suggestion that the supporters of the Government were afraid to defend the Bill, and that they were merely mechanical voters because they refused to provide fresh fuel with which the Opposition could keep up this perpetual obstruction. If the principles contained in the Bill had not been abundantly debated then he would ask what hope was there for any Government ever getting any legislation passed. He submitted that, considering the business before the country, the House could not afford more time for the discussion of principles of this Bill, and it was only with the view of saving time—which was not observed by hon. Members opposite—that he and his friends had abstained from further wearying the House.

Question put.

*MR. BUTCHER (York) moved the following clause :—

"(1) Estate Duty shall not be payable on the death of the deceased in respect of any capital sum not exceeding two hundred pounds, or any annuity the principal value of which does not exceed two hundred pounds provided by the

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT : Can the hon. Gentleman state whether it is a fact that these supplies of money and goods are commandeered under no regular assessment, but that the Field Cornet forms an arbitrary list?

SIR G. BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale): Can he also state whether British subjects are alone called upon for money and goods; whether a distinction is not drawn between British subjects and citizens of the South African Republic?

MR. S. BUXTON : I cannot say how the requisition is made, but there is no distinction between British subjects and others as regards the law.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT : But it is an arbitrary list entirely at the mercy of the Field Cornet.

THE NAVAL MANŒUVRES.

MR. GOURLEY (Sunderland): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether H.R.H. the Commander-in-Chief intends arranging (at given strategical points) for the movement and concentration of troops of all arms to co-operate with the Navy in the forthcoming Naval Manœuvres; if not, will he be good enough to assign reasons, seeing that this would be necessary in the event of threatened invasion?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Stirling, &c.): The suggested combination is not contemplated. The tactics of the Army and Navy are too distinct to admit of co-operation, except in a particular case, such as a definite invasion, when the forces of both arms would necessarily be ordered with reference to some special spot on the coast line.

SLAVE RAIDING IN NYASSALAND.

MR. J. A. PEASE (Northumberland, Tyneside): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether any arrangement has been made with Jumbé, a native chief in British Nyassaland, by which he undertakes to abolish slave raiding or slave trading in his territory, and whether he is now receiving, directly or indirectly, any subsidy; whether Her Majesty's Government have any information as to the way in which the arrangement is now being carried out; and whether slaves are being constantly raided and despatched under the British flag by Jumbé through Portuguese territory to the East Coast of Africa?

SIR E. GREY : A Treaty was made with Jumbé in 1889, under which he engaged to follow in all matters the advice of Her Majesty's Representatives. He receives a subsidy from the Administration of £200 a year, in return for which he cedes his Customs Dues. Mr. Johnston, up to the time of his leaving Nyassaland, spoke in the warmest terms of Jumbé's services, and expressed his conviction that ever since concluding the Treaty he had honestly tried to put down the Slave Trade, no slaves having ever been found in his dhows by Her Majesty's gunboats. The Acting Commissioner has, however, recently heard reports of slave raiding by Jumbé's people. He is investigating them, and giving the chief a warning.

FEEES TO CROWN COUNSEL.

MR. POWELL WILLIAMS (Birmingham, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he will agree to the Motion as to the fees paid to counsel employed on behalf of the Crown which stands on this day's Paper?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. T. HIBBERT, Oldham): I should be much obliged if my hon. Friend would put down his Motion for this Return for Tuesday next, as there has not been time to collect the views of the various Departments as to whether the Return can be given.

LEITRIM AND THE IRISH REPRODUCTIVE LOAN FUND.

MR. TULLY (Leitrim, S.): I desire to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Leitrim is one of the counties specially entitled to the benefits of expenditure from the Irish Reproductive Loan Fund amounting to £66,000, and the Sea Coast and Fisheries Fund of £18,000, at present under the control of the Congested Districts Board; whether he is aware that there are in Leitrim 38 congested electoral divisions, with an area of 174,000 acres, and a population of 35,250; whether he can state what steps have been taken in the congested districts of Kiltubrid, Drumreilly, and Mohill, in South Leitrim, to expend the portion of these funds to which this county is entitled ; and whether, in view of the numerous evictions which have taken place there, and the serious tax imposed by the construction of a light railway under the Tramways Act, passed by a former Liberal Government, he can state if the Congested Districts Board are prepared at present to make any expenditure in these districts to start relief works, encourage forestry and shelter plantations, and promote local industries, and thus give employment to the impoverished people ?

MR. J. MORLEY : The amounts of the two funds referred to in the first paragraph are correctly stated, as are also the other statistics relating to congested districts in the County Leitrim. With regard to the third paragraph, I would observe that no portion of these funds is allocated for the purpose of benefitting particular congested districts. The funds are applicable to congested districts generally, and it is open to residents in such districts to make application for loans out of the two funds. No applications, however, have been received by the Congested Districts Board from the congested divisions of County Leitrim. The Board are prepared to consider any application or suggestion that may be made to them for the permanent improvement of the district referred to, but it would be contrary to the opinion entertained by the Board as to their functions to undertake relief works merely for the alleviation of temporary distress.

ELECTIONS UNDER THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT ACT, 1894.

MR. STRACHEY (Somerset, S.) : I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board when the Rules and Regulations for elections under the Local Government Act, 1894, will be issued ; and if he is aware that until these Regulations are issued it is difficult, if not impossible, for County Councils to draw up a scale of costs for these local elections as directed by the Act ?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE, Bradford, Central) : The Regulations are now in course of preparation, and will be issued in ample time for consideration by County Councils, with a view to their fixing a scale of costs.

Mr. Tully

COREA.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, when the British Government abandoned their naval station at Port Hamilton, the Russian Government undertook not to occupy any port on the Japanese Sea ?

SIR E. GREY : Full particulars with regard to the withdrawal from Port Hamilton will be found in the Parliamentary Paper, China No. 1, 1887. It will be seen from this correspondence that in the event of the English occupation of Port Hamilton ceasing Russia undertook not to take Korean territory under any circumstances.

SWAZILAND.

SIR G. BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he can now state that a new Convention in respect of Swaziland has been concluded with the Government of the South African Republic ; whether that Convention is practically on the same lines as the Convention which expired in 1893 ; and what is the period of years for which the new Convention is to last ?

MR. S. BUXTON : The existing Convention, that of 1893, has been extended for six months, but may be terminated earlier if the Swazis agree to the Organic Proclamation.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS CONSOLIDATION BILL.

SIR G. BADEN-POWELL : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he can state what progress has been made with the Merchant Shipping Acts (Consolidation) Bill, referred to a Joint Committee ; whether he is aware that many important Amendments are being asked for in the Merchant Shipping Acts as they exist ; and whether he will take steps to secure that the necessary amending legislation is considered in Parliament, with a view to its being eventually embodied in a complete Merchant Shipping Acts (Consolidation) Bill.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (MR. BRYCE, Aberdeen, S.) : Very satisfactory progress has been made with the Merchant Shipping (Consolidation) Bill, and only a few points remain to be discussed by the Joint Committee. The Bill is purely a consolidation measure, and no amendment of the law can be undertaken in connection with it. The desirability of amending the Merchant Shipping Acts in various particulars has been for some time under the consideration of the Board of Trade and will continue to engage their most earnest attention, but at present I am not able to make any statement with reference thereto.

SCHEME FOR MITIGATING CRIMPING.

SIR G. BADEN-POWELL: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether, with a view to mitigating crimping and other evils incident to the discharge of British seamen in foreign ports, the scheme recommended by the Departmental Committee in 1893 is now to be put to the test in the Port of Dunkerque; and, if so, what is the period for which it will be continued; and will Her Majesty's Consul be specially instructed to watch the experiment and report thereon?

MR. BRYCE: Yes, Sir; arrangements have been made to put in force at Dunkerque the scheme to which the hon. Member refers, as an experiment, for 12 months. At the end of that period I hope it may be found possible to continue and possibly to extend the scheme, and Her Majesty's Consul will certainly be asked to watch and to report upon the experiment.

THE CASE OF THE "HELVETIA."

MR. MACDONA (Southwark, Rotherhithe): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that on Saturday last, 7th instant, Mr. T. W. Lewis, Stipendiary Magistrate, gave Judgment in the Town Hall at Cardiff upon the abandonment of the Helvetia, in which he strongly animadverted upon the conduct of the captain in prematurely abandoning his ship, and sentenced him to two years' suspension of his certificate, and at the same time severely censured Mr. Varley, the owner of the ship, which he stated was an old ship, 29 years old, purchased for £5,000 after being laid up for 12 months; and that he immediately insured her for a sum much in excess of her cost and value; whether he is aware that, without subsequent examination, survey, or repair the owner caused her to be immediately sent to sea; that within five days she had drifted to a position of great danger on the coast of Cornwall; that although she signalled for tugs, and the fact was telegraphed and re-telegraphed to Mr. Varley's agents and to Mr. Varley, no notice whatever of these telegrams was taken; and that, after 12 hours, she was ultimately picked up by tugs and towed into Cardiff with 15 feet of water in her hold, when she was surveyed, in the opinion of the Court, in a very superficial manner, and inefficiently repaired; whether he is aware that increased insurances were again then effected on her, one being effected at a high rate of premium by Mr. Varley's instructions; that she then put to sea again, in an unseaworthy state, and within three days was abandoned under suspicious circumstances, and is supposed to have ultimately foundered; and whether the Board of Trade propose to take further proceedings in this case, and adopt such further measures as will conduce to the greater safety of our sailors' lives whilst at sea?

MR. BRYCE: Yes, Sir; my attention has been called to the circumstances of the case of the Helvetia. The statements in the question convey the substance of the decision and observations of the Stipendiary Magistrate, although as yet I have only a newspaper report. The attention of the Board of Trade is being given to the case, which has been referred to Counsel for their opinion. The Board will carefully consider what, if any, further proceedings should be taken in the matter.

THE LIMERICK ASSIZES.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the proceedings at the Limerick Assizes last week; whether he is aware that Mr. Justice Holmes, after trying three cases in all of which the jurors acquitted the prisoners, advised the Crown Prosecutor not to proceed further with criminal trials at these Assizes, and stated that clearer cases were never brought into any Court than those upon which acquittals had taken place; and whether, in view of the fact that the Representative of the Crown, acting with the approval of Mr.

Justice Holmes, entered a nolle prosequi in the remaining untried cases, he intends to take any action on the statement of the Judge that, in his opinion, it would be a great deal better that no prosecutions should take place in Limerick than that there should be prosecutions ending in a failure of justice such as had occurred.

MR. J. MORLEY : Paragraphs 1 and 2 state the facts with substantial accuracy. The cases in which the three acquittals took place were—(a) one in which a man was charged with stealing feathers ; (b) a case in which an old man retaliated on boys, who threw stones at him, by throwing one which rebounded off a window and struck a little girl ; (c) and a threatening letter case. The threatening letter was alleged to have been written by one blacksmith to another on account of the occupation of a forge and three acres of land. Paragraph 3 : Entering nolle prosequis in the remaining cases in which the Attorney General had directed prosecutions and in which the Grand Jury found bills was a step taken by the prosecuting counsel without authority. The Irish Executive can neither sanction nor act on the course pursued at Limerick.

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.) : I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman if it is the fact that the Judge stated that these cases were of an unimportant character, and also if he stated that the county was in a fairly satisfactory state, and whether it is correct to say of the Assizes generally that the Judges have found that the Police Reports as well as the Calendars present satisfactory evidence as to the state of crime in Ireland, and that no Judge, except Mr. Justice Holmes, has found fault with the action of any Jury ?

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) : Before that question is answered will the right hon. Gentleman permit me to ask, is Mr. Justice Holmes correctly reported when he is reported as saying, "that he would say, and say deliberately, that it would be a great deal better that no prosecutions should take place in Limerick than that there should be prosecutions ending in a failure of justice such as had occurred there that day" ?

MR. J. MORLEY : Mr. Justice Holmes is reported, and I presume correctly, to have used that language.

Mr. T. W. Russell

In answer to my hon. Friend, it is quite true that the Judges generally, without exception in fact, have described the condition of affairs on the circuits they have to go as satisfactory. I suppose the hon. Member for South Tyrone, by quoting from Mr. Justice Holmes, implies that we ought to resort to some other method of procedure. If the hon. Member is prepared to go to Parliament, to the House of Commons, and ask it to censure us for not proclaiming County Limerick because in three extremely trivial cases there has been a failure of justice, I have only to say he is quite welcome to ask the House of Commons to do it.

ACCIDENTS AT UFFINGTON STATION.

MR. WROUGHTON (Berks, Abingdon) : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether, having regard to the evidence and verdict given at the inquest on Gerald Richings, who was recently killed at the Uffington Station of the Great Western Railway, and also to the long series of disasters at this station, he will direct a public local inquiry to be held by the Railway Department of the Board of Trade ?

MR. BRYCE : A Memorial on this subject has recently been presented to me. An Inspecting Officer of the Board of Trade will be instructed to visit the locality and report. Before doing so he will communicate with the Memorialists and the Railway Company.

REVISION SESSIONS IN COUNTY CAVAN.

MR. YOUNG (Cavan, E.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that the Parliamentary voters in the districts of Ballyjamesduff, Killanaleck, Virginia, Monaghan, and Stradone, in the County of Cavan, are obliged at great inconvenience to attend Revision Sessions at Bailieborough, a distance of about 30 miles from their homes ; and whether, for the convenience of these districts, it would be possible to establish a Revision Court at Ballyjamesduff in the centre of these districts, in which at present the voters are so much inconvenienced ?

MR. J. MORLEY : The Lists of Parliamentary voters for the first three polling districts named are revised at Bailieborough, and the greatest distance from Bailieborough to any part of these three districts is about 15 miles. The Lists for the two other districts named are not revised at Bailieborough. A Revision Court was held at Ballyjamesduff in 1885 and 1886, but was then discontinued on the representation of the County Court Judge. If considered desirable this Court could be re-established, but it would not be practicable to attach to it the district of Mountngent, which lies in another constituency.

TELEGRAPHIC COMMUNICATION BETWEEN CANADA AND AUSTRALASIA.

SIR G. BADEN-POWELL: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether he can state that any, and if so what, action has been taken in regard to a thorough survey, in consequence of the resolution assented to by the Colonial Conference on 6th May, 1887, that the connection of Canada with Australasia, by direct submarine telegraph across the Pacific, is a project of high importance to the Empire, and every doubt as to its practicability should without delay be set at rest by a thorough and exhaustive survey; and whether he can state whether any, and if so what, surveys of the bed of the Pacific Ocean have been made by any of Her Majesty's ships since those recorded by H.M.S. Challenger, of a character that would be directly of service in determining the question of a trans-Pacific cable?

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH, Lancashire, Clitheroe): Soundings were taken by H.M.S. Egeria during a period of about 2½ years from 1888 to 1890 between the North Cape of New Zealand and the Phoenix Islands, about 200 miles south of the Equator; and the positions of several islands on that line were fixed, and some were surveyed with a view to determining their suitability for cable stations. This was done in the ordinary course of Hydrographic Survey, in accordance with communications from the Admiralty to the Colonial Office. The distance between the extreme points of the area examined is over 2,000 miles.

IRISH LAND NEAR THE SHANNON.

MR. TULLY (Leitrim, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he is prepared to state the date on which the Irish Board of Works let to Mr. John Clyne the portion of land situated at Jamestown, near the Shannon, and which is vested in them; what were the terms on which the letting was made and the amount of rent since received from Mr. Clyne; and whether he is prepared to recommend that the Board of Works furnish an explanation of the grounds on which they rejected the application of Mr. Thomas Butler for this land?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (SIR J. T. HIBBERT, Oldham): The date from which it is proposed that the yearly letting shall run is the 1st May, 1894. The terms are (1) a rent of 30s. per annum over and above all rates and taxes; (2) premises and fences to be kept in good order and repair; (3) right of way to the sluices for the sluicekeeper and for carts to be given; (4) land not to be sublet. No rent has yet been received, as it is not due till 1895. With regard to the comparative eligibility of the two persons as tenants, I could not properly add to what I stated on the 10th May last.

FEVER AT MALTA.

SIR SEYMOUR KING (Hull, Central): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been called to the fact that fever has been of a fatal character lately prevalent in Malta, and that both the Naval and the Military Forces have suffered losses in consequence; and whether he will order an investigation into the sanitary condition of the huts which were sent out for use in the Crimea, and, though long ago condemned, are still used as quarters, and also into the condition of the sub-soil of the ground on which they are placed?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: There were in the two past winters outbreaks of enteric fever at Malta, which caused together 92 admissions to hospital and 25 deaths. Inquiry into the cause led to the conclusion that drinking tank water was probably the origin of the evil. Aqueduct water was substituted for drinking purposes with good results. As to simple continued fever the cases have been below the average number. Inquiries have been made as to the huts in use by the troops; but according to the last Sanitary Report, their condition was satisfactory. There are no Crimean huts at Malta.

EUROPEAN RAILWAY STAFF IN INDIA.

SIR SEYMOUR KING : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India why the benefit of the exchange compensation allowance is denied to the European railway staff in India ?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. H. H. FOWLER, Wolverhampton, E.): The extension of the benefit of the exchange compensation allowance to employés of the Guaranteed Railway Companies was sanctioned by the Secretary of State in Council in April last, and I understand that the Government of India have taken the necessary steps for giving effect to this sanction.

THE COLONIES AND THE NEW ESTATE DUTIES.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, since the introduction into the Finance Bill of the new clause, proposed by Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, affecting Estate Duties on property situate in the Colonies, he has received any communication relative thereto from any of the official representatives of the Colonies in this country ; and, if so, whether those representatives have expressed themselves as satisfied that the clause meets the objections to these duties as originally proposed, which were embodied in the Colonial remonstrance of 12th June ; and whether he will lay upon the Table of this House any correspondence relative to this subject which has passed between any representatives of the Colonies and himself ?

MR. S. BUXTON : No communication was received from the official representatives of the Colonies in this country since the introduction into the Finance Bill of the new clause proposed by the Government affecting Estate Duties on properties situate in the Colonies. A letter was, however, received from Sir C. Tupper on June 30th, which will be laid upon the Table of the House. The letter of the Agents General has already been laid and circulated.

Mr. Campbell-Bannerman

MR. GIBSON BOWLES : Do I understand that the letter of Sir Charles Tupper will be laid on the Table ?

MR. S. BUXTON : Yes, Sir.

MR. RENTOUL (Down, E.) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he will inform the House whether any official complaint has been received at the War Office from Colonel Edward Mitchell, Royal Engineers, retired, reporting that when on the 28th May last he entered the War Office on his way to the Military Secretary's Levée Waiting Room he was twice wilfully obstructed, and once technically assaulted by a pensioner soldier War Office messenger, though he pointed out he was about to attend the levée, and whether he is aware that the gallant officer called in a policeman in order to obtain admission ; and, by whose orders and directions, and why, Colonel Mitchell was thus interfered with ?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : The office regulation is that when a visitor calls to see any official he is shown into the waiting-room, and his name is sent to the official, who either comes to see him or asks him to come to his room. Colonel Mitchell appears to have resented the application of this rule to him. The regulation seems to be a very necessary and proper one.

INDIAN STAFF COLLEGE.

MR. RENTOUL : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India why it is that officers of the Indian Military Service are discouraged from competing for the Staff College by being placed on the English rate of pay during their residence at the college, thereby being subjected to the loss of nearly 50 per cent. of the pay which they would otherwise receive.

MR. H. H. FOWLER : Officers of the Indian Military Service are, while at the Staff College, on the same footing as to pay and allowances as officers of the British Army. Those who are successful in competing at the examinations held in India are allowed to travel at the public expense from and to India. There is no reason to suppose that officers are discouraged from competing for admission by the rates of pay which they now draw.

HOLMFIRTH COUNTY COURT.

MR. HENRY J. WILSON (York, W.R., Holmfirth): I beg to ask the Attorney General whether he is aware that during the 12 months ending 31st May, 1894, his Honour Judge Cadman has only attended the County Court six times—namely, on 12th July, 7th October, 6th December, 31st January, 7th March, and 2nd May; that on 7th October the Court opened at 11.20, and on that day, as well as on the 7th March, it was, after an interval for luncheon, adjourned before three o'clock; whether he is aware that on each of the six sittings the Court has been adjourned with some case or cases part heard; and that it has been a common occurrence for contested cases not to be disposed of before the third sitting after they are entered; whether it is prescribed by Statute that, unless the Lord Chancellor has consented to the contrary, a Court shall be held at least once a month in each Court district; whether he can say if the Lord Chancellor has consented to longer intervals for the sittings of the Court at Holmfirth; and whether, if the Lord Chancellor has so consented, some steps can be taken now to provide a remedy for the great loss of time and inconvenience now suffered in the Holmfirth district?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir J. RIGBY, Forfar): I believe that the dates of the sittings of the Court during the period mentioned in the question are correctly stated, except that, according to my information, the 4th of October should be substituted for the 7th of that month. On that day, after dealing with cases in Chambers, the Judge sat in Court at 11.20, and a case in which the Holmfirth Local Board was interested was continued, and at about 2.50 was adjourned to Huddersfield, as there were no law books at Holmfirth. At Huddersfield the hearing was resumed at 3.40, and the Court rose at 5.45. At the sitting of the 7th of March 27 cases were disposed of, and one case part heard and adjourned. I am informed that it is not a common occurrence for contested cases to extend to a third hearing, and that the Holmfirth Local Board case is the only case in which this has occurred. The sittings of Court bi-monthly was, I am informed, sanctioned by the Lord Chancellor in 1884 on the ground that the business of the district was very small. So far as my information extends, there has not been any great loss of time or inconvenience suffered in the Holmfirth district.

MR. H. J. WILSON: Will the hon. and learned Gentleman inquire of litigants as well as of Court officials?

SIR J. RIGBY: I am not in a position to make further inquiries.

THE BALFOUR COMPANIES.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: I beg to ask the Attorney General when it is intended to undertake proceedings against the persons, other than Mr. Jabez Balfour, who were also responsible for the management of the companies in which he was concerned?

SIR J. RIGBY: I may reply to this question by saying that it would not be in the interest of justice that any definite answer should be given.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: Is it not a fact that the Papers necessary for these proceedings have been in the hands of the Law Officers of the Crown for fully eight months?

SIR J. RIGBY: I cannot answer that question definitely, because eight months ago would carry us back to the time of my predecessor in office. He, however, gave directions in the matter which are being acted upon, but my answer to the preceding question must also be taken to apply equally to this one.

THE AGED POOR COMMISSION.

MR. LOGAN (Leicester, Harborough): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he can afford the House any information as to the probable date on which the Report of the Aged Poor Commission will be in the hands of Members; and if he can take steps to hasten the presentation of the Report?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT, Derby): I am informed that the Commission are now engaged in the consideration of their Report. Frequent meetings are being held; but the Chairman is not at present able to say when the Report will be issued.

OVER-PAYMENT OF INCOME TAX.

MR. RENSHAW (Renfrew): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether his attention has been drawn to the printed edition (1886) of General Instructions to Surveyors of Taxes, page 45, paragraph 293, in which it is stated that persons desiring to appeal under the 133rd section, as amended, may do so on giving notice at any time within the year following the year of assessment to which the appeal relates; whether a claim made in respect of over-payment of Income Tax for the year 1892-3 might be made and admitted up to 5th April, 1894; and whether it is the case that the date within which claims are admitted varies in different localities; and, if that is so, whether he will make provision in the Finance Bill by which the date up to which claims can be admitted shall be exactly the same throughout the United Kingdom?

*SIR W. HARCOURT: The words of the Instructions are correctly quoted. The law directs that the claim shall be made "within, or at the end of the year current." The Supreme Court of Judicature interprets these words as meaning within the shortest time after the end of the year that is reasonably possible. The decision as to what is a "reasonable" time in each individual case is left to the discretion of the District Commissioners, who, as the hon. Member no doubt knows, are altogether independent of the Executive Government. Any hard-and-fast date would operate against those appellants whose cases take the longest to prepare. The object of the Board in giving the Instructions quoted is to prevent their officers raising any objection before the District Commissioners, on the score of time, to claims presented within 12 months.

MR. RENSHAW: Cannot the right hon. Gentleman answer more fully the last paragraph of the question?

SIR W. HARCOURT: I have already said that the decision as to what is reasonable time in each individual case is left to the discretion of the District Commissioners, who are not under the orders of the Executive Government, but are specially appointed to be independent of the Executive.

MR. RENSHAW: But does not the admission of the claim rest with the assessor, and do not the dates adopted vary in different parts of the United Kingdom?

Mr. Renshaw

*SIR W. HARCOURT: I do not understand that the assessor has anything to do with the matter. The dates may vary, as different sets of Commissioners may take different views of what is a "reasonable time."

MR. BIDDULPH (Herefordshire, Ross): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the Inland Revenue Department can devise some more easy and expeditious method for making remissions of overpaid Income Tax, more especially to persons of small means, who are at present subjected to very great inconvenience and delay under the existing system?

SIR W. HARCOURT: This matter is receiving the most careful consideration of the Inland Revenue authorities, as was stated by the Secretary to the Treasury on Tuesday last. They have been asked to consider whether any more easy and expeditious method can be devised, and I understand that with this object they are looking into a large number of cases which the hon. Member has, at their request, forwarded to them for inquiry. Everything possible will be done to remove the inconvenience complained of.

THE COURSE OF PUBLIC BUSINESS.

SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, and when, it is intended to proceed with the Equalisation of Rates Bill?

SIR W. HARCOURT: I am not able to make any reference to the further business of the House until the Debate on the Finance Bill is concluded.

SIR M. HICKS-BEACH (Bristol, W.): May I ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he intends to take a Vote on Account, and, if so, when?

SIR W. HARCOURT: The Vote on Account must be taken by the end of the month. I understand that it must be concluded by the 1st August.

*SIR M. HICKS-BEACH: It would be to the convenience of the House if the right hon. Gentleman could tell us whether he proposes to take Supply tomorrow or the Finance Bill.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I propose to proceed with the Finance Bill tomorrow.

REGISTRY OF DEEDS, DUBLIN.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he can give any assurance that the post of chief clerk in the Registry of Deeds, Dublin, will not be revived, or any similar post created, so long as the registrar is assisted by two deputies?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: I am not aware of any intention of increasing the establishment of the Registry of Deeds, Dublin, and any such proposal would be very closely scrutinised at the Treasury before it received the sanction of the Board. Beyond this, I can give no pledge which might tie the hands of the Government in the event of a future re-organisation of the Department.

THE NAVAL MANŒUVRES.

MR. GOURLEY: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty if he can, without inconvenience to the Public Service, inform the House how many and what type of vessels are to be employed in the forthcoming Naval Manœuvres; whether the squadrons are to act from a supposed enemy's coast, say that of France or Holland, or, as on former occasions, only such coasts and harbours of the United Kingdom as are already known to the officers; whether experiments are to be made in coaling all types of vessels at sea after leaving port, or whether when supplies are needed all are to return for fuel; whether the squadrons are to be exercised in a manner such as would attach to the responsibilities of the Fleets in the Channel, and Reserve, and Mediterranean if engaged in hostilities involving the active employment of the latter; and if all the vessels are to have their full complement of deck and engine-room hands, and how many men of the Coastguard and first and second-class Naval Reserves are to be sent afloat?

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: About 100 vessels of various types, including torpedo boats, are to take part in the Manœuvres. My hon. Friend in his second paragraph cannot have been aware that the course which he appears to suggest would hardly be consistent with that careful regard for the susceptibilities of friendly Powers which the Admiralty always desire to observe. Experiments on coaling at sea are not to be a special feature this year. The answer to the fourth paragraph is: Yes, so far as this is applicable to the general scheme of the Manœuvres. All the vessels will have their full complements. The usual number of the Coastguard (about one-half) will be employed. And Royal Naval Reserve men have been allowed to volunteer to the number of 500.

NAVAL TRAINING SHIPS.

MR. ROUND (Essex, N.E., Harwich): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty if it is intended to establish further training ships for Her Majesty's Navy; and, if so, whether the claims of the eastern coast and the advantages of Harwich harbour will be duly considered in deciding on the position of such ships?

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: There is at present no intention of establishing any more stationary training ships, but should this be done the advantages of Harwich as a station will be duly considered with those of other ports.

MR. ROUND: Where is H.M.S. Northampton to be stationed?

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: It will not be stationed at any particular port, but will visit various ports throughout the United Kingdom.

MANCHESTER TELEGRAPHIC STAFF.

MR. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he has considered the Petition submitted to him by the Manchester telegraph staff (male) at the end of last year; and whether he can concede the claims of the petitioners for abolition of classification, and improved rates of pay?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. A. MORLEY, Nottingham, E.): The Memorial in question from Manchester is similar to one which was received from several of the larger offices in 1892, and contains the same petitions—namely, for the abolition of classification, and for improvement in the scales of pay. Those petitions were refused by my predecessor, and I see no grounds for altering his decision. I am satisfied that the abolition of classification would not only be injurious to the efficiency to the Service, but would be directly of the disadvantage of the most deserving portion of the staff.

I may add that the scales of pay were fixed so lately as 1890; they are sufficiently attractive to induce large numbers of candidates to seek admission to the Service, and there is, therefore, no justification for asking Parliament to sanction any further increase of the already heavy expenditure.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

FINANCE BILL.

CONSIDERATION. [SECOND NIGHT.]

Bill, as amended, further considered.

SIR R. WEBSTER (Isle of Wight) moved a new clause, the object of which was to enable the Court to vary deeds of settlement in so far as it might think the settlement rendered unjust by the incidence of the Estate Duty. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer or the Attorney General would be good enough to look at the provisions inserted in the clause—namely,

“The Court may thereupon determine how, as between the persons interested under the settlement, the payment of such duty should, having regard to the interests of such persons, be provided for, and may make such variations and additions in and to the trusts and powers contained in the instrument settling the property as may be necessary for carrying such determination into effect,” he thought they would admit it was only fair that an arrangement of this kind should be made. When the question was raised in Committee the Chancellor of the Exchequer seemed to be under a slight misapprehension that the position of the Exchequer might be endangered. Seeing that since these settlements were drawn up much heavier duties had been imposed, surely the Court ought to have power, on the complaints of the persons interested, to vary the provisions. The amount of the tax itself would in no way be injured. The arguments in favour of the clause were apparent on the face of it, and he ventured to submit that they were reasonable, and only the natural corollary of the creation of a state of things never contemplated when the settlements were drawn up. Further than that the Court would not interfere, unless it was satisfied that the variation would be in the interests of all parties.

Mr. A. Morley

New Clause—

(Power of court to vary settlements.)

“Any person who, by an irrevocable instrument effected before the commencement of this part of the Act, has settled any property may, if Estate Duty has not already been paid in respect thereof, apply to the High Court in the manner directed by Rules of Court to have it determined, and the Court may thereupon determine how, as between the persons interested under the settlement, the payment of such duty should, having regard to the interests of such persons, be provided for, and may make such variations and additions in and to the trusts and powers contained in the instrument settling the property as may be necessary for carrying such determination into effect.”—(Sir R. Webster.)

Clause brought up, and read the first time.”

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Clause be read a second time.”

SIR W. HARCOURT said, that though it was true the clause did not affect the Revenue, it involved larger interests. It raised the whole question whether settlements made in the past should be re-opened and re-cast.

SIR R. WEBSTER: Only with regard to the new duties.

SIR W. HARCOURT said, that that was a serious question, so serious that he was not prepared to face it. Besides, it was a claim which might be raised wherever any particular tax affected the interest of a person, while it might largely affect the settlements by which that person was bound. The proposal, indeed, was so revolutionary that he could not recommend the House to adopt it. He was surprised that it should be made from such a quarter. Not only would it abolish settlements altogether, but every person bound by a settlement would desire to get rid of the burden. The aid of the Chancery Court would be invoked, and all the beneficiaries under the settlement would be made parties to the suit. The result would be universal and expensive litigation. He could not recommend the House to accept the clause.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Rochester) confessed that he heard with wonder the tremendous care exhibited by the right hon. Gentleman for the sanctity of settlements.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I would much rather abolish them outright than do it in this way.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE said, he could not understand why the right hon. Gentleman should prefer to abolish them outright than to do substantial justice according to the wish of the settlor during his lifetime. The right hon. Gentleman was not present when he raised this point in Committee. The Solicitor General, who was then in charge of the Bill, replied that the question largely turned on the fact that the Court could not be expected to know what the wishes of the dead settlor were. Now, according to the right hon. Gentleman, they were no longer to trust even so impartial a tribunal as the High Court. The proposal contained in the Amendment was a very modest proposal. After all, the Chancellor of the Exchequer must admit that his principal interest had been care for the Exchequer, and the Exchequer would not suffer a single sixpence by this proposal. When new burdens were thrown upon the various portions of a settlement, which might entirely vitiate the wishes of the settlor, and if the settlor was actually living and desired to give his evidence before the Court, why should he not be allowed to do so if the Court thought it right? The Court would be absolutely impartial, and he did not imagine the cost would be great. It very often happened that a man whose estate consisted partly of realty and personalty, left the realty and a small sum of money enough to work the landed property to one son and the personal property to the other son. Enter the Chancellor of the Exchequer with his aggregation, and so on, which the settlor never expected, and thereupon the son with the landed property found the little balance of money which he was going to work the property with, on account of the duty he had to pay, would be absolutely useless for that purpose. The intention of the settlor was that the landed property should go to one son with just enough money to work it, and the personal property to the other. [Mr. H. H. FOWLER: That would be a will.] It might be a settlement, and it was quite obvious that in such a case the settlement ought to be re-arranged so that the son with the landed property should not suffer so materially at the hands of the Chancellor of the Exchequer as to make it impossible for him to work the property. If that was true with regard to a settlor who was already dead, it was doubly true with regard to a living settlor, because he could be consulted and could tell what were his wishes. It appeared to him perfectly absurd for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to talk about the sanctity of settlements when he was varying, in a most material degree, the effect of settlements by the enormous taxation which he was suddenly imposing. They were not by this clause in any way injuring the sanctity of settlements, but were trying to compensate for the inequality which the Chancellor of the Exchequer would introduce, and they proposed to vest the power to remedy that inequality in a perfectly impartial tribunal, which would not be expensive because it would not be a contested matter, but one of friendly arrangement only requiring the authority of the Court to give it practical effect.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER said, the noble Lord defended the sanctity of settlements, and at the same time advocated the introduction of a principle which would leave the Court to set aside, modify, or alter a settlement on the application of any one of the parties interested.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE: Not on the application of any one of the parties.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER said, that practically every one of them would have to be before the Court. Whoever initiated the procedure, that would be the practical result. What he did not quite understand was where the injustice would arise in the practical working of the Bill. The noble Lord ventured to use the word settlor in one sense, and he ventured to interrupt the noble Lord and use it in another. The settlements to which the noble Lord had alluded as settlements were made by will. The noble Lord put the case of a testator leaving his real estate and the residue of the property to one son, and leaving his personal estate to another son, and then, said the noble Lord, injustice would be inflicted on the elder son, in consequence of having to pay out of the revenue the entire Estate Duty, whether graduated or not. That would not be so as a matter of fact, between the two properties. After the passing of the Act the testator might alter his will. The will did not come into effect on the date on which it was made. What were the nature of these settlements? In the overwhelming majority of cases they were marriage settlements upon the consideration of marriage, in which property belonging to the gentleman and lady were both put into the settlement, and for the benefit of both. Where did the injustice come in? The settlement case was provided for under Clause 14, which said—

“In the case of property which does not pass to the executor as such, an amount, equal to the proper rateable part of the Estate Duty, may be recovered as follows—namely :—

By the person who being accountable for, or authorised or required to pay, the Estate Duty on any property, has paid such duty from the person entitled to any sum charged on such property, whether as capital, or as an annuity or otherwise, under a disposition not containing any express provision to the contrary.”

Therefore, in the Bill as it now stood there was a provision for apportioning the duty—namely, where, under existing settlements, property had been charged with an annuity, or with portions of the settlement, made long before this Act was contemplated, and where possibly some injustice might be assumed to accrue to the parties interested in that settlement if the principal beneficiary was called upon to pay the whole of the Estate Duty and was not able to recover any part of it from the persons entitled. Clause 14 amply provided for such cases as that. That was the provision which was contained in the Bill for existing settlements; settlements made after the date of the Bill would contemplate, of course, the provisions of the Bill and provide accordingly. It could not apply to wills, therefore they were simply dealing with existing settlements, and he would submit that ample protection was given in Clause 14. Look at the precedent they were going to set! He was in favour of marriage settlements. To some extent they were provisions for daughters against the possible future losses of the husbands with whom they might marry, and he was not in favour of stopping that mode of a father providing for his daughter. An executed instrument could not now be set aside without the consent of everybody sui juris; but the noble Lord proposed to break down that safeguard. He proposed that a Chancery suit might be commenced in order to ask the Court to decide who was the proper person by whom duty should be paid. The remedy would be far worse than the disease. No general principle could be laid down to guide the decisions of the Court, and to attempt to make the Court of Chancery a sort of Controller General of all the provisions of settlements in this Kingdom would be for Parliament to vest in that quarter a dispensing power which he thought the Chancellor of the Exchequer was right in saying would be fatal to the existence of settlements altogether. He quite agreed with the noble Lord that as far as finance was concerned the Exchequer would get the money. On grounds of public policy, and wishing to maintain the sanctity of settlements, he should vote against this clause, and should follow strictly the precedent set in 1853 with reference to the Succession Duty where, when a new tax was imposed, no such proposal as this was made or sanctioned by the Legislature.

*SIR M. HICKS-BEACH (Bristol, W.) said, he could not profess to be a lawyer. He consequently approached this question from the point of view of a layman, and he did not see anything in the proposal which was nearly so great an interference with settlements as had been already sanctioned by Parliament long ago in the Settled Land Acts. What did those Acts allow? They allowed the life tenant of an estate to sell the estate and to convert it into money to be invested in certain ways by the trustees. The whole object of the original settlement was probably to keep the land in the family, and this might be changed entirely under the Settled Land Acts, and yet the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down talked of this proposal as if it could be compared with such a vital change as that to which he had referred. What was the proposal? It dealt solely with existing settlements. Practically it dealt, he imagined, almost entirely with marriage settlements, with regard to which the settlers were to come to the Court and ask the Court, having regard to the very large additional burden placed upon settled property by this new taxation, so to vary the settlement as to make the payment of these duties fair as between the beneficiaries of the settlement. The right hon. Gentleman said that point was met by Clause 14. It was not. All that Clause 14 did was to enable the person on whom the real property was settled to deduct from the person receiving any sum charged on that property the proportionate amount of the Estate Duty which was allocated to that sum under the provisions of this Bill. But he said that where existing settlers who had made an irrevocable settlement went to the Court and said they desired, looking to this new taxation imposed, to vary the settlements so as to make them what they would themselves have made them if they could have foreseen this taxation, that such a proposal was a fair proposal, and was as slight an interference with the law of settlements as any he could conceive. It was the commonest thing in marriage settlements, with regard to landed property, to make some such arrangement as this: a jointure reserved for the wife charged on the property; portions to be raised for younger children by trustees out of that property, and the property itself so charged was left to the eldest son. But now, under the system of charging by aggregation and graduation on the principal value first introduced into their system of taxation by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that property left to the eldest son, so charged, would be taxed far more than it would have been under the law existing when the settlement was made. Could the right hon. Gentleman not conceive that under such circumstances the settlers, if they could have foreseen this taxation; would not have charged the property with so large a jointure and so large portions to the younger children, and in all fairness they might come and ask the Court that at any rate the younger children might bear a larger proportion of this new taxation than they would have to bear under the provisions of Clause 14. The Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Secretary of State for India had referred to the precedent of the Succession Duty Act of 1853 as if it was necessarily to bind them in this matter. They had said that a fresh tax was imposed upon realty by that Act, and yet no proposal was ever made for allowing the settlers of estates on which that new duty was charged to obtain any such alteration in the settlements as was proposed by this clause. The duty imposed by the Succession Duty Act of 1853 was a very small duty indeed when compared with the taxation imposed by this Bill, because, in the first place, it was taxation merely on the life interest of the person taking the estate, and, in the second place, it was not a graduated tax at all, whilst the very argument by which this Budget was defended was the enormous increase of taxation on realty which would result from these two principles of graduation, and of charging estates according to their capital value, which for the first time had been introduced with regard to real property by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It did seem to him that nothing could be more safely guarded than the proposal of his hon. and learned Friend. In the first place, nothing could be done without the application of the settlers themselves. The settlers must be alive, and must themselves apply to the Court. In the second place, the only settlements to which the clause applied were existing settlements made before the passing of the Act. Of course, after the Bill became law it would be open to settlers to frame any new settlements accordingly; and, lastly, it rested upon the Court entirely so to interpret this clause as to make the incidence of the new duty, with its heavy taxation, fair as between the different beneficiaries of the settlement. The Court would be guided in that taxation by the provisions of this clause, and by the wishes also of those very persons who made the settlement, and who would come before the Court to say they would not have made it in its present shape if they could have foreseen this taxation. He very much regretted that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as he thought, in this matter had departed from the position he seemed willing to assume when this proposal was first made in Committee in the Bill, and if the clause were pressed to a Division he should certainly vote for it.

MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby) said, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had very greatly exaggerated this Amendment when he had said that he would just as soon see settlements done away with altogether. This was simply a question where those who had already made irrevocable settlements, and not having foreseen the present legislation, desired in their lifetime to remodel those settlements with the consent of the Court. He thought it was rather an extraordinary argument for the right hon. Gentleman to say that this would be throwing a great deal of work into the hands of the lawyers. If ever a Bill was brought forward in the House of Commons which might be entitled "A Bill for the promotion of the interests of the legal profession" it was this Bill. He did not think that was a sound argument at all. No persons in their senses would go before the Court unless they had evidence beforehand that the beneficiaries under the settlement would not oppose the application. Then as to having a whole array of lawyers, they could apply to the Judge in Chambers, and having got the consent of the parties to the settlement, the matter could be arranged in half-an-hour without any lawyers at all. He should certainly support this clause if it went to a Division. Settlers would not have made the settlements in the form they had could they have known that this legislation was to take place, and they ought to be allowed to apply to the Court to have permission to revise their settlements in a manner that was equitable, and of which they would be the best judges. He denied that this question only affected marriage settlements. It affected entailed settlements as well, or, it might be, even partnership settlements. But whatever they might be, the whole question was whether the settlement at the time it was made, even if equitable then, was equitable now under the changed circumstances, and they ought to give the privilege of enabling the settlor in his lifetime to get the consent of the Court to remodel that settlement and make it fair between all the parties.

SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.) said, the chief argument against the Amendment was that settlements would be shaken. But the Amendment only provided for an alteration of the settlement qua duties, which was, comparatively speaking, a small matter, would not enable any general revision of the settlement to take place, and that alteration would only be in relation to a perfectly new element introduced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer himself. The very principle which was now objected to was contained in this Bill apparently from an innate sense of justice. Clause 32, dealing with the Spirit and Beer

Duties, made the provision that the additional duty should be added to the contract price. If they substituted for the word "contract" the word "settlement" they would have the application of the same principle, because they had an additional duty proposed, and an additional duty which was not contemplated by the parties to the settlement which was the contract. In the one case the Government varied the contract because of the additional element introduced by the Bill, and in the other case they absolutely refused to do so. He did not agree that this could be done without cost, but it could be dealt with by rules, which might provide that it should come up by originating summons in Chambers.

SIR J. RIGBY never heard of such a proposal as this, which was absolutely novel in every way. [An hon. MEMBER: So is the Budget.] The Budget might also contain some novel principles, but what did this proposal amount to? They were to inquire from the people who made these irrevocable settlements some time ago what they would have done if they had known that this duty was to be imposed.

SIR R. WEBSTER: That is for the Court.

*SIR J. RIGBY asked how was the Court to find out, because he ventured to say upon the construction of this clause there was nothing to guide the Court? There was no principle upon which the Court could act as to what they ought to have done, and all that could be extracted from it was that they must listen to what the settlor had to say and, within certain limits, to guide themselves on what he said. There was absolutely no kind of evidence which was more difficult to deal with than the evidence of people who came forward to tell what they did mean in doing a certain thing, because they knew perfectly well, in cases of rectification of settlement, how unsatisfactory that evidence was. Again and again, when people had settled property irrevocably, they did not like the settlement; events altered, and they said this was never intended that the settlements ought to be altered, and there was no more difficult question to deal with than the appreciation of evidence of that kind. But when it came to a case of the evidence of what people would have meant in a set of circumstances which did not exist really as a guide to a Court of Justice, that evidence must be absolutely worthless. His hon. and learned Friend knew perfectly well that such questions were never allowed to be put to witnesses as to what they would have done if so-and-so had taken place. It was perfectly idle to treat any answer given to such questions as evidence at all, and if they said that the Court was to be guided by the general principles of equity and justice he, for one, did not know where they were to be found. No Judge of the Chancery Division would ever take upon himself such a jurisdiction, and he ventured to say that no Judge should be entrusted with such a jurisdiction. There were principles of justice and equity, and good ones too, and one of them was that they should go by what the parties had done, and not upon what they would have done in certain circumstances, or upon any judgment which might be arrived at as to what they ought to have done. A provision already existed in the law whereby the trustees of settled property, if they had to raise a sum of money, could go to the Court and ask how the money was to be raised—whether by the sale of certain Stocks or by some other means. That jurisdiction already existed and was sufficient for the purpose, but the jurisdiction proposed in the Amendment would, he was sure, lead to nothing, for no prudent Judge would act upon it. No one ever thought before of giving such a haphazard jurisdiction as this to a Court of Law; and certainly he thought no one familiar with the subject would ever suppose it would be laid down that the rule which should apply to settlements after the event was what settlers would have done if they had known that those new duties would be imposed.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (Manchester, E.): There are no Tories like the legal gentlemen who support the Government. The Government may advance a policy of the most violent and novel description, and these gentlemen are prepared to support the Government by argument in carrying out that policy. But if you touch one of their particular mysteries; if you trespass even by a hair's breadth within the traditions of their profession, they are all up in arms, and no change in the procedure of the law, however trifling, is allowed, which does not happen to be in strict conformity with the traditions of the Bar. That is the distinguishing sentiment of English lawyers. Now, what is the principal argument by which they support it? I always observe that their mainstay is the incompetence of the Courts of Law. We have been always in the habit of looking to the Courts of Law as tribunals where not merely certain rules are administered, but where some of those principles of equity and justice, which the Attorney General finds so difficult to discover, may actually be found applied to the matters brought before them. We have always felt that in the Courts of Law we have an impartial body of men prepared to arbitrate on reasonable principles, and prepared to consider the broad equities of any case brought before them, and that at all events they were not—being men of common sense in private life—entirely deprived of that valuable quality when they put on wig and gown, and sat themselves down on the seat of justice. The Chancellor of the Exchequer whispers across the Table that that is the fact, and so supports the conclusion I have arrived at. I am unwilling, therefore, to give up what is a perfectly obvious and reasonable Amendment simply because of the argument that Judges qua Judges are too stupid to administer the duties this clause would impose on them.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Too clever.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Or too clever. I do not care which way it is put. But let us consider what we ask the Courts of Law to do by this clause, and what it is the Attorney General says they are incompetent to do. All we ask to have done is that when a settlement is made under different conditions from those that now prevail, the person who made the settlement, if living, and the people in whose favour the settlement was made, may have it varied in that one particular, the circumstances of which have been changed by the action of the Legislature. I say that is the right thing to do, and I say it is analogous to what can be done under the existing law. Under the Settled Land Act the owners of real settled property may go to the Court, and may get leave to sell a mansion house that is settled. Why is it that the Courts of Law may apply principles of common-sense with regard to a mansion house when settled, but not with regard to any other kind of property when settled? If no better ground can be given for rejecting the Amendment than that the Judges of the land—very able and well-paid officials—are incapable of doing what any man of equity and common-sense can do, we ought not to reject the Amendment on such a ground, or else the whole machinery by which we established the so-called fountains of equity and justice, which have run dry according to the Attorney General, should be done away with, and another tribunal set up which can carry out the very simple and obvious duties which this House may desire to impose upon them. I earnestly press upon the Government to accept this Amendment. The Government have all through the Bill not been content with imposing a very heavy additional burden on a certain class of property, which their financial necessities, no doubt, may have obliged them to do, but they have made the payment of the duty as onerous and iniquitous as it can be. We have suggested means by which this new burden may be mitigated in its incidence, and the Government have rejected our recommendations for one reason or another, but never for a reason more empty and more technical than that advanced to-day from the Treasury Bench.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) said, he could conceive that there would be difficulties in carrying out the proposed clause. First, there was the difficulty of revoking the irrevocable; then there was the difficulty of determining the duty that would arise in respect to certain contingencies occurring at the wrong time and out of their order; and there would be the further difficulty that the Court would be taking upon itself duties that properly belonged to the Inland Revenue at a time when it was most difficult to perform them. But as they had eminent lawyers he did not think those difficulties should deter them from accepting the Amendment. The Amendment provided for the payment of duty on settlements by fixing the rate of duty between the persons interested. The Attorney General said that was a new thing. But it was not a new thing; it ran through the whole Bill. The principle of the Amendment was already in the Bill with respect to ~~the~~ ^{the} property and to settled property, and what the Amendment proposed was that the same rule applied by the Bill to free personalty should be applied to irrevocable settlements made before the Bill existed. Undoubtedly many hardships would arise under the Bill if the Amendment were not accepted. He admitted the difficulties in the way of the operation of the clause; but those difficulties had been dealt with in other parts of the Bill in respect to other properties, and he thought there was a strong case for providing through the medium of the Courts for the alleviation of those grievances which had been pointed out.

*MR. T. H. BOLTON (St. Pancras, N.) said, that if the clause were added to the Bill he did not think it would be frequently resorted to, because there were difficulties which would very much stand in the way of the Court giving to it, as it was drafted, very satisfactory application. But the principle of the new clause was good, and perhaps if the Attorney General turned his legal acumen to the matter he would produce a more satisfactory amendment than the clause on the Paper. He could understand cases in which existing settlements might, with considerable convenience and advantage to the parties concerned, be rectified a little, having regard to the dislocation which the proposed new duties would undoubtedly cause in the operation of such settlements. The principle of the Amendment was novel; but there was a novel principle in the Bill—the principle of aggregation. If a man made a settlement on the marriage of his son ten years ago he could not have anticipated that a new law would be passed by which all the family property—the property in the settlement and the property outside the settlement—would be aggregated, so as to raise the duty from $1\frac{1}{2}$ or 3 per cent. to 8 per cent. It would undoubtedly be a matter of great convenience to allow the settlor to go into Court and get the settlement rectified in consequence of the action of the legislature in bringing into operation a new principle of taxation. He did not think the hon. and learned Gentleman who moved the amendment was wedded to the words of the amendment. It might be made to run so as to provide that a settlement might be rectified by the Court in accordance with the wishes of the settlor, provided the wishes of the settlor did not unfairly prejudice the interests of those who were benefited under the settlement. If the clause were amended in that way it would make perfectly intelligible to the Court as to the lines on which the rectification should proceed. He did not see why such a small concession should be resisted by the Government.

Question put, "That this Bill be read a second time."

*MR. BUTCHER (York) said, he wished to move the new clause on the Paper, which would enable a person to provide for the payment of Estate Duty in advance. The clause was conceived in the interest of persons who had to pay Death Duties, but he thought it would also be to the interest of the Inland Revenue Commissioners and the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It would enable a man during his lifetime to set aside out of his income small sums of money in order to accumulate a fund out of which at his death the Estate Duties should be paid. He was encouraged in moving the clause by some observations which fell from the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer yesterday. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Great Grimsby moved a clause of a somewhat similar character in reference to insurance, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer intimated that though he could not accept that he would view with favour a proposal to establish an inalienable fund for the purpose of paying duty. He took the case of a man who had a life income out of which he was prepared to save or invest a sum for the purpose of paying Death Duty. The minimum sum that he could put by was £50, and it was intended that once the individual had paid these sums into the Bank of England he should not have power to withdraw them except with the consent of the Commissioners. The sum paid in would be applicable, in the first instance, towards the payment of Death Duty, and would not be liable to duty, but anything over and above the amount required for that duty would go to the executors and become part of the estate and be liable, like any other part of the property, to payment of duty. It might be said that the Bank would not care to undertake these accounts, but in reply to that it was proposed that the Bank should be entitled to some small percentage on the funds so received for keeping accounts. These sums as they were received by the Bank were to be invested in Consols and accumulated automatically. There was a provision in an Act passed by the late Government under which Consols could be bought and dividends accumulated from time to time. Another objection might be, "Why don't you do this by insurance?" but this plan would not prejudice the right of a man to insure. He would imagine cases where insurance could not be effected—where, for instance, the life was a bad one. Besides, in the case of insurance, if the premiums were dropped for half a year or a year the insurance was gone. Under his proposal a man might pay in £50 or £100 whenever he was in funds, and if a long period passed without further payments the amount which remained in the Bank did not suffer. Under insurance the rates that would be charged on bad lives would be so high as to make insurance in their case quite prohibitive. The scheme, he submitted, could not hurt the estate nor could it hurt the Chancellor of the Exchequer, while at the same time it would provide the cash in hand to meet the payment of the duty at the very time when the widow or other relative of the deceased would probably find it most difficult otherwise to obtain it. For these reasons he trusted that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would accept the clause, believing that it would be to the advantage of the Inland Revenue Commissioners and the State to accept it in this or a modified form.

New Clause—

(Payment of duties in advance.)

"(1) It shall be lawful for the Governor and Company of the Bank of England, upon the request of any person desiring to provide against any duties which may become payable under this Act in respect of property passing on his death, to open an account with such person (to be called an "Estate Duty Account") into which such person may from time to time pay sums of not less than fifty pounds at one and the same time, to be dealt with as hereinafter mentioned.

(2) Any sum paid into the Estate Duty Account of any person shall be invested by the Governor and Company of the said Bank in Consols, and accumulated.

(3) The Governor and Company of the said Bank shall, upon the death of any person, apply the amount, if any, standing to the credit of the Estate Duty Account of such person, in payment, in the first place, of the duties payable under this Act in respect of such of the property passing on his death as he shall by writing under his hand direct, and shall pay the balance, if any, of the amount standing to the credit of such account to the executor of such person, and Estate Duty shall be levied thereon at the proper graduated rate.

(4) Estate Duty shall not, save as hereinbefore provided, be paid in respect of the amount standing to the credit of the Estate Duty Account of any person at the time of his death.

(5) Any person may, with the consent of the Commissioners, but not otherwise, withdraw from the said Bank the amount for the time being standing to the credit of his Estate Duty Account.

(6) The provisions of this section shall not apply to any sum paid into the Estate Duty of any person within twelve months of his death or the investments thereof."—(Mr. Butcher.)

Clause brought up, and read the first time."

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

SIR W. HARCOURT said, he was obliged to differ from the view of his learned Friend that the proposal could not be objected to because it could neither injure the estate nor hurt the Revenue. It proposed to exempt from the payment of duty money belonging to a category of property that he had before said could not be exempted. The hon. and learned Member said the object of the clause was to exempt from taxation all the money put by to pay the Death Duties. That would involve a serious loss to the Revenue. Supposing the exemption were made general, or all payments of duty were exempted from taxation, the loss to the Revenue would be £500,000 annually. It would affect the whole of the existing Probate Duties. In speaking the other day with reference to insurances, he pointed out that it would be unfair to give any special exemption from the payment of duty to people who made that class of investment. There were many persons who could not be insured or who wanted to employ the money in their business, and therefore could not adopt that particular form of investment. He had also pointed out that a man who might use his money to buy a house would not have the advantage proposed to be conferred. The same objection applied to this Amendment. The hon. Member might be able to go to the Bank of England and invest his money, but Non cuius homini contingit adire Corinthum. This clause gave an advantage only to the class of persons who could go and run up an account at the Bank of England, and it seemed to be the fault of so many Amendments proposed by hon. Members opposite that they gave exceptional advantages only to the wealthier classes. The Amendment would confer a great advantage upon (he was sorry to have to use the phrase again) the millionaire who, in view of approaching death, could put into the Bank sufficient to pay the duties.

MR. BUTCHER (interrupting) said, he would call the right hon. Gentleman's attention to Sub-section 6 of the clause, which said—

"The provisions of this section shall not apply to any sum paid into the Estate Duty of any person within 12 months of his death or the investments thereof."

SIR W. HARCOURT said, that still the objection would stand that only the wealthier class of people would be able to take advantage of the clause. They could not take one class of investment and say that it should not be liable to duty.

SIR M. HICKS-BEACH (Bristol, W.) said, he thought they had some reason to complain of the action of the right hon. Gentleman in this matter. When the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Great Grimsby yesterday proposed a clause giving this kind of exemption in the case of insurance affected for the purpose of paying Death Duties, the right hon. Gentleman was more sympathetic than he was now. He told them now, forsooth, that if the clause were passed into law it would only benefit the millionaire.

SIR W. HARCOURT: The richer people.

*SIR M. HICKS-BEACH said, he had no doubt the millionaire would be able to invest his money much more profitably than in the manner proposed by the clause. He would not dream of taking advantage of the provision. The right hon. Gentleman had sympathised with the motive which had prompted the proposal to give some kind of advantage to persons who, at great sacrifice and trouble to themselves, saved money for the purpose of paying the duties which, according to the idea of the Government, should be paid by them and not by the successor. Well, it would be easy for the Chancellor of the Exchequer not only to sympathise with the motive of the Amendment, but, through the machinery of the Post Office Savings Bank, or some other channel, to enable the poorest persons as well as the richest to avail themselves of the advantages of the proposed clause. The House must, he was afraid, accept the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer as a symptom that he had made up his mind to discourage thrift in this matter. The right hon. Gentleman said it would involve a loss of £500,000 a year if this clause became law.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I said that would be the loss if all payments of duty were exempted.

SIR M. HICKS-BEACH: Is it likely that all Death Duties would be provided in this way?

SIR W. HARCOURT: I said that you cannot make exceptional provisions for exceptional investments, and I oppose the clause because it is exceptional.

*SIR M. HICKS-BEACH said, that the right hon. Gentleman first opposed the proposal on the ground of its being exceptional, and then on the ground that it would entail a loss to the Revenue. The right hon. Gentleman had shown himself in a previous discussion to be sympathetic with the motive which had prompted the proposal, yet when he was asked to give practical effect to his sympathy he put forward these two pleas. They could only conclude that the right hon. Gentleman had made up his mind contrary to the past policy of the Legislature to refuse to grant advantages to persons who were thrifty, as against those who were not. He regretted the decision at which the right hon. Gentleman had arrived.

MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby) said, they were in this difficulty—the right hon. Gentleman complained last night that his (Mr. Heneage's) Amendment did not go far enough.

SIR W. HARCOURT: No.

MR. HENEAGE: Yes, the right hon. Gentleman had said that he could not make an exception solely in the case of the insurance offices. Now, when they had widened the Amendment so as to give exemption to money saved for the purpose of paying Death Duty the right hon. Gentleman said he could not accept the proposal, as it would involve too heavy a loss to the Revenue. He (Mr. Heneage) protested against this bugbear "loss of half a million" being trotted out whenever the Government had nothing else to say. He did not believe the acceptance of this clause would involve any loss at all. It would be, at the most, a problematical loss on what they hoped to gain. They wished to do business out of evil. They hoped to gain by the aggregation of policies larger sums of money out of the properties than would otherwise be the case. He did not think they would get anything at all in this way. They would only prevent thrift. The money which would otherwise be put by would be spent or invested in commercial transactions and very often lost. They ought to have much better arguments from the Government before they left off pegging away in the endeavour to obtain a concession on this point.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) said, the Government surely ought to grant every facility for accumulating the funds out of which to pay the Death Duties. The proposals which had been submitted from that side of the House were designed to encourage persons during life to provide for the payment of the duties. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had said either that the proposals were "exceptional" or "too general." He should have regard to the fact that successors to estates would, in many cases, have great difficulty in paying Death Duties. The mischief in regard to many landed estates had been that the proprietors had in numerous instances trusted to the future, and provided for their families out of the future instead of trusting to the present. All the proposals which had been made were means by which every encouragement could be given to people during life to provide for this duty. Instead of meeting such proposals with objection the right hon. Gentleman surely should hail them with satisfaction. The encouragement here advocated was not only of advantage to the community, but to the Exchequer as well. The present proposal would only exempt amounts paid into the Bank in sums of £50. This would mainly affect the wealthy classes ; but the Estate Duties would fall heavily on the smaller people. There were many persons accumulating small properties of several thousands of pounds whose representatives would find it difficult to procure the money to pay the Death Duties. The Amendment would encourage habits of thrift and temperance. He thought, therefore, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, when he talked about its being merely for the good of the millionaire, forgot that yesterday and the day before all the Amendments which the Opposition proposed on behalf of poorer persons in connection with this Estate Duty were always met with the same cold comfort. The right hon. Gentleman said then, as he said now, that the matter was small and not worth consideration. The Chancellor of the Exchequer must have an idea that the mere possession of property was a crime to be punished by heavy taxation.

SIR W. HARCOURT: You can spend less money.

MR. BARTLEY said, that this was a proposal in order to encourage people to spend less money, and was framed for that very purpose. Why, then, did the right hon. Gentleman oppose it ?

SIR W. HARCOURT: What I meant was, you should spend less public money.

MR. BARTLEY said, he was afraid the Speaker would rule him out of Order if he went into that large question at this moment. He thought the right hon. Gentleman was referring to spending private money ; but he would like to point this out : that of all Exchequers in the world, both the last Liberal Government and this one had been bigger than any other. They knew perfectly well why that was so—so many interests had to be squared that the amount of taxation was continually going up. He would rather confine himself to saying that it did seem a most unreasonable and incomprehensible thing on the part of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that instead of hailing with satisfaction every system which would facilitate the accumulation of money to pay these duties, he seemed to set his face against every plan brought forward.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. H. H. FOWLER, Wolverhampton, E.) said that, judging from the hon. Member's observations, one might imagine him ignorant of the fact that there were Death Duties in this country at the present time. Under the existing law, if a man died worth £25,000 in personalty, his estate had to pay £1,000 as Probate Duty, and under this Bill not one penny addition would be made on that charge. The deceased would still have to pay £1,000 Estate Duty, no more and no less. Why had not these proposals been made before with reference to probate ? With regard to the payment of this £1,000, no exemption could be claimed now under the existing law. What was proposed was this : that whereas under the old law the estate paid £1,000, leaving £24,000 to be divided among the beneficiaries, the duty should only be paid now upon £24,000—in other words, that the corpus of the estate should be reduced by £1,000. That was the real practical working of this proposal. It was not fair to say that his right hon. Friend regarded the possession of property as a crime, or that he wished to penalise the owners of property. They were upon a fair arguable principle on this clause. He was sure the hon. Member who had proposed it would see that its operation could not be confined to accumulations in the Bank of England. If it were agreed to, its operations must be extended to accumulations in the Savings Banks and elsewhere, and, of course, to insurances. They could not pick out any specific mode of investment and say, "If you put your money in that investment it shall be relieved from paying duty." The principle of the clause, if adopted at all, must be adopted as a whole, that principle being that the sum of money which the State required the property of a deceased person to pay should itself be exempted from the payment of all duty. There could be no half-way house. If they once admitted the exemptions from the payment of duty, they could not stop until they had made the concession complete, and they would have to extend it to Legacy Duty and Succession Duty. They were asked to accept this Amendment on the ground that it would encourage thrift, but why were they to encourage it at the expense of exempting saved money for this specific purpose ? Why should not it extend to all savings ? The same argument might be adduced in justification of a proposal that the State should offer a premium to every one who saved money. But that would be an untenable and indefensible proposal. He did not understand whether the Member for South Islington had dealt with large or small properties. He knew the hon. Member had done good service in this direction, and he sympathised deeply with his motive. But the Chancellor of the Exchequer had pointed out that the duties upon properties up to £1,000 were exceedingly small, and he did not think any system could be contrived to deal with this case. With regard to intermediate properties where a few thousand pounds had been saved, why should a certain portion of the savings be picked out? People who accumulated property of that class always did it by saving. Why should they pick out a certain portion? Say a man had made £10,000. The duty upon that would be £400. Why should they say that the property was only worth £9,600, and that they were to have £400 as an encouragement for having saved it? What this House had got to face and what the Government had got to face was that the Death Duties at the present time amounted to upwards of 10 millions per annum. The Government now expected that they would amount to something like 13 millions. Anybody could make the calculation as to what was the average amount of duty payable upon that sum per annum. Some hon. Gentlemen thought it was not more than 4 per cent., the Government thought it was rather more. They thought that having regard to the amount which the future Death Duties would bring in the sum that would be exempted from duty annually would be £500,000. That was a sum which the Exchequer could not afford to give up simply in order to reward men for doing that which it was to their own interests to do. It was not fair to say that those who disapproved this proposal on economical and fiscal grounds were the enemies of thrift. What they were not prepared to do was to encourage thrift by gifts of public money.

MR. BYRNE said, that what he might call the "bankrupt Budget" argument might be an answer to every proposition for alleviation. The Chancellor of the Exchequer told them in each case when they asked for exceptions to be made that it would not be possible if he was to get money out of his Budget. That was a serious argument from one point of view, but it was no argument at all as to whether the principle of exemption was a right one, and as to whether the incidence of taxation ought not to be changed. Surely it was a great confession of weakness for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to say in answer to their arguments that the way he proposed was the only way in which the money could be raised. If the exemption were right, a re-arrangement of taxation ought to be effected, so that the Revenue might not suffer, although the exemption was granted. This was not an exemption asked for a particular favoured class in the ordinary sense at all, but for all those alike who chose, in the first place, to exercise a certain amount of self-denial and saving during their lifetime, and who, in the second place, from the moment they deposited the money gave the Government a security for the duty. These were substantial reasons why the clause should be accepted, and he intended to support it.

COMMANDER BETHELL (York, E.R., Holderness) said, this was one of the most reasonable Amendments which had been submitted. It had been proposed in various ways. Personally, he thought the best proposal was that which suggested that this money should not be entirely released from the burden of taxation, but that it should not be aggregated with the rest of the estate. So far as his hon. and learned Friend's Amendment went, if he went to a Division he would vote for it, although he thought the provision in it limiting the release of the money from taxation to one year from the death rather marred its effect. He did not think the clause was the best form in which the object could be attained, but as it was an endeavour in the right direction he would support his hon. Friend. With regard to the remarks of the Secretary of State for India, there was really no strict analogy between the argument as applied to the existing law and the argument as applied to the Bill when it became law.

SIR R. TEMPLE (Surrey, Kingston) said, he understood the Secretary for India to say that if the owner of an estate of £25,000, which was liable to £1,000 duty, were during his lifetime to save £1,000 for the purpose of providing for the duty, and that £1,000 were not to be aggregated, the duty would fall on £24,000 instead of on £25,000. He submitted that that was not so, because the £1,000 would be saved out of income.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER explained that what he said was that, under the present law, if a man died worth £25,000 he would have to pay £1,000, and under the new law the same sum of money and no more would have to be paid. The principle of the Amendment was that the £1,000 required to pay duty should be exempted, and therefore duty would only be paid on £24,000.

SIR R. TEMPLE said, that was exactly what he ventured to deny. The £1,000 was saved out of income. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for India had repeated his fallacy. The right hon. Gentleman said that the Estate Duty would only be paid on £24,000, but he must again assert that it would be paid upon £25,000, and the only question was whether it should be paid on £26,000.

SIR D. MACFARLANE (Argyll) said, as he understood the question it amounted to this: If a man at present worth £25,000 saved £1,000 to pay the Death Duties, when he died his estate, instead of being worth £25,000, would be worth £26,000, consequent upon his savings. The Amendment proposed to exempt that increase from duty.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, the hon. Gentleman entirely misunderstood the case. In the case given, a man dying worth £25,000 had already paid £1,000 to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and that was what the Amendment amounted to. The £1,000 paid into the Bank of England was impounded by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue. Surely the right hon. Gentleman and hon. Members opposite could see that if the £1,000 was paid into the Bank of England it would be impounded by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue. The House was always being met by the case of Lazarus paying 13s. while Dives paid only 13d.; but when Dives came forward and said, "Take my purple and fine linen—I will give you even the crumbs that fall from my table," the Chancellor of the Exchequer's reply was, "No, I will wait until you are dead." That the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who professed to wish to tax Dives, should refuse to accept duty from him in advance passed comprehension. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, "I will not take it; I will wait until you are dead, and then when you have no property I will come upon your successors, executors, administrators, and all the rest of them." He could see many objections to this new clause, but would not take up the whole time of the Committee by stating them. Among other misapprehensions the Secretary of State for India had been kind enough to tell the House that comparing the old and new systems the incidence of the tax on foreign property passing to a widow or children would be very different. He admitted that there would be an enormous difference. He could quite understand hon. Gentlemen opposite not desiring to listen to argument, for they never descended to argument themselves, however much they might attempt definition. Then the Chancellor of the Exchequer said he would lose £500,000 if everybody accumulated sufficient to pay the Estate Duty. But was it likely that everybody would do so? The right hon. Gentleman defeated his own argument. If everybody liable to the duty provided the money it would take not £500,000, but £700,000 or £800,000, because the Death Duties would be increased 5 6-10th per cent. They were obliged to make their own calculations, because the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who had all the figures, would not give them any assistance. He could not understand this resistance of the right hon. Gentleman to this general proposal on the part of Dives to pay this duty in advance. The position of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in regard to this matter was incomprehensible. Under the existing law amounts set apart to pay duties were not taxed. That had always been the principle followed and was set forth in the Succession Duty Act. When it was now proposed out of mere generosity to provide funds before the death for the payment of duties the Chancellor of the Exchequer ought to accept the proposal with the utmost enthusiasm.

MR. GOSCHEN (St. George's, Hanover Square) said, he wondered what kind of reception would have been accorded to such a clause as this if it had been proposed while the Party opposite were not in power. He was confident that if the Chancellor of the Exchequer were to allow his friends to vote as they liked they would vote for this clause. There was more in the proposal than the simple question of gain or loss to the Exchequer. The right hon. Gentleman was always bringing forward the millionaire whom he used to accuse hon. Members on that side of the House of introducing, but was now himself continually trotting out. It was certainly not the millionaires or very rich men who would avail themselves of the proposed facility; such persons had better means of employing their money, and would probably lose more by putting it into Consols than they would save in Estate Duty. But there was a vast class of professional men and others who occupied a position between Dives and Lazarus, and who experienced considerable difficulty in finding investments, and who if they had this additional encouragement for putting their money in Consols and providing in that way for the duty would find it a prudent course to take. The advantages need not, either, be confined to professional men. The clause might be so adapted as to make it valuable to all classes of persons. He would call the attention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to this point. This was not a clause, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer originally put it, to help rich men. It might be made of assistance to all persons who put aside a certain sum during their lifetime, not in the way of insurance but of a deposit which could not be withdrawn. It was a very ingenious clause which had been proposed by his hon. Friend to utilise investments in this manner, and he felt sure that, if the clause were read a second time, his hon. Friend would be quite prepared to remove the limit of £50, and to extend the operation of his proposal to Post Office Savings Banks and other institutions of a similar kind. Arrangements were made when he was in Office, as had been previously pointed out in the course of this Debate, by which the Bank of England, for a very small commission, would buy Consols for any person, whether a customer of the Bank or not, and would allow the dividends to accumulate from year to year. That plan had answered admirably; the system was developing and extending; and there was no person who had paid more attention to it, and who ought to be more satisfied with it than the Chancellor of the Exchequer himself. It had been beneficial to vast numbers of persons in the country, and Parliament might well assist such an object. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for India had said this proposal might be extended to every form of saving, but that had not hitherto been the principle on which Parliament had acted. The right hon. Gentleman's refusal amounted to this: that Parliament should not encourage thrift by any means. He was not sure that the principle was entirely sound; but, at all events, this was not a principle upon which legislation had hitherto proceeded. At present a larger amount of interest was being paid on Savings Bank deposits than the State could well afford, simply because it was considered that thrift should be encouraged, and no Chancellor of the Exchequer had ventured to diminish that rate of interest. Advantages were given to Friendly Societies of various kinds for making investments in the Post Office, and in many ways the principle was followed of encouraging thrift not by any great outlay of public money, but by favouring certain channels of thrift where greater security was given than in other directions. A proposal which would induce a number of persons in this country to invest in Consols and to hold Consols was one to obtain the advantages of which Parliament might well make some sacrifice. But the Chancellor of the Exchequer seemed to hold the principle that Parliament should not encourage thrift by any sacrifice. Thrift, therefore, was encouraged by favouring certain channels which seemed to offer encouragements to thrift. His hon. Friend had guarded this proposal by providing that the money invested could not be withdrawn. That would constitute a great difference between this and other kinds of savings. Under the present proposal the money invested could not be touched; while, of course, ordinary savings were available in any time of trouble or emergency. This proposal would be a great advantage to the widow and children of any man who availed himself of it. No new principle whatever would be involved in sanctioning the present proposal, for it already existed in the case of the Legacy Duty. The Government had been unable to bring forward any stronger argument against its acceptance than that of the Chancellor of the Exchequer as to the loss which he said the Revenue would suffer. The Secretary for India had asked why such a proposal as this had not been brought forward before. The reason was that no great measure connected with the Death Duties as a whole had previously been submitted to Parliament, otherwise clauses such as this would have been certain to be introduced. There was, he believed, a considerable feeling amongst the public that it would be wise to encourage both insurance and the accumulations suggested by his hon. Friend. In his opinion, however attractive this mode of investment might be, there would be nothing like the loss anticipated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It would not become by any means universal, and, even if it were, the arguments of his hon. Friend had shown that the Exchequer would not lose. If the payment were made out of income and not out of capital a considerable sum would be set apart for the purpose of paying this duty, and it ought not to be aggregated with the bulk of the property. He believed that the clause would tend to the encouragement of thrift, and should give it his support if the hon. and learned Member went to a Division.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he had no desire to prolong the Debate, but he had to make a suggestion in the way of a compromise that he thought might render a Division unnecessary. He wished to know whether the Government, if they could not relieve the property in question from the duty, could not see their way to except it from aggregation with the bulk of the property? If the Government would agree to except it from aggregation he should advise the hon. and learned Member not to go to a Division upon this proposal. Of course, if the Government did not see their way to accept the suggestion, hon. Members on that side of the House would feel bound to record their opinion on the subject; but he rather hoped that the compromise that he had suggested to the Government would meet with their favourable acceptance.

Mr. Goschen

SIR W. HARCOURT said, he was sorry he could not give a favourable answer to the right hon. Gentleman's suggestion, for he had very carefully considered the matter with the assistance of those most competent to advise him upon it, and the conclusion at which he had arrived was that it was impossible to treat this property differently from the way in which other property was treated. There was no sound financial reason for drawing any distinction between the two classes of property, and therefore he could not accept the proposal to exempt the property in question either from aggregation or from payment of duty.

MR. HEYWOOD JOHNSTONE (Sussex, Horsham) said, he would not detain the House a moment in pointing out to the Chancellor of the Exchequer why this portion of the "deceased man's property," as he called it, should be distinguished from the rest. The Death Duties differed from Income Tax in this case, because the property would represent accumulations during the lifetime of which the man would have no opportunity of making use. Why should not a prudent man, who wished to live within his income and considered he was sufficiently taxed, be able to provide a margin for the payment which would have to be made? If he had an opportunity in his lifetime of transferring the obligations which this greatly increased taxation would represent, was it reasonable or fair that the property which he had set aside year by year for the purpose of meeting that taxation should be subjected to aggregation and to payment of duty upon his death? A distinction should be made in the case of any fund put aside in a man's lifetime year by year, representing his unpaid taxation, and left to accumulate until his death, and that property clearly should be relieved from aggregation for the payment of Estate Duty.

Question put.

*MR. BYRNE (Essex, Walthamstow) moved the following clause:—

(Works of Art. Registration.)

"(1) A register or registers of works of art shall be kept by such person or persons, public body or bodies, Corporation or Corporations, as the Commissioners shall from time to time nominate for the purpose (herein referred to as the registration authority), and any person to whom a work of art passes upon the death of the deceased may (if such work of art shall not already be registered in the name of the deceased), upon compliance with such conditions as shall from time to time be prescribed by the registration authority, register in his name in the prescribed manner a description of such work of art, and the registration authority shall thereupon give such person a certificate of registration.

(2) If a work of art forming part of property passing on the death of a deceased person shall at the time of his death be registered in his name or shall within three months after his death, or such further period as the Commissioners shall allow, be registered in the name of the person to whom it passes upon such death, such work of art shall not be aggregated with the other property passing on the death of the deceased, nor shall Estate Duty be paid in respect thereof upon the death of the deceased.

(3) If a registered work of art passing upon the death of the deceased shall be sold before any further death shall occur upon which Estate Duty shall or would but for the provisions of this section become payable, duty shall be paid to the Commissioners upon the amount of the consideration passing on such sale.

(4) Upon payment to the Commissioners of the duty under the preceding sub-section the certificate of registration shall be delivered up to the Commissioners, who shall thereupon vacate the registration and give to the person paying the duty a receipt therefor.

(5) A certificate of registration and receipt for duty under this section shall be conclusive evidence of the facts therein respectively appearing.

(6) The Commissioners shall have power from time to time to make rules for the purpose of carrying the provisions of this section into effect.

(7) If a work of art forming part of property passing upon the death of the deceased shall not at the time of his death be registered in his name, or shall not within three months after his death, or such further period as the Commissioners shall allow, be registered in the name of the person to whom it passes upon such death, such work of art shall be aggregated with the other property passing on the death of the deceased and the value thereof ascertained in the manner in which the value of other personal property passing upon the death of a deceased person is ascertained under this Act.

(8) The expression 'works of art' shall include pictures, prints, books, manuscripts, antique plate and furniture, antiquities of national or historic interest, articles of vertu, and such collections thereof and such other objects or classes of objects as the Commissioners may from time to time prescribe to be within the meaning of this section."

With regard to any probable loss which might result to the Revenue, that could be guarded against by a subsequent clause. It was their duty, in the interest of the country, to keep these great works of art as much as possible in the country, and he believed this clause would have that effect. He hoped, therefore, that the clause would meet with the favourable consideration of the House. The hon. Gentleman said that this new clause followed the lines of the Amendment which he proposed in Committee. His proposal then was that a register should be established and kept by the Inland Revenue authorities, and the argument used against it was that this would be a very inconvenient duty to throw upon the Commissioners of Inland Revenue. Now, therefore, his suggestion was that the registers should be kept by such Public Bodies as might be nominated by the Inland Revenue authorities, his notion being that probably the Trustees of the National Gallery in the case of pictures, and the South Kensington Museum authorities in other cases, would gladly make themselves responsible. There was another alteration as between the proposal which he made in Committee and that which he now set before the House, which had reference to the registration fee and the payment of duty at the higher rate; but he was informed that in the terms he had set it down it would not be in Order. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer could accept his Amendment there was no reason why he should not in some other form attain its object by the introduction of another clause which should be at his own disposal. The effect of the Amendment which he (Mr. Byrne) proposed was that registers should be kept by the proper authorities, and that any persons desirous of registering works of art should, after compliance with the regulations, be exempt from payment of duty until sale took place, when he should be entitled to pay the duty out of the purchase money; and, further, that there should be no aggregation for the purposes of the Estate Duty. The arguments which he put before the Committee in introducing the Amendment were that it was to the interest of the people of this country that works of art should be kept in their midst, and that no temptation should be offered to their possessors to alienate them. That principle had been followed by other countries, and was regarded everywhere as a sound principle. Apart from that, the argument which he used in Committee he still maintained—that if the duty was so enormously increased upon non-productive properties the effect must necessarily be to injure the true interests of Art. People would not spend large sums of money on the productions of the best modern artists if they knew that, in addition to the expense of keeping them, and the uncertainty of and the fluctuation in their value, duty would have to be paid upon their death at a high rate, and that all their pictures would have to be aggregated with such other property as they might leave in order to ascertain what was the amount of duty payable on the whole. He might urge upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer the case of a man who might have in his possession pictures which apart from their value as works of art, he particularly valued because they were the portraits of his own ancestors. A man with £20,000 to leave might have a couple of pictures by Reynolds or Gainsborough which were of historical worth. It was possible that they might fetch on sale £11,000 a-piece. That man might be reduced to the direst poverty, but if he was a man of pride or of sentiment he would not part with pictures in which he had a sentimental interest. Then, supposing he had £20,000 to leave to his family, under the proposals of the Bill the value of these pictures would be aggregated with the rest of the estate, so that he must pay duty upon the £40,000 scale instead of the £20,000. This sentimental interest, whether derided or respected, existed all the same, and was closely bound up with the deepest feelings of a good many people in this country. It was, in fact, equivalent to that feeling which was treated with so much respect when it was called “land hunger” in Ireland. That feeling could not be eradicated from human nature; and he said it was a hard thing to make people pay upon pictures which had acquired a value independently of their worth as works of art simply because they represented the ancestors of the owners. He hoped the House would favourably consider this clause.

Mr. Byrne

Clause brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That the Clause be read a second time.”
—(Mr. Byrne.)

SIR W. HARCOURT said, it was a painful thing to be always saying “No,” but he thought the House understood that the new clauses really raised questions which had been discussed in Committee, and he hoped the Government would not be thought obdurate if they again declared that they could not accept these clauses. When they came to the Amendments to the Bill he hoped it would be found that the Government had endeavoured to carry out the promises they had given in Committee. With regard to the present proposal, he must repeat that it was impossible in a Bill of this character to meet every special case. They must act upon some principle, and, as the Leader of the Opposition had said, the test must be saleable value. To discriminate between particular kinds of property because they had a pretium affectionis was impossible in a Bill of this description, and had never been attempted in any legislation of this character before. He observed that the contention here was that registration would prevent works of art from leaving the country. That reminded him that when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Sleaford Division was supporting the Motion for the adjournment of the House over Derby Day he said that one good reason why the House of Commons should go to the Derby was that it would encourage the owners of English racehorses to keep them in England, instead of selling them to go abroad. That was an admirable argument in its way, but it was discounted by the fact that the horse which nearly won the Derby was sold the very next day to go abroad. [A cry of “No!”] Well, at all events, the result was that the second best horse in England was immediately sold to go abroad. If it suited the owner he would send them abroad. Consequently he had some scepticism about these specific remedies for preventing pictures going abroad. Neither was he prepared to say that the sale of pictures made them less valuable from a public point of view. On the contrary, he found that very few persons had ever seen some of the most famous pictures until they went to Christie's, and, on the whole, he imagined that the knowledge of pictures was not retarded, but was accelerated, by the sale and redistribution and re-arrangement of pictures which took place from time to time. No doubt a proportion of our works of art went abroad, but, on the whole, the balance of trade was in favour of England. The imports into England were much larger than the exports. The proposed clause relieved the Inland Revenue authorities from the duty of registration, but it left it to them to prescribe what were articles of vertu. He had never seen the word "vertu" in an Act of Parliament before, and he could find no definition of it in the Interpretation Act. Therefore, to ask the Commissioners to prescribe what were articles of vertu was to impose upon them a rather inappropriate task.

SIR R. WEBSTER (Isle of Wight) said, the right hon. Gentleman seemed to have overlooked the fact that if pictures were settled they escaped Probate Duty altogether, and that settlement was the course followed in the case where a picture was particularly valued. He must say he was surprised at the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer with regard to the exports and imports of pictures, for, speaking with some personal knowledge, he believed that for every good French picture that came to England 10 or 20 went to America.

SIR W. HARCOURT: What I said was that more pictures came into England than went out of England.

SIR R. WEBSTER: This matter was partly one of sentiment and partly one of national importance. The desirability of offering every reasonable inducement for keeping great pictures and works of art in the country was, in his opinion, a matter of national importance, and he certainly had hoped that a reasonable concession would have been made by the Government. The right hon. Gentleman asked how the Inland Revenue was to know whether the works of art existed or were sold. What was the protection at the present time?

Everybody knew that documentary evidence had to be sent to Somerset House, and that the possession of such property had to be disclosed. If they could rely upon the affidavit made by the responsible representative of the estate as fair and just at present, they could rely upon receiving information as to works of art being sold. The right hon. Gentleman was not entitled to assume that persons who did not make false statements about the possession of works of art would yet make false statements about those works having been sold. Rules have to be arranged, of course, in order to secure a proper return being made. He would point out that the fact that a register had to be kept would in a few years create self-acting machinery whereby the Inland Revenue would be able to know at once whether or not the works of art really did belong to the persons who had previously registered them. On every death occurring there would be a return made, so that the periods when the Government would be able to claim the duty would be the periods when there would be a change on the register. In this case they were dealing with a class of property which could not be turned into money and was not intended to be—property on which a man never could obtain a single sixpence. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer made light of this Amendment, which was founded upon a natural and just desire not to put on the market property which was worth more from the point of view of sentiment than from the point of view of market value. The proposal made was a reasonable one, and he trusted Her Majesty's Government would see their way to accept it.

*MR. QUILTER (Suffolk, Sudbury) said, he must express his keen disappointment at the unsympathetic tone which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had adopted. Here was an opportunity when the Government might have well given a helping hand to Art in this country at a time when that help was much needed. He feared that if the owners of pictures had this extra burden imposed upon them it would have the indirect effect of sending from this country a large number of pictures which we could ill afford to lose. He believed the Chancellor of the Exchequer was correct in stating that the balance of trade in respect of pictures was rather in favour of this country—that was to say, that more pictures entered England than left it; but if the right hon. Gentleman would consult those who were best able to give him information upon the matter, they would tell him that during the last 18 months or two years some of the most valuable examples of our older masters had been leaving the country in far larger proportion than at any time previously. We could not afford to part with the masterpieces of Gainsborough, Reynolds, and the other great masters who were dead. Moreover, he believed that every inducement ought to be held out to the getting together of large collections of pictures, because the nation was benefited by such collections, the people who owned them very frequently sending selections from them about the country for purposes of exhibition. In that manner many thousands of people were enabled to enjoy works of art which, if scattered about in various hands, would never be on exhibition at all. There was another objection to the course which the Government wished to take. At present, when a man left a large collection of works of art behind him, he frequently gave directions that they should be sold at a reasonable price, the idea being that it would be some temptation to those who had control of our great national or municipal collections to purchase them. He was aware that the question of sympathy with Art was not a very practical question connected with the discussion of pounds, shillings, and pence, but at the same time he thought articles of art and vertu ought to have been the very last selected for this extra impost. It must be remembered that those who acquired pictures for their own pleasure or for the pleasure of the public received nothing in the way of interest. He thought that this fact ought to be considered in determining the mode of imposing the new duty upon them. The Chancellor of the Exchequer seemed to think that it was as easy to value pictures as it was to value Stocks or shares. The case of the Adrian Hope collection recently sold proved that this was not so. The general opinion was that that collection would fetch at least £100,000, and he happened to know that the lowest valuation that was placed upon it by the most expert person who was called in to value it was £75,000. Well, after the sale had been puffed and advertised in an almost unexampled manner, the collection realised £47,000. This showed that even in the case of a collection on which the attention of so many men was riveted, it was impossible to arrive at a valuation which was anything like the real market value. This case was, of course, only one of thousands. He must protest in the name of the art-loving and art-collecting public against the want of sympathy with them which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had manifested in his treatment of this proposal.

MR. FREEMAN-MITFORD (Warwick, Stratford) said, he should like to say one word on behalf of the small collectors. If there was one thing that constituted a greater contrast than another between the small country houses of this country and the small country houses of other countries it was the fact that in almost every one of the former works of art were to be found that had been handed down from father to son. When works of art were in the houses of the people, they had, in the opinion of their owners, far greater value than when they were anywhere else. They became, as it were, an historical record of the various occupants who had held the property. Many of them were ancestral portraits of very great interest. He himself knew many small houses in his own neighbourhood in which there were works of art to which the owners attached the greatest value. These owners were not rich men, but were men upon whom the Legacy Duty would fall with exceptional hardship, and it was very doubtful whether, unless some Amendment were agreed to, they would be able to retain their works of art at all. He did think that the Chancellor of the Exchequer might take the cases of these people into consideration. They were at least as deserving of consideration as those rich people who had formed great collections, and they formed quite a distinctive feature of this country. There was another case which he ventured to submit to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It very often happened that a rich man wished to bequeath to a friend, who was perhaps in humble circumstances, some work of art in which that friend had possibly taken great delight as a memento of their friendship. The friend, if he were poor, would be unable to retain the work of art if he had to pay these enormous Death Duties upon it. It must be borne in mind that no actual value in money would accrue to the inheritor. He hoped that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would, even at the eleventh hour, grant some relaxation in this matter, as he might very well do without inflicting any great loss upon the Exchequer.

MR. WYNDHAM (Dover) said, he felt it was almost in vain to appeal further to the Chancellor of the Exchequer on this point, but he felt compelled to do so, not in the interest of any particular person, but in the interest of the English public, who were learning year by year to care more for beautiful things, and especially for pictures. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had almost admitted that his proposals would lead to a great number of sales of great collections of pictures, and had said that picture sales tended to educate the public. No doubt some sales had let the public know for the first time what treasures we possessed in this country, but in too many cases they found these treasures out only to lose them. Nobody seemed to know that there was in a private collection in this country a Dante illustrated by Botticelli until it was sold to the German Government. He did not think that the term "local museums" was an inappropriate one to apply to many of the great country houses in which many fine pictures were safely housed, and to which the public had access.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Will the hon. Gentleman allow me to point out that there is no provision in this clause that anybody should have access to any of these picture galleries? The clause would apply to places where nobody is allowed to see a single picture.

MR. WYNDHAM said, he thought that point might be easily met, and he ventured to say, from his own knowledge, that a large number of country houses where there were collections of pictures were open to the public. He believed that in London there were two collections to which it was difficult to obtain admission, but in the country collections were generally open on two or three days a week. In this country we were at the disadvantage of having no public local collections except in Manchester, Liverpool, Birmingham, and some other large towns. In France and Italy there were very few towns in which there were not to be found one or two public collections containing sometimes, perhaps, one or two masterpieces among the other pictures. The substitute in England for these collections was the collections in country houses. He thought it would be unjust and unwise to break up these collections. If they were nominally, as they were in effect, public collections, nobody would think of suggesting that the State should put a tax upon them with the result possibly of driving them from our shores. It must not be forgotten that there had been people who had lent important pictures to the National Gallery and to exhibitions at Bethnal Green for a long series of years. There was every reason to believe that such action would be repeated more and more in the future as the public appreciated works of art better. He thought that the rejection of this Amendment would strike a damaging blow at the development of the love of beauty which all had been glad to recognise in recent years amongst our countrymen.

*SIR F. S. POWELL (Wigan) did not agree with the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the sales of private collection of pictures would lead to such pictures being exhibited in places of public resort. The number of pictures added to the National Gallery each year was extremely limited, whilst the collections formed by Municipalities were the result of purchases of pictures very recently painted and which had come either from the studio of the painter or from some well-known picture dealer. As to picture sales having an educational value, he could not agree to any extent with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as the number of persons who went to view pictures that were for sale was very small indeed. It must also be borne in mind that sales of pictures would not add to the number of valuable loan collections that were to be seen every year. He himself desired to see the private collections of pictures retained in this country, and not to have them sent to the Continent, where too many of them had gone in recent years. It was, he thought, desirable to encourage people to keep their family pictures in their own hands. Some regard ought also to be shown for the artists themselves. There was no doubt that if pictures painted by British artists were retained in this country the artists would obtain larger commissions, and art would more greatly flourish here.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not propose to detain the Committee at any length on this Amendment, because I have already made more than one speech in defence of its principle, which, I confess, I think an extremely strong one. The Chancellor of the Exchequer dismissed in very brief terms the argument which he described as that of pretio affectionis. He has laid it down that there is really no principle on which the House should accept an Amendment of this kind. I think there is a principle, and that that principle is actually embodied in existing legislation. When you tax the pretio affectionis you impose a burden on an individual which you do not impose on other members of the community. The right hon. Gentleman has, I think, forgotten, when he defends what he calls his principle, that that principle has been already violated by our existing system of taxation. Plate and articles of furniture already in use are subjected under our existing law to the kind of system which my hon. and learned Friend wishes to adopt for works of art generally. This is under a clause of the Succession Duty Act. I do not see that in this case the distinction between probate and succession is material. In the argument I am using—namely, that it is unfair to put a tax on objects the money value of which is not realised—it is irrelevant to tell me that it is under the Succession Duty and not under the Probate Duty that the existing exemptions apply. I will not press this matter further;

Sir F. S. Powell

I will only say with regard to the subject of works of art going out of England that it seems to me quite inconceivable that if, as the result of this duty, some of our great collections are broken up, there would be in future a power of absorbing them within the four seas. I do not believe it; I think that some of them must overflow and go into foreign countries. That actually happened under the Hamilton sale, and you will have it happen far more in the future under the new condition of things introduced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, because as a result of the duty far more collections will be broken up and thrown en bloc on the market, and it will happen the more because fewer people will be prepared to buy and invest their money in a kind of private property which brings in no income during their lives, but which, in consequence of the Death Duties and aggregation, will impose very heavy burdens on their successors. For that reason the result of your taxation is, it must be, to bring to Christie's not merely the comparatively small collections that find their way there at present, but very large collections; and nothing will make me believe, in the present condition of things—when America is beginning to be a great competitor in this particular market with English capital—nothing will make me believe that when great collections are brought into the market, large slices of them cannot be absorbed by English wealth, and will not find a market elsewhere, and probably one that will prevent them ever returning to the shores of a country which has shown itself so ill-qualified to appreciate the great treasures which it already possesses. I believe that in this matter, if only we consult the general sentiment of the outside public, we should carry this Amendment, or something like it, by an overwhelming majority. This is not a question in which the rich are concerned so much as the poor, and I believe that if the Members who claim to be the representatives and special exponents of certain sections of working-class opinion were here, they would back me up when I say that they and those who returned them to this House feel as strongly as any other section of the community how great a power in the public national culture these works in the hands of private individuals are, and who would deplore any measure which would drive them out of the country, with a depth of conviction not to be surpassed by any section who have spoken in favour of this Amendment. The right hon. Gentleman is never happy, apparently, unless he can find some excuse for accepting an Amendment that squares with what he calls the principles of his Bill. There are two broad principles I would beg him to remember. One is justice to the individual, and the other expediency to the community, and if we can show, as we have shown abundantly, this removes an injustice to the individual, and that its adoption will confer a great benefit upon the community at large, we do not consider ourselves required to grub about among these clauses to find any principle to justify the proposal now pressed upon the House. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer has made up his mind, I do not imagine it is worth while for us to expend any more of our powers of persuasion upon his obdurate heart, but we have felt ourselves bound to give him this one last chance of carrying out the policy which I am sure he sympathises with in his heart, and if he will not accept the Amendment in the place of penitence, there is nothing more we can do in the matter. Certainly, we should not be doing our duty, either to the individual owner of pictures, or, what is more important, to the art-loving public, had we not endeavoured, to the best of our ability, to induce the right hon. Gentleman to accept an Amendment which would not injure the Exchequer, and which would greatly benefit the public.

Question put.

The House divided :—Ayes 86 ; Noes 123.—(Division List, No. 161.)

*MR. SPEAKER: The next clause standing in the name of the hon. Member for North Islington (Mr. Bartley) would more appropriately come as an Amendment to Clause 33.

SIR R. WEBSTER moved the following clause :—

(Works of art exemption from duty.)

"(1) If any works of art are settled as heirlooms any person interested under the settlement may register the settlement with the Commissioners, and during the continuance thereof the duties payable under this Act shall not be levied in respect of the works of art thereby settled.

(2) If any work of art settled by a settlement registered under this section shall be sold during the continuance of the settlement, duty shall be paid on the amount of the consideration passing on such sale.

(3) If upon the determination of any settlement whereby works of art are settled, such works of art are not immediately thereupon resettled, and the settlement registered under this section, duty shall be paid on the value of such works of art.

(4) The expression "works of art" shall include pictures, prints, antique plate and furniture, antiquities of national or historic interest, articles of vertu, and such other objects or classes of objects as the Commissioners may from time to time prescribe to be works of art within the meaning of this section."

He said that this clause was much narrower in scope than the previous one. The House rejected the last Amendment on the ground that inasmuch as these articles and pictures of the character to which it referred were now subject to Probate Duty it was not right there should be any exemption in their favour. But the class of property which the present clause related to had never been subject to duty. Heirlooms were not subject to duty, therefore the objection taken by the Chancellor of the Exchequer that they were seeking to exempt from Probate Duty property which was now subject to that duty did not apply to the present Amendment. Heirlooms were only heirlooms when they were settled, and in respect to which the owner for the time being could derive no benefit.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

SIR R. WEBSTER said, that with regard to the class of property to which his clause related, no realisation could possibly take place, and no enjoyment, in the sense of pecuniary advantage, could possibly be derived. On the contrary, the clause was limited strictly and solely to that property settled as heirlooms, and which must be registered as heirlooms before they could be exempted. He would further point out that if such heirlooms were sold during the continuance of the settlement duty was to be paid on the value realised by the sale, and if there was not an immediate re-settlement, but the settlement itself came to an end, duty was to be paid on the valuable works of art which were not re-settled. There was one class of national property which had not yet received sufficient attention. He referred to ancient documents. It was within his knowledge that there were in possession of private owners most valuable historic documents, which were, in fact, invaluable for the purposes of national history, which could be turned into money and which would produce large sums if not protected from sale. He would point out that his Amendment provided that articles only should be exempt which were such as the Commissioners should from time to time prescribe to be works of art within the meaning of the section. This was a class of property which, at the present time, was not liable to duty at all, therefore, the Bill proposed a fresh tax, and the Amendment was in the interest not only of private individuals, but of the community at large, and was only restoring to that class of property known as heirlooms the exemption they now possessed from being liable to probate or its analogue, the Estate Duty. It was a class of property which the Chancellor of the Exchequer might exempt without outraging his conscience or sense of public duty. He was not asked to exempt or favour in this respect anything which would at the present time be liable to duty; but he was asked to provide simply as a matter of strict justice, that property which was settled and which could not be turned into money should be exempted from the duty which was imposed by this Bill. The clause contained ample safeguards. It was only to be applicable in respect of settled heirlooms which were registered as settled heirlooms, and if sold and turned into money the person who sold them was to be accountable for the duty. He hoped in the interests of justice and fair play that this concession, which affected a very limited class of important national property, would be granted by the Government.

Clause brought up, and read the first time.

Sir R. Webster

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

MR. R. T. REID said, the question of policy involved in this new clause seemed to be precisely the same in principle as that which was discussed in the previous Amendment, and this question was really decided by the previous clause which had been discussed.

SIR R. WEBSTER: The previous clause did not refer to settled works of art.

MR. R. T. REID thought there was a distinction in the consideration whether articles were settled or not; but when they remembered the argument in favour of exemption for works of art was based upon the importance of keeping them in this country and encouraging art generally, and so forth, he did not think the fact that they were settled made any difference. He hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman would not think it disrespectful if he did not repeat the arguments which had been already used and fully discussed. Under the circumstances, he could only say he was very sorry it was not in the power of the Government to accept the Amendment.

*MR. BYRNE said, there was a clear distinction between this and the previous clause. The previous clause was broad and general in its terms, and, as they thought, just, but at the same time it was open to certain objections which could not be urged to the present clause. For instance, it related to all these matters, whether settled or unsettled, and their arguments in favour of it were based on grounds which might also be urged in favour of this clause. But there were certain arguments in favour of this which could not be used in favour of the last clause. Prior to this Bill there was no Probate Duty levied on settled works of art such as were referred to in the present Amendment. If they put things of that kind under settlement the owner could not turn them into money; he would be unable to sell them in the market at the best price they would fetch, and surely that was a good argument why they should not be taxed. That principle was recognised by the Legislature in the Settled Land Act, which put heirlooms on the same footing as a mansion house. A man could not sell heirlooms as he could sell other property without making out an imperative case for the sale; and the Court, in considering whether it should order or allow the sale of heirlooms, or mansion houses, must take into consideration not merely the interest of those claiming under the settlement, but the interest of those who come after them; and also that sentimental view of preserving the heirlooms in the family. He knew that an equivalent to Probate Duty and Legacy Duty was at present levied on pictures, works of art, and manuscripts; but the law had always recognised that those things might be under settlement, and he hoped the law would always so recognise it, for otherwise things of great national and historical value would be dispersed, and perhaps sent out of the country altogether. If historical treasures had not been exempt from taxation under settlement, they should not be drawing, as they were now, valuable information from collections of historical manuscripts which had been preserved for generations in the old houses of the country. But under this Bill, if not amended in the direction proposed, the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, or those whose duty it was to assess the value of property for the purposes of the Estate Duty, would insist on a thorough search of old boxes in the mansions of the country to see whether they contained historical manuscripts or rare pictures; and it was certain that the result of such a policy would be to destroy or disperse those treasures. It was in consequence of the existing law, which tended to preserve old manuscripts as heirlooms, that fresh light was being constantly thrown on the history of the country in the past through the agency of those old manuscripts, by the historical writers of the day. For the first time they were imposing a tax which would prevent these collections being made and preserved as they had been in former times; which would render it difficult to keep these valuable historical properties in the country, and thereby destroy for the future all prospect of having further light thrown on the history of the country. The Government had not paid due regard to the subject-matter of taxation, in imposing equal taxation, in respect to amount, on a thousand sovereigns, or a picture worth in the market a thousand pounds, or on a small estate worth a thousand pounds which could not be sold. It was not enough to support such action by the argument that they were really equalising taxation. There should be exceptions, and now, at least, they had got to a subject-matter in which it was to the public interest that an exception should be made. Men would not accumulate these properties if they were, by being included in aggregation, to augment the duty to be levied upon an estate. He believed the Government had not fully and fairly considered this subject. Hitherto it had always been considered that there was something more to regard than merely how much money they were to get by taxation. The Government ought to have some regard to the subject-matter of taxation. It was not enough for them to say, "We want so much money." They might levy what they required upon other properties if they would spare objects the dispersal of which would do violence to the national sentiment. We had been called a nation of shopkeepers, and he was afraid that under the new development of legislation, as exemplified in this Bill, we would deserve the epithet far more in the future than in the past. He was not one of those who said that in legislation they should be led away by mere sentiment; but, all the same, he believed that if they disregarded national sentiment in taxation they would be neglecting one of the highest duties of the Government of the country.

*MR. T. H. BOLTON said, he was surprised the Government did not accept the clause, because it seemed to him to be in complete harmony with the professed policy of the Government. The Government were always professing that the object of their legislation was to confer on the people opportunities of improving their condition materially and artistically. He could understand the desire of the Government to break up estates and to destroy the continuance of families associated with the possession of land. But he could not understand this policy of embarrassing the preservation of articles which encouraged the cultivation of artistic tastes in the people. There were a large number of collections of pictures and works of art in mansions in various parts of the country, which for all practical purposes were as much open to the people as if they were housed in our public museums. The owners of those great country houses had generously placed their art collections at the disposal of the people, and there was no more difficulty in seeing them than there was in seeing the art collections in the various public museums of the land.

MR. SPEAKER : I do not think the remarks of the hon. Gentleman are relevant to this particular clause. The hon. Gentleman is speaking to the clause which has just been rejected by the House, and not to this question, which deals with the question of heirlooms.

MR. T. H. BOLTON said, his point was that the clause tended to the preservation of heirlooms in families, and that therefore if it were adopted the people would have the same opportunity of enjoying the art collections of the great country houses in the future as they had in the past. The policy which encouraged the preservation in the country as family heirlooms of collections of art treasures was a good policy ; but it was a very bad and a very foolish policy to do anything which tended to the dispersal of those works of art amongst dealers and speculators. If the owners were willing to register those art collections they would be placed under an obligation to the public with regard to their preservation ; and such a course would be in accordance with the very best desires of all those who wished to see those works of art made available for the cultivation of the artistic tastes of the people. Those works of art could not produce any actual income for the owners, and the benefit of them was, as he had pointed out, enjoyed by a large number of people who visited the great country houses for the purpose of seeing them. The proposal in the clause ought to commend itself especially to the present Government, considering the great professions they made of their desire to elevate the condition of the people ; and he urged them, therefore, not to reject it.

GENERAL GOLDSWORTHY (Hammersmith) thought that at least family portraits and manuscripts might be exempted from taxation under the Bill. If some such clause as this was not adopted they might find some of the historical families obliged to sell their family pictures, which were national pictures, to satisfy the demands of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He knew from personal knowledge that the Bill would impose heavy financial obligations on owners of property ; and he was greatly afraid, indeed, that if those art collections were not exempted from taxation as heirlooms, they would be dispersed by sale, and probably lost for ever to the country.

SIR R. TEMPLE (Kingston, Surrey) said, he rose to support, in a few words, the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend and leader. He ventured to do so, because art was one of the subjects with which he had rather close relations. The Solicitor General asked why they pressed this Amendment. They pressed it because they were afraid those precious heirlooms would under the Bill be sold and sent away in order that the Death Duties might not be paid upon them. It might be said that the Amendment applied only to settled works of art, and that they were not so easily sold as unsettled works of art. But they really believed that even settled works of art would be sold if the owner was unable to pay the Death Duties accruing upon them. There might be difficulties in the way of selling those works of art ; but they believed that if they were not protected in the way proposed in the Amendment, the powers of some Court would be brought into play, and that those works of art would be sold even though being settled. There could be no doubt that no difficulty would arise as to the definition of a work of art under the clause, for if the Solicitor General would look at the last lines of the clause he would find that the Commissioners of Inland Revenue were to be the judges. The hon. and learned Gentleman might say that the Commissioners of Inland Revenue were not qualified to judge in such a matter; but he understood that in regard to levying Probate Duty they were already constituted judges of the value of works of art and of what was the character of works of art. He would give the House a concrete case of the working of the Bill if the clause were not accepted. It was his own case, and possibly it was of some interest. It happened that he was the possessor of a collection of manuscripts which might be of extraordinary value. They contained the signatures of every King and Queen; of every Minister, and of almost every celebrated person of this country for 1,300 years down at least to 50 years ago. He trembled to think what this collection of manuscripts would be valued at by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue when it came to be dealt with for the purposes of Estate Duty after his death. His ancestors had spent a great deal of money on the collection. They had not only collected the manuscripts themselves, which were of great historical value, but they took enormous trouble to have verified in writing the genuineness of the manuscripts, and the history of how they were obtained and of the various hands through which they had passed. He had taken the precaution, with the assistance of his legal advisers, to prevent alienation after his death, so that the collection would come within the term "settled property" under the Act. It seemed to him to be very unjust that the Commissioners of Inland Revenue should place a valuation upon property of that kind, and have it heavily taxed. It might be said that Probate Duty had to be paid upon the collection in the past, and that no complaint of that duty had ever been made. But in those good old days Probate Duty was limited in its percentage, and so equitably administered that none of them felt it, and, therefore, never complained of it; but it became a different matter when his valuable historical manuscripts came to be brought together with his land, cottages, Stocks, shares, Consols, and things of that kind, and not only aggregated, but possibly graduated. In fact, this manuscript collection might possibly raise his estate from one grade into another, and therefore impose a higher charge on the estate, although his successor could get no financial benefit from the collection, as he would be unable to sell it. Examples of this kind might be infinitely multiplied. He maintained that it was not to the best interests of the culture of England that these articles of priceless interest should be denied to coming generations.

*MR. BUTCHER said, the Government must indeed have a heart of stone if it could resist the appeal of the hon. Baronet. He had thought, whilst the hon. Baronet was speaking, that the stony heart was melting, and that at a later period they would have some practical proof of the fact. It was only to works of art, manuscripts, &c., settled as heirlooms that this clause would apply — a very limited and special class of property, which at present paid nothing in the character of Probate Duty, and at the utmost was, as a rule, liable to pay 1 per cent. Succession Duty. The difference between the 1 per cent. now payable and the 4 or 5 and up to 8 per cent. which would be chargeable in future was, he ventured to think, a very serious matter, and one which the House should long consider before it adopted the scheme of the Government. He was glad to see the Solicitor General in his place, for he, no doubt, would remember the speech of Pericles, which would be familiar to all their minds. Pericles had told an Athenian audience that they cultivated a love of art with a due regard for economy. The Chancellor of the Exchequer cultivated it with a most undue regard for economy, because he found that the right hon. Gentleman economised his love of art when it became a question whether he should support the interests of art or endeavour to get a little more money for a particular year. The right hon. Gentleman invariably allowed the interests of art to fall into the background. He (Mr. Butcher) thought the time had come when, remodelling the Death Duties, and entering on what he might call a new stage of arrangement with regard to Death Duties, they might look on this matter from a somewhat broader point of view. Surely they should reconsider their position as to whether this non-income-bearing property should be treated as liable to the payment of Estate Duty. It was not unreasonable to ask that when they were putting the Death Duties on a new basis they should rise a little above the considerations of the money required for the year, and ask on what broad considerations of policy they must base their Death Duties in their remodelled state. As regarded these works of art and historical collections, they were in a unique position. They were non-income-bearing. No one suggested that they were used for bringing in a pecuniary advantage to their possessors. But they had this peculiar characteristic: that while they were thus non-income-bearing, they fulfilled an essential educational purpose, not only in relation to the individual who possessed them, but as regarded the far wider outside public. He believed that fully 99 per cent. of the great collections throughout the length and breadth of the Kingdom were open to the public, and no step should be hastily taken by the House that would even indirectly tend to lessen them, nor could any gain to the Exchequer in any way make up for their loss to the nation. He maintained that if from fear of having to pay this excessive duty owners felt compelled to get rid of their collections, hon. Members would be inflicting, by allowing this clause to pass, an irreparable injury on the public, who had enjoyed the privilege of inspecting the greater number of these private collections for so many years past. The interests of private individuals were well worthy of consideration, but he put it from the point of view of the public when he said that a great injury might be inflicted on them by insisting on the proposed duty.

MR. BARTLEY said, there was one phase of this subject which had not been considered, and that was that the Amendment did not only apply to large collections of works of art and objects of interest. There were people in humble circumstances who possessed objects which were now of great value, but which were not valuable at the time they were made heirlooms. He referred to letters, MSS., and portraits. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he was sure, knew of many collections of the kind in the country which were now worth a great deal, but which at the time they were first acquired by an ancestor of the present owner were of small value. He had in his mind's eye a collection he had seen in Oxfordshire in which there were some wonderful pictures, which were now worth thousands of pounds, but which when they were first constituted heirlooms were of small worth, having been purchased at small prices in those days. These heirlooms became of great value by reason of the fact that other persons desired to possess them. It seemed to him to be particularly hard that the different possessors of the family portraits, for instance, should from time to time be called upon to pay a heavy duty for the privilege of owning them for their lives. It was not the fault of these owners that other persons desired to possess their heirlooms. There was a high way of looking at this question. It was a great thing to foster an interest in all that connected the present generation with those who had gone before and who, not only amongst the great and wealthy but in the humbler ranks, had helped to make England what she was, and he greatly regretted that the Chancellor of the Exchequer seemed willing to sacrifice even the traditions of the past to secure a few more pounds to meet the exigencies of the present. Let the right hon. Gentleman sacrifice the small amount he would gain in the form of duty on these heirlooms if it was only for the sake of the education of the present generation; and, if necessary, in making the exemption, let him lay down the condition that the large collections should be open to the inspection of the public on certain days. Small collections, of course, could not be dealt with in this way. There were many persons who could only point, perhaps, to a testimonial that had been given to one of their ancestors, and yet the knowledge of that man's noble deed may have spurred others on to risk their lives for their fellow-creatures' good. He himself possessed a small silver cup, of artistic shape, that had been presented to one of his ancestors some hundred and fifty years ago for first raising buck-wheat in this country. In those days that was considered a great thing to do. He did not know what buck-wheat was, not being an agriculturist, but in his humble sphere he valued the cup very highly and desired to retain possession of it. And the sentiment that animated him in this matter was, he was sure, pretty general throughout the country. He feared that if the exemption from duty were not allowed in the case of heirlooms and works of art, the result would be that persons would be disposed to get rid of them. He, therefore, strongly supported the present Amendment, which he hoped would be accepted.

SIR W. HARCOURT said, he would make an appeal to the House. This was an interesting subject, but the House had discussed it over and over again both in Committee and on various Amendments. He regretted that the view taken by the Government was different from that of hon. Members opposite, but it evidently was different. They could not undertake to deal with taxation, which had for its object equalisation, on the principles laid down by the hon. Member. He hoped that the heirloom possessed by the hon. Member as the result of the cultivation of buck-wheat, which was the best possible food for poultry, would long remain in the family. One point in connection with this subject was worthy of note. All the plans that had been proposed had this effect: As long as a man was rich enough to keep these heirlooms he would escape, but the moment circumstances became such that the articles had to be sold, then his relief would be granted from the payment of duty. A more unsound principle could not be conceived.

MR. GOSCHEN said, he thought the right hon. Gentleman was most unfair to the Amendment. The right hon. Gentleman said that the effect of the Amendment would be to provide that where persons were too poor to keep their heirlooms they would not escape duty. If the heirlooms were sold then they would pay duty, but why were persons to be fined if they retained and did not sell their heirlooms and had no enjoyment of them? The right hon. Gentleman said there was the pleasure of retaining them to be considered. The right hon. Gentleman could not have read the Amendment, because the whole force of it lay in the fact that heirlooms were settled property and could not be sold.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: Unless with the consent of the Court.

MR. GOSCHEN: Yes, unless with the consent of the Court. That was in cases where the possessors were driven absolutely to a sale. Hon. Members opposite appeared to rejoice that heirlooms should come into the market, and in this view they were opposed to the feeling which prevailed on his own side of the House that the heirlooms should be retained in the family. It seemed as if the Chancellor of the Exchequer thought that the best use to which heirlooms, manuscripts, and pictures could be put was to send them to Christie's. On this question, so far as sentiment was concerned, there was a distinct issue between the two sides of the House. He was surprised that the right hon. Gentleman, who had become more democratic than the democrats themselves—like the aristocrats who joined the French Revolution—should have shaken off every possible sentiment that heirlooms and pictures belonging to a family should remain in that family. He could not think that the view the right hon. Gentleman had expressed was his real and intimate and personal view. Hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite could not wish that it should be made impossible or difficult to possess old manuscripts and pictures—and it must be borne in mind that these things were not exclusively in the hands of the rich. They were sometimes possessed by families who would be ill able from generation to generation to pay duty upon them. Heirlooms should be preserved to the families to which they belonged, but the Chancellor of the Exchequer seemed anxious to treat them in a way that would drive them to the hammer. It was not correct, as the right hon. Gentleman had said, that this subject had been discussed over and over again. What had been discussed was the question as to works of art generally—works of art which did not yield an income. The subject they were now considering was as to settled heirlooms—heirlooms that could not be sold or that could only be sold by going to the Court—and he did not suppose that the Secretary of State for India really desired them to go there. The Chancellor of the Exchequer might fairly have given way, looking at the small number of treasures which were involved. He would remind the right hon. Gentleman that they did not pay Probate Duty, and the concession of this small point would assist the middle classes even more than the rich, while it would satisfy a sentiment prevalent among many classes of the community.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, that he had been unable to support some of the Amendments bearing upon works of art, but this he could support with a clear conscience. This exemption was contained in the Legacy Duty Act. Plate, furniture, and so on, were exempt so long as they were enjoyed in kind; that was to say, when the possessor was unable to dispose of them. He admitted that when money was obtained for works of art it was reasonable that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should receive duty. He feared, however, that the effect of this Bill would be to impose such a charge on a picture, for example—a charge which might amount to £190 on a picture worth £1,000 if left to a man by a millionaire—that a relatively poor man would scarcely be able to raise sufficient money to pay the duty. He would thus be driven to sell the picture. There were details in the Amendment—as to registration, for example—which might be improved, but undoubtedly the principle of the proposal was a good one. If a man had, say, a picture which he had inherited he would not like to be driven to sell it for a few hundreds of pounds to persons who might wish to represent themselves as descendants of the Crusaders. One might be a poor man and a descendant of the Crusaders, and he might not desire to sell the picture of his ancestor to, say, an alkali manufacturer who might wish to represent himself as one of the “de Brunnens” who came over with the Conqueror. No doubt the moment an heirloom was sold it was right for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to have his tax.

Question put.

The House divided :—Ayes 95 ; Noes 143.—(Division List, No. 162.)

*MR. BYRNE said, the next new clause he wished to propose was one regarding policies of insurance for the payment of the new duties, and it might say something for his sanguineness of temperament when he suggested that he hoped—and hope sprang eternal in the human breast—he would be able to induce the Government to accept his proposal. His proposition was that if any person desired to provide during his lifetime for the payment of the Death Duties he might effect a special and specific policy to be called the Estate Duty policy, the proceeds on his death to be applied to the payment of the duties and his executor to have no control over the money until after the duties had been paid. This clause, he suggested, was not open to the objection made to a former proposal in regard to providing for Death Duties, for whereas the former proposal was conceived in the interests of the aged and infirm and such persons who were not likely to be able to effect an insurance on reasonable terms, the present scheme was applicable to the provident young and healthy, and, indeed, to every person, whether a millionaire or a poor man, who effected such an insurance as was here contemplated and who paid the premium regularly. Under this scheme a man would be creating during his life, by means of saving out of his income, a capital fund which would never have existed but for this means of providing for payment of duties after his death. The State would gain by the convenience and simplification which would be insured in the payment of the duty, and would not have to look to the man's estate or representative at all, as the money would be paid over by the Insurance Company direct to the Exchequer. He asked the Leader of the House to consider this proposal, not with benevolence, but by reason of its freedom from the economic objections which attached to the earlier proposal. This was not a question of amount, and the adoption of the plan would not involve any loss to the Exchequer.

New Clause—

(Insurances for Estate and Settlement Duty.)

"1. Any person desiring to provide against the duties which may become payable under this Act, in respect of property passing on his death, may effect for that purpose a policy of assurance (to be called an 'Estate Duty Policy') upon his life.

"2. Any moneys payable upon the death of a person, under an Estate Duty Policy effected by him, shall be applied by the company or office with whom such policy is effected in payment, in the first instance, of the duties payable under this Act, in respect of so much of the property passing on the death of such person, as he shall by writing under his hand direct, and the balance, if any, of such moneys shall be paid to the executor of such person, and Estate Duty shall be levied thereon at the proper graduated rate.

"3. Save as hereinbefore provided, Estate Duty shall not be paid in respect of any moneys payable under an Estate Duty Policy."

Clause brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

SIR W. HARCOURT said, he really thought he would be imposing on the patience of the House if he were, for the tenth time he believed, to give the reasons why the Government could not accept Amendments of this kind. Figures or words might, by means of permutations and combinations, be presented in a number of ways. This was only a variation of the question which the Committee and the House had dealt with so often, with this difference, that in the former cases there was, at least, the pretence of appropriating the fund for the payment of the duty, whereas here the person creating the fund might appoint only a small portion of the fund to the Exchequer. Moreover, it would not be necessary that the fund should be created out of income, but might be made the means of evading payment of duty on part of the capital. He had so often wearied the House by answering Amendments of this kind that he would not trespass further upon their time. He would simply say that the same reasons which he had urged before prevailed also in the case of the present Amendment.

SIR R. WEBSTER said, he could not help reminding the Chancellor of the Exchequer that last night, when an Amendment of a much wider character was under discussion, the right hon. Gentleman was asked whether this Amendment would not meet the objection he was then urging, and if pressure of work had not prevented him examining more closely this Amendment he would not have made the slip in his argument he had just made in suggesting that only part of the proceeds of the policy might go to the payment of the Death Duties, and the rest would escape duty altogether. The clause clearly provided that any balance should be aggregated with the general estate, and, therefore, it would not escape payment of duty. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said last night that it would be a most desirable thing if there were some means of securing to the Exchequer the ready payment of the duty—that he would be glad to assist any scheme whereby the Exchequer would have a fund of ready money to their hand from which the payment of the duty could be obtained. The whole point in his observation, therefore, was that it would be desirable that persons should be induced to make a permanent or a temporary sacrifice with this purpose in view, and in this clause a practicable scheme for the purpose was submitted. The right hon. Gentleman had suggested that the policy might be paid up in one premium, and he had spoken of permutations and combinations, but he was much too good a mathematician not to know that even if a policy were paid in a single premium instead of by annual instalments the person who paid lost the interest on the lump sum, and the Insurance Company got the benefit of it. It, therefore, amounted to a charge on the man's income. He contended that if the Government desired to make the Exchequer safe and to be fair in this matter, they ought to support this proposal, whereby a scheme had been devised so that a person could fairly and legitimately secure his estate against the incidence of the duty, and at the same time ensure ready payment of the duty to the State on his death. He really could not understand the position now taken up by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in objecting to the clause, especially after having invited hon. Members on that side of the House to devise such a scheme as had now been presented—a scheme which, while it made the Treasury safe, encouraged persons to provide in their lifetime for the payment of the Death Duties.

MR. BARTLEY (referring to the cries of "Divide" with which he was received) said, it was only reasonable he should be allowed to say a few words on that question. They on the Opposition side of the House had been trying in every possible way to make the Budget Bill a means of promoting thrift among all classes of the community, but they had been met by every possible objection. He could not agree with the right hon. Gentleman that that was the worst possible form in which to attempt it. The present proposal was a plan by which a direct inducement might be given to a man to provide for the Estate Duties during his life—a wise and proper thing to do—and it was based on the principle that the State would have a ready means of obtaining the money when it became due. He was the more strongly in favour of the proposal because the onus of paying the duties, which had been described as arrears of taxes, would then fall on persons during their lives, and would not be thrown upon their successors at a time of difficulty and trouble, and possibly of great reduction of income. He had always held that that was the right principle to go upon. It seemed very strange to him that at a time when every effort was being made to encourage, by means of Savings Banks, thrift among all classes, the Government should oppose and reject such an admirable and practical system for promoting economy as this clause devised, and for promoting it to the direct advantage of the State. This system would even do more than encourage the making of provision for the Death Duties during lifetime; it would, he believed, induce property owners to systematically provide for jointures and other estate burdens out of income instead of saddling the estate itself, for one great mischief in connection with landed estates was the practice of relegating till after death the making of provision for charges which could be met during lifetime. By this proposal a direct inducement would be offered to people to provide during their lifetime for the payment of the Estate Duties, and it would also afford the State a ready means of obtaining payment when they fell due. In that way the Exchequer would obtain payment at once without waiting, and it seemed extraordinary that the right hon. Gentleman should refuse every proposal for an arrangement of this sort. The Chancellor of the Exchequer hardly seemed to realise the position he was in in regard to this matter, and appeared quite unable to see the difficulty that would follow. The fact was, he seemed to be very ill-advised; but if he would go into the matter himself, he would see the advisability of accepting some such Amendment as that proposed by his hon. Friend.

MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby) thought he had reason to complain of having been entirely misled. When he withdrew his Amendment on Monday he certainly understood, though the Chancellor of the Exchequer told him not to expect too much, that favourable consideration would be given by the Government to the arguments adduced in support of the Amendment now before the House. Two arguments had been brought forward by the right hon. Gentleman, one that he was going to lose half-a-million of money by this proposal—which was an entire misapprehension; the other that upon an estate worth £25,000 the duty would in future only be levied on £24,000—which was absolutely absurd. To illustrate that he would take the case of an estate worth £96,000, the duty on which an insurance had been effected to meet. That insurance would be £5,200 or £5,300, which would bring the property to over £100,000 on which payment would have to be made upon an increased scale, simply because the man had been thrifty enough to insure his life to meet the Estate Duty. That would act as a penalty upon thrift. If a man chose during his life to lay by sufficient money to meet the Estate Duty, he did not say it should go altogether free, but it should certainly not be brought in in a way that would penalise the man for his thrift. It was absurd to say that the State would lose if this Amendment were agreed to; for if a clause of this kind was not inserted in the Bill, there would be no insurances effected for the purpose of paying Estate Duty. No one would be foolish enough to waste his own money in accumulating a capital sum to meet the Estate Duty if he knew that, in addition to losing that money in his lifetime, he was going to penalise his estate with an amount which the residuary legatee would have to pay. The Exchequer would gain nothing in consequence of the refusal of the Government to accept the Amendment.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have heard the brief speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer upon this Amendment with great surprise. He spoke of permutations and combinations, and said that we were bringing forward the same subject over and over again and repeating the same speeches with no substantial difference on each occasion. May I recall to the right hon. Gentleman's mind what took place last night with regard to this very Amendment? My right hon. Friend who has just sat down brought forward an Amendment upon this subject, but it was wide in its terms and less carefully guarded, and therefore naturally less qualified to command the approval of the Government. The Chancellor of the Exchequer on that Amendment explained to the House that if the object of such an Amendment was to make it easier for the Exchequer to get the Estate Duty to which the State was entitled on the death of the testator, the proposal was one which might be considered favourably, and when the right hon. Gentleman's attention was called pointedly by the hon. Member for Liverpool to the Amendment which we are now discussing he promised it some kind of favourable consideration. On the strength of that promise my right hon. Friend the Member for Bodmin (Mr. Courtney) asked my right hon. Friend who has just sat down (Mr. Heneage) to withdraw his Amendment. That happened only 24 hours ago, and now the Chancellor of the Exchequer gets up and contents himself with using some mathematical gibe about permutations and combinations. He does not argue the question, and he does not give the Amendment that favourable consideration which he had promised to extend to it. The Chancellor of the Exchequer is indifferent to any arguments founded upon personal hardships; he is indifferent to any arguments based upon public expediency which, in our judgment at all events, demands that measures should be adopted which encourage the accumulation of capital; but there is one argument which, I think, may reach the soft spot in the financial heart of the right hon. Gentleman, and that is an argument based upon the interests of the Treasury over which he presides. The slightest inquiry will prove that a very large number of the members of that very limited wealthy class from whom the right hon. Gentleman expects to derive the greater part of the financial benefit which he seeks are taking steps not to evade the measure in any fraudulent way, but to escape the incidence of the duty by transferring their property at this moment to their heirs. That is a course which may be right or wrong. I do not imagine that anyone can call it wrong; at all events, it has, I believe, received the high sanction of some authorities below the Gangway on the Ministerial side of the House. But whether right or wrong, it is evidently a process most adverse to the interests of the Treasury; whether it is advantageous to the public or not, the Treasury will be sure to suffer. One effect of this Budget has been to call public attention to the incidence of the Death Duties. The public have discovered that those duties are being augmented, and they have realised that the milch cow from which the Chancellor of the Exchequer intends to derive the sustenance for the Treasury consists of a very limited class. About 200 persons in a year will contribute the whole of the increased duty which the right hon. Gentleman expects to get. If these persons set to work to evade the duty by means legitimate which are defensible, or illegitimate which are indefensible, but which in either case will militate against the interests of the Budget, the Chancellor of the Exchequer and his successors will find that they will not get out of this tax nearly the amount of money which is anticipated. I am sure the right hon. Gentleman will see that I am speaking entirely in the interests of the Exchequer in saying that the difficulty is to be met by making it easier for those who have to pay the tax to devote their money to a purpose by which it will go to the Exchequer rather than by adopting a course which will deprive the Exchequer of that money. If this Amendment be passed it will be the interest of persons to insure against the Estate Duty, and if they do the amount for which they insure will pass, whether they like it or not, to the Chancellor of the Exchequer on their decease. If you offer them no inducement to give the Exchequer this security for the payment of the tax the result will be they will consider how the tax is to be evaded, and they may possibly resort to expedients which everybody will condemn, but they may resort to expedients which nobody can condemn, and, in cases where they can trust their heirs and successors, they will do what everybody knows is being done at this moment. Thus the heirs will profit and the Exchequer will suffer. I appeal to no higher motive than the interests of the Exchequer over which the right hon. Gentleman presides, and I do seriously represent to him that unless he makes it tolerably easy for the persons who are to be taxed to pay the tax the Exchequer will not get the amount anticipated out of this new impost. Those whom the Chancellor of the Exchequer is trying to get at—few in number, recollect, but having at their command the highest professional assistance—will by means legitimate or illegitimate—legitimate I fully believe in the main, but none the less effective as against the Exchequer—so deal with their property during life that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will not get at their death the full sum which he anticipates. For that reason alone, if for no other, I would earnestly press on the Government the advisability of devising some means by which they may induce the wealthy classes whom they intend to tax to devote during their life some part of their annual income to provide a fund, which it will be out of their power to alienate, for the purpose of paying the Estate Duty which this Bill contemplates. I think the Government will see that I am speaking entirely in their own interests as guardians of the Public Purse, and that it would be desirable, if the Chancellor of the Exchequer will not favourably consider this proposal, that he should really set to work to devise some scheme of his own, having refused one after another the plans proposed from this side of the House.

Mr. S. HOARE (Norwich) said, the House was not only deciding how much the Chancellor of the Exchequer would gain or lose, but whether they were going to make a retrograde movement so far as life insurance was concerned. Yesterday the right hon. Gentleman expressed a sympathy with the object in view, which it was expected would have taken some form and would have been, at any rate, partially satisfactory to that side of the House. He hoped they were not to be entirely disappointed after the right hon. Gentleman's expression of sympathy with the object of providing by thrift for liabilities at death. He was at a loss to understand one point which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had taken—namely, that he could not treat savings for life insurance differently from other savings. This House had always treated savings for life insurance differently from other savings. Why was it people got Income Tax returned for premiums on their life insurance? They did not get such a return on any other savings—Consols and the like. But the House had always held that those who for wise and prudent purposes insured their lives should have returned to them the Income Tax on the premiums. If then the Government should take the view expressed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, it would be a distinctly retrograde movement, depriving those who insured their lives for prudent purposes even of advantage they had had in the past. It seemed hard, indeed, that when these heavy burdens were being placed upon all, whether rich or poor, they were not to be allowed to make some provision for them. This applied as much to the poor as to the rich, and the proposal could do no harm whatever to the Treasury. It could only be of advantage to those who made proper provision that upon their death no extra burden should be placed on wives, children, or those they might leave behind. The question was, whether the Government would refuse to afford any encouragement to thrift? The Chancellor of the Exchequer treated it as a question for millionaires; but he might rest assured it was really one for the vast majority of the people who were thrifty, and who wished to make prudent provision for the payment of the Estate Duty. He wondered whether the Government would allow people to deposit money at a low rate of interest for this purpose. He hoped that hon. Members would consider in going into the Lobby that they were going to vote, not simply on "another clause," but on a most important principle, which was whether the House was going to do anything to encourage thrift and life insurance, or whether it would say to the people on whom it was imposing heavier Death Duties than were ever imposed before, "We do not desire that you shall be thrifty, and provide for them by life assurance—we will cast all these burdens upon you, and will not help you to provide for them."

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 128; Noes 162.—(Division List, No. 163.)

*MR. BUTCHER (York) moved to insert the following clause:—

(Gifts to the Nation, or any municipal body or public institutions.)

"Estate Duty shall not be leviable in respect of any pictures, prints, books, manuscripts, or antiquities of national or historic interest given to, or bequeathed in trust for, the nation or any municipal body or any institution maintained solely for the benefit of the public."

The hon. Gentleman said that as the Bill stood a man who presented pictures to the nation would not only have to pay upon the graduated rate in respect of such pictures, but their value would be aggregated with the rest of his property, and he would have to pay upon a higher scale. If he were asked to say what reasons there were in favour of this clause, he should say that there ought to be every desire on the part of the Government to encourage gifts to the nation and to stimulate the generosity of donors. We had not now too many works of art.

The pious benefactor of the past was no more, and consequently they ought to do all that lay in their power to encourage the modern donor. Would it not be a shame that anyone giving works of art to the nation should not only have to pay duty upon their value, but that such value should be aggregated with other property? If it was desired that pictures should come into the hands of the nation or of the Municipal Authorities, was it advisable to place a graduated tax upon the benevolent intentions of owners? He believed the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be well advised and would not be exceeding his duty as guardian of the Public Purse if he allowed this exemption, so as to promote the kind of gifts which he (Mr. Butcher) had in view. The gifts referred to in the clause included gifts to institutions maintained for the public benefit. He thought he was fortified in his arguments by the fact that when this subject was under discussion in Committee the Chancellor of the Exchequer gave it his somewhat favourable consideration. The Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Solicitor General both of them put down clauses for the exemptions mentioned in this clause, but the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer could not say what was meant by them, and the Attorney General got up and said that they did not contain the meaning that the Government intended to convey. He ventured to think that his clause was, at all events, intelligible, and carried out the intentions of the Government; and, under these circumstances, he hoped he was not presumptuous in appealing to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to fairly examine his proposal. The House, he trusted, would say that it would be only fair that when a man left valuable works of art to the nation or to the public the value of that property should not only not be aggregated with the rest of his property, but should be exempted from the duty.

Clause brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

SIR W. HARCOURT said, he was very glad upon this occasion to be able to present himself to hon. Members opposite in a different attitude to that which he had been so often compelled to assume. From the first he had desired to see this case properly met, and he was prepared to accept substantially the proposals of the hon. and learned Member. He would, however, suggest another form for the Amendment, because, if the authority were solely statutory, questions as to what was or was not of national or historic interest might be raised in the Courts of Law and be decided by juries. The Amendment he should propose would be—

“It shall be lawful for the Treasury to remit the Estate Duties, or any other duties, payable on or with reference to death, on any such pictures, prints, books, manuscripts, or antiquities as appear to the Treasury to be of national or historic interest, and to be given or bequeathed for national purposes or to any County or Town Council.”

The authority would thus rest with the Treasury, which was subject to the control of Parliament. It was necessary that the Treasury should have legal authority to deal with the matter, as there was some doubt as to whether any such authority existed. In the case, for instance, of Mr. Tate's bequest, he had left a Minute at the Treasury to the effect that all duties on that bequest should be remitted; and the Treasury had followed the same course in other similar cases. He was not in a position to move the Amendment he had read as a new clause, and therefore he should propose it as an Amendment to Clause 15.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he rose expressly for the purpose of thanking the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the concession which he had made. As to the form of words, he should like to make two suggestions. It could not be the desire of the Government that the pictures, prints, &c., on which the duty payable was remitted should form part of the estate from which they came for the purposes of aggregation. But at first sight it seemed that, if the remission were simply administrative, while the duty on the fragment of the estate might be remitted, that fragment would remain as part of the original estate for the purposes of aggregation. Then as to the Public Bodies in respect of whose bequests a relaxation of the duty was to be made, the learned Societies and the Universities were notably absent from the list of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He was sure the Government could not intend that an estate should have certain privileges when bequeathed to Municipal or County Authorities, and should not have the same privileges when bequeathed to the Universities. Probably the Universities of all bodies were most capable of turning these bequests to profitable account. What he had said was in the way of suggestion, and not of criticism, and he hoped the Government would consider it before finally deciding on the wording of their Amendment.

SIR W. HARCOURT said, he thought he must ask the right hon. Gentleman not to take the question of aggregation as concluded. It would properly be raised on the Amendment. He was not indisposed to consider the question of the Universities; but there must be some definite limitation of the bodies to whom this privilege was to be extended. “Public institutions” was too wide a term. He had originally intended to confine the exemption to bequests made to the nation; but strong feeling was expressed as to the desirability of extending it to municipal bequests, and if that were done the County Authorities must receive the same treatment. He was, however, quite ready to consider the right hon. Gentleman's suggestions.

*SIR J. LUBBOCK (London University) said, there could be no question that many of these collections would be more usefully applied by the Universities than by any other body. They knew that in the case of the British Museum the bequests were of great interest, and he did not imagine there would be any difficulty in including within this clause objects of national historic or scientific interest. He threw that suggestion out for the consideration of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He noticed that his right hon. Friend was occupied for the moment, but perhaps some other Member of the Government would acquaint him with the proposal which he had put forward.

MR. G. BALFOUR (Leeds, Central) said, he thought it would be reasonable to include in the exemption gifts to Municipalities, such as public parks and open spaces.

Sir W. Harcourt

SIR S. MONTAGU (Tower Hamlets, Whitechapel) said, he would submit to the Chancellor of the Exchequer that it might be better, instead of mentioning for exemption properties left to the nation, to Municipalities, or Universities, to make the exemption general with regard to all properties left to Public Bodies.

*SIR M. HICKS-BEACH (Bristol, W.) said, he must confess to having heard with a great deal of disappointment the statement which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had made. Upon a previous occasion he had defended the Chancellor of the Exchequer against the inroads of the Municipalities, but now the right hon. Gentleman was actually acceding to their claims. He did not see why the taxpayers should have to pay for bequests made to Municipal or other Local Bodies, and there were some other Members who expressed the same opinion, and agreed with the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his proposed limitation of the exemptions to bequests made to the nation or to such institutions as were maintained out of moneys granted by Parliament. He hoped that, as the right hon. Gentleman proposed to extend the exemption, he would include the Universities; and that, on the other hand, he would not listen to the suggestion that it should embrace all kinds of property left to Public Bodies.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) said, he must point out that the clause suggested by the Chancellor of the Exchequer seemed to him to be extremely dangerous. They had a Chancellor of the Exchequer with ruin staring him in the face, and yet he proposed to add to his embarrassments by making further exemptions. His latest proposal was to put it into the power of the Treasury to decide whether certain objects were or were not objects of national or historical interest. That was putting into the hands of a public department a novel as well as an extensive power. The exemptions which were to be made ought to be brought up in the shape of a clause, and such exemptions should be construed by the Court and by no other body. The Chancellor of the Exchequer did not propose to restrict the exemption to cases where the property or the work of art was to be kept in reserve, but extended it to all other cases whatsoever. The result would be that if a man left a great historical estate like Trafalgar to some corporation, not to be preserved, but to be sold without restriction, this public body having inherited what would practically be a very large fortune, would be exempt from all payment of duty to which other people were subject. He could not conceive why any Public Body should be placed in a better position than a private individual. Were it not for his modesty, he should say that his own Amendment, which was borrowed from the existing Acts, far better met the case than that of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He saw very serious objections to the draft of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and he would very earnestly suggest that the learned Attorney General should consider it with a view to some modification of the Government proposals.

MR. FORWOOD (Lancashire, Ormskirk) said, that when this matter was mooted in Committee he spoke a word on behalf of bequests to Municipal Institutions, and he felt bound to join with his right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. A. J. Balfour) in tendering to the right hon. Gentleman (Sir W. Harcourt), on behalf of the Municipalities, their thanks for the concession he had made, as he believed that concession would be of great value to the large communities in this country. Great efforts had been made in the past to promote the establishment of art galleries, libraries, and other institutions in large towns, and anyone who had visited these institutions must have been struck with the great interest taken in them by the people. He gathered that the right hon. Gentleman had some hesitation in deciding whether bequests of artistic objects should be regarded in the aggregation of the property of the deceased. He wished to put a concrete case on the point. It was one that had arisen in his own town. A very learned man and a very distinguished citizen during the course of his life expended all his spare money in the purchase of old ivories, Wedgwood, pottery, and other works of art of considerable value. He left this collection to the Municipalities. The value set upon it was something like £80,000, and he had heard a higher figure mentioned. He did not pretend to say what the saleable value had been, but, taking it at £80,000, the total amount of the property left by this gentleman would be worth a little over £100,000. Unless bequests of this kind were exempted from taxation, the result of the gift of this valuable and unique collection to the City of Liverpool would have been that the comparatively small sum which the giver left to his representatives, instead of being taxed to the extent of £1,000, would have had to bear a burden of no less than £6,000. Surely it would have been most unfair to tax this man's successors in such a way. It was said by some hon. Members that gifts of money for charitable or public purposes should be made during a man's lifetime. In the case, however, of a picture or of some other work of art there was all the difference in the world between giving during lifetime and bequeathing in death. It might be reasonable to ask a man who wished to give money for a charitable purpose to do so during his lifetime, but when it was a question of taking a picture down from his walls or denuding his house of other valuable works of art, a much greater sacrifice would be involved in most cases than would be the case if the gift took the form of money. He hoped, therefore, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would make it plain that the value of works of art given for public purposes should not be included in the aggregation of the testator's property.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I do hope that after the proposals I have made, and in view of the fact that this question will come up again for discussion, the Debate will not be further continued. I think it will be extremely unfair, and it will certainly be a very great discouragement to the Government, if it be continued now.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Rochester) said, he would not detain the House long, but as he did not agree with the great bulk of those who had spoken on the Opposition side of the House, he desired to say a few words. It was quite clear that under this Bill the tax would be paid by the beneficiaries, and the question was whether public beneficiaries ought not to pay quite as much as a private beneficiary. As regarded gifts to the nation, he had not much to say, because it would be rather absurd that the nation should pay out of one pocket into the other, but he thought that Municipalities ought to pay this tax like anybody else. They were richer as a rule than private individuals, and could, therefore, afford to pay it. He did not object to people leaving property to the nation or to Municipalities, but he thought it was far better that they should provide properly for those who were dependent on them. If Municipalities were to be exempted from the tax and the principle of exemption was to be extended to the great learned bodies, it ought also to be extended to the great charities, which were certainly as deserving as the Universities. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had chosen to ride the rigid economical horse. Let him ride it to the finish, and let him insist upon everybody paying the uttermost farthing. The only differences between public collections and private collections were that the owners of public collections were rich, while the owners of private collections were comparatively poor, and that while private owners had very little voting strength in the country, Public Bodies had large voting strength. It was because various parties were desirous of paying their court to the Municipalities in order to obtain their votes at the next General Election that it was proposed to exempt them from the tax.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I hope the discussion may now be brought to an end. I am glad to say that the right hon. Gentleman (Sir W. Harcourt) has made a great concession, not to the unanimous feeling of the House, but to a feeling which largely prevails in the House, and which I myself certainly share.

*MR. BUTCHER said, he was satisfied with the statement made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and would withdraw the clause.

Motion and Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

*MR. SPEAKER ruled the other clauses on the Paper out of Order.

MR. BUTCHER, on behalf of Mr. J. G. Lawson (York, N.R., Thirsk), moved to amend Clause 1 by inserting, "to any other person," after "passes," in line 20, page 1. He said the clause provided that the Estate Duty should be payable "on all property, real and personal, settled and not settled, which passes" on the death. He proposed to put in "to any other person," in order to make the clause clearer, and he thought if the words were inserted the clause would be made consistent with other portions of the Bill.

Amendment proposed to the Bill, in page 1, line 20, after the word "passes," to insert the words "to any other person."—(Mr. Butcher.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. R. T. Reid, Dumfries, &c.) said, this Amendment had been discussed during the Committee stage. It was a mere question of drafting, and he did not think it would be advisable to adopt the Amendment.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 121; Noes 157.—(Division List, No. 164.)

MR. A. J. BALFOUR moved the adjournment of the Debate, because there was a Bill on the Paper, the Parochial Electors (Registration Acceleration) Bill, the discussion on the Third Reading of which would not take up much time; but concerning which a few words would have to be said. He thought it might pass without difficulty that night if sufficient time were given to hon. Gentlemen to express their opinions on one or two of the earlier episodes connected with the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. A. J. Balfour.)

Motion agreed to.

Further Proceeding on Consideration, as amended, deferred till To-morrow.

PAROCHIAL ELECTORS (REGISTRATION ACCELERATION) BILL.—(No. 282.)

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."—(Mr. Shaw-Lefevre.)

MR. BARTLEY said, he understood from the promise which had been made to him—namely, that the clause which would not read in any way, and which the right hon. Gentleman could not understand, was to be amended in another place. He had seen the amended clause, and it seemed to him to meet the difficulty which was pointed out on the Committee stage, and as he understood that there was a pledge given by the right hon. Gentleman that the Bill would be amended in another place of course there would be no objection to letting it go through now.

*MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE said the hon. Member was quite right. There had been a small verbal alteration made, and he would undertake that the Amendment should be made.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

MUSSEL SCALPS (SCOTLAND) BILL. (No. 169.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. BIRKMYRE (Ayr, &c.) moved the Second Reading of this Bill. He said its title might sound somewhat strange to hon. Members representing constituencies south of the Tweed. It was somewhat confusing, but it was strictly an English term, and was to be found in the Encyclopædia Britannica. It was good English, but certainly better Scotch.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Birkmyre.)

It being Midnight, the Debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed upon Thursday.

CONSIDERATION.

Bill, as amended, considered.

*MR. SNAPE (Lancashire, S.E., Heywood) reminded the House that he had moved the rejection of the Bill on the Second Reading. The Committee had struck out the recital as to rating the Wallasey and West Kirby Local Boards. He believed that the Bill was unnecessary, and that view was supported by the engineer of the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board. He had since learned that other of the officials of that Board did not approve of the Bill as far as they were concerned. It had been promoted entirely by the landowners, who had endeavoured to shift the expense and burden of carrying the Bill upon the ratepayers. To that he objected, as a principle which the House ought not to accept. He was told that, as the Committee had passed the Bill, he ought not to have moved its rejection. In answer to that objection he had only to say that if the Bill was of any value to the landowners who promoted it they, and not the ratepayers, ought to bear the expense of it. For the second time this Bill had been brought before the House. When originally introduced in 1889 the preamble was found by the Committee not to have been proved. It had now again been brought forward, and the Committee had again refused to accept this principle of throwing any part of the cost of the extension proposed by the Bill upon the ratepayers. Had the Bill been thrown out on Second Reading the ratepayers under the two Local Boards would have been relieved of the cost of having to again oppose this Bill before a Committee of this House. This was a question of principle, and not one which required sifting out upon evidence, and it was therefore competent for the House to decide. If that decision had been given, the ratepayers would have been exonerated from the expense of appearing before the Committee. Such procedure might, in many cases, amount to a positive denial of justice by putting the public to unnecessary expense. He was very glad that the Committee had acted upon the view he had brought before the House, and that these landowners would have to bear the cost of bringing in the Bill. The main feature to which he had taken objection having been removed from the Bill he would not move its rejection.

Bill to be read the third time.

ORDERS OF DAY.

FINANCE BILL.—(No. 303.)

CONSIDERATION. [THIRD NIGHT.]

Bill, as amended, considered.

*MR. BUTCHER (York) moved, for Mr. GRANT LAWSON, to amend Clause 2, providing that property passing on the death of the deceased should be deemed to include property specified in four sub-sections, by inserting the words "when situate in the United Kingdom." He would not re-open the general question with regard to property situate out of the United Kingdom, which had been so fully discussed and settled more or less satisfactorily. Owing to the alterations made it had become necessary for the words he proposed to be inserted at the beginning of the clause. As it stood, the second sub-section would apply to property belonging to the deceased situate out of the United Kingdom—that the property should be included only if, before the passing of the Act, Legacy or Succession Duty was payable in respect thereof. That was an exhaustive statement with regard to property situate out of the United Kingdom. If that were so, Section 1 ought to be limited to property situate within the United Kingdom, so that the two sections together would refer to the class of property meant. This was rather in the nature of a drafting Amendment, but he did not know whether the Solicitor General would desire to go further and say it was one of substance. The question whether it was a drafting Amendment merely or one of substance depended upon the question whether it was contemplated that no property out of the United Kingdom was to be taxed which was not specifically mentioned in the clause. The effect of the Amendment would be, by way of definition, that the property would not fall within the scope of the other clause.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 5, after the word "deceased," to insert the words "when situate within the United Kingdom."—(Mr. Butcher.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. R. T. REID, Dumfries, &c.) said, the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman appeared to be based upon a misunderstanding of the first section. The latter part of the first sub-section provided that "all property passing on the death of the deceased when situate out of the United Kingdom shall be included only if it is liable to Legacy or Succession Duty or would be so liable but for the relation of the person to whom it passes," and that provision applied to the whole clause.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (Manchester, E.) said, he was unable to follow the hon. and learned Gentleman's statement. His hon. Friend asked the plain question whether, under Sub-section (a) any property out of the United Kingdom was to be taxed which was not specifically taxed in Sub-section (b). There were two parts of the clause, one of which was intended to be a qualification of the other.

MR. R. T. REID said, he had pointed out that the latter part of the section governed the whole clause. Unless the property was situate outside the United Kingdom it was subject to and would come under the limitation at the end of Clause 2.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, there was no indication that one part of the clause was intended to be a qualification of the other. As he understood it, the object of the clause was to give a specific and careful definition of what was intended by "property passing on the death of the deceased." That was, however, dealt with in general terms in Clause 1. The Chancellor of the Exchequer would observe that Sub-section (a) contained a mis-statement; there might be property of which at the time of death the deceased was competent to dispose, but which nevertheless was not property passing on the death of the deceased. Were they to take the second sub-section of the clause not as a further definition of the kind of property dealt with, but as a modification and qualification of Sub-section (a) in the first part of the clause? If so, all he could say was that it was extremely bad drafting, and could only lead to confusion when the provisions of the Bill came to be interpreted by the Courts of Law. Surely it would be much better to insert the words suggested by his hon. Friend or some other words, such as "save as in hereafter provided."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT, Derby) said, they were all agreed that there should be no confusion in the matter, and he hoped that an Amendment to be proposed later on by the Solicitor General, and which was on the Paper, would remove any ambiguity.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) said, he was sorry he could not quite agree with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, for it seemed to him that the Solicitor General's Amendment would leave matters unchanged; the language would be but little clearer and the sense would be unchanged. The Amendment, in fact, would not clear up the awkward ambiguity. Next he came to the Amendment actually before the House. He was bound to confess his disappointment at not having heard some further statement as to the treatment of property out of the United Kingdom as a result of the representations made by the Colonies. He was aware that the Government had promised to lay on the Table a letter from Sir Charles Tupper on the subject, and he hoped it would be promptly forthcoming, because it was important they should see it before they came to the consideration of that branch of the Finance Bill, and before they decided on taxing for the first time property situated out of the United Kingdom. The Secretary for India on the previous day rather led the House to suppose that in the case of an estate of £25,000 there was no alteration in the duty. He, on the contrary, thought there was a tremendous alteration.

SIR W. HARCOURT : I rise to Order. I think this question arises on a later Amendment in the name of the hon. Member.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, that while it might be more convenient to discuss the matter on the later Amendment he could not admit that he was out of Order in debating it at that stage. Still, as a matter of convenience he was willing not to go fully into the matter on that occasion, and he would content himself with pointing out generally that in the case of property situate out of the United Kingdom enormous extra taxation was imposed by this clause. Sub-section 2 contained what were supposed to be exceptions and limitations ; but as the first part of the clause stood, it did undoubtedly, as the Leader of the Opposition had pointed out, throw a net over all property, whether or not it was liable to Legacy or to Succession Duty. What his hon. and learned Friend submitted was that the first part should not be assumed to go further than the second part of the clause. Was it not reasonable to suggest that in the first part of the clause they should only throw the net to cover property within the United Kingdom, inasmuch as in the second part they would be dealing directly with property out of it, and restricting the duty to certain descriptions of property so situated ?

Question put, and negatived.

SIR R. TEMPLE (Surrey, Kingston) said, he wished to move to leave out from Sub-section (c) the words "and the words voluntary and voluntarily, and a reference to a Volunteer, were omitted therefrom." He admitted that the point was to some extent discussed during the Committee stage ; but the discussion was a little indefinite, and he and his friends were never quite certain what the Government meant by proposing to abandon these words. He considered the point of such great importance as to justify him with challenging a Division on the subject. He proposed, in the first place, to remind the House what the law was before the Finance Bill was introduced, and then to show the operation of this particular provision. This Sub-section (c) virtually interfered with the Inland Revenue Acts, 1881 and 1889, because it proposed to enact that the words of those two Acts should be construed as if the provision extended to real and personal property. He held that that was most objectionable, but still it was part of the principle of the Bill ; it had been amply discussed in Committee, and they would not again challenge it. But besides enacting that, the sub-section went further, and provided that the provision was to be construed as if the words "voluntary" and "voluntarily" and a reference to a "volunteer" were omitted therefrom. It was clear that Section 38 of the Act of 1881 created exemptions in favour of voluntary settlements, and the section really comprised a comprehensive statement of all kinds of personal property that could fairly be put into the account for the payment of the Death Duties, while the three Sub-sections (a), (b), and (c) explained the exemption in favour of voluntary settlements. The operation of Sub-section (c) was further extended by bringing in the provisions of the Act of 1889, which really constituted an extension of the beneficent provisions of the Act of 1881. Now this Bill proposed to do away with those exemptions, and he thought they were entitled to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what he meant by it ? Let his fiscal and political conscience answer. No doubt the object that the right hon. Gentleman had in proposing to leave out the words "voluntary and voluntarily" was to be able to draw more property into his net. In the previous Acts a very comprehensive definition of the word "property" was given, and this particular class of property was exempted from the payment of duty. He should await the right hon. Gentleman's explanation with some interest, for he held that to impose a tax upon it now was contrary to every sense of English justice. He had explained the general apprehension, and he came now to a specific apprehension on a point as to which they were justly and naturally anxious ; he meant the case of marriage settlements. They noted with a limited amount of gratitude that the right hon. Gentleman proposed to exempt from the new duty property passing to the wife by marriage ; but if the Estate Duty was to be charged on marriage settlements, a great injustice would arise. If at the time of her marriage property were settled on a woman in the name of trustees, that property from that time forward was never at the disposal of the husband; she enjoyed the benefit of it during their joint lives. Then why, on her husband's death, should she be called upon to pay Succession Duty upon it? Surely such a charge would create a sense of rankling injustice in the minds of thousands of persons. Hon. Members opposite might laugh at that, but he could assure them there was nothing more shocking than that a poor widow, in her moment of sorrow and weakness, should be mulcted in a heavy fine for the payment of Death Duties. He would be only too glad to be told that he was wrong in supposing these marriage settlements would have to pay duty. No question that had been discussed during the Debate on the Bill had been regarded by hon. Members on both sides of the House with the same intense interest as this. No doubt where the husband was still in a position to make some provision to meet the payment of this unexpected imposition the case was not so hard, but there were many persons too late in life now to provide for this new charge on that portion of their property which before was exempted from taxation. He was perfectly sure, also, that owing to the omission of these words many persons would have to pay duty upon property which they did not inherit, and upon which Succession Duty was not justly payable at all.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 21, to leave out from the words "personal property," to the word "and," in line 23.—(Sir R. Temple.)

SIR W. HARCOURT said, that if it were not contrary to the evidence of his own senses he would have supposed that the hon. Baronet had come to the consideration of this question for the first time that afternoon, and had taken part in none of the discussions upon it which had been proceeding for the last two months. He asked, in the first place, whether the Government were going to do away with the exemptions, as he called them, granted to Volunteers under the Acts of 1881 and 1889.

Sir R. Temple

SIR R. TEMPLE: Will the right hon. Gentleman interpret the words of Sub-section (c) of Section 38 of the Act of 1881? Do they not provide that where in these cases Stamp Duty has been paid it shall be returned?

SIR W. HARCOURT said, he could not waste time by answering questions as to whether twice two made four or five. It was a matter of common knowledge as to the effect of the Act of 1881 on voluntary settlements. The hon. Gentleman was under an absolute misapprehension of the effect of those Acts, as the Act of 1881 for the first time imposed a duty on this very class of property. The object of the Government in framing the present Bill was to place all classes of property upon the same footing for the purpose of calculating the amount of Death Duty payable by the estate. All, therefore, that was necessary for them to do to carry out that object was to remove from the clause they were considering the words proposed to be omitted. If that were agreed to then settled property would be brought upon the same footing as voluntary settlements. They would, therefore, not do away with the supposed "exemption" as to voluntary settlements, for those would remain exactly in the same position as they were placed in by the Acts of 1881 and 1889. He declined to occupy the time of the House by again explaining the effect of the words "voluntary and voluntarily" as applicable to that class of property. Of course, the omission of those words would directly affect the case of all marriage settlements, as that class of property would henceforth be charged with the payment of Succession Duty. The humbler classes of the community, who had no settlements, had to make these payments as between husband and wife, and it would be unfair if one class was to be discharged from those payments and the other was not. He hoped the hon. Baronet would consider the answer he had given sufficient, and would not further press the matter.

*MR. BUTCHER said, the remarks of the Chancellor of the Exchequer had been devoted almost exclusively to the question of settlements; but, as a matter of fact, settlements were dealt with by Sub-section (b), and he ventured to say that no such clause as this had ever appeared before in any Act of Parliament. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was imposing duties of a new and untried kind on property, and executors and others who had to pay the heavy duties were subjected to penalties if they did not bring in affidavits stating what property was liable. If penalties were imposed the Chancellor of the Exchequer should at least make it clear to the executors and others what course they should take in order to avoid the penalties. He did not think that this could be gleaned from the clause as it at present stood. Was there any class of property which was made liable to duty by the insertion of those words which was not made liable by the other clauses of the Bill? Unless there was some such property the words were idle, useless, and misleading. Why could not the Government explain the meaning of the words?

SIR W. HARCOURT: We have done it over and over again.

MR. BUTCHER said, he must apologise for not being able to grasp it. Could the learned Solicitor General give them an illustration of any class of property which would be made liable to the duty under these words which was not already liable under other parts of the clause?

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, he thought the whole difficulty arose from the fact that the Government had taken a clause intended for one purpose and applied it to another object. Section 38, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer had told them, was entirely directed to stopping up gaps left by former legislation with regard to Probate Duty. It was a provision against evasive dispositions of property, and as such he admitted it was necessary. But it had solely in contemplation arrangements of a voluntary character. When, however, settlements were made for a valuable consideration the case was different. He had endeavoured to understand the sub-section with the result that he agreed entirely with the hon. and learned Member who last spoke, that there was absolutely no class of property made liable by the section which was not already chargeable under other parts of the Bill. He believed the section had been inserted under an entirely erroneous view. He challenged the Government to controvert that.

SIR D. MACFARLANE (Argyll) said that, as he understood the Chancellor of the Exchequer, marriage settlements, however long they had been made before the passing of this Bill, would be affected by it as if they had been made after the passing of the measure. He thought that there was some hardship in this, and for this reason: that those settlements were made before the Finance Bill was thought of, and had no reference whatever to its provisions. Persons who were alive could alter their testamentary dispositions in conformity with the Bill, but this could not be done with old settlements as the persons who made them had no longer any control over them. Hence great hardship must arise.

SIR W. HARCOURT: All this was discussed at great length yesterday.

SIR D. MACFARLANE said, there was no doubt that the lesson learned by those who had the interests of their family at heart, was that the best thing to do was to cheat the Chancellor of the Exchequer by dying at once, and so come under the old duties. But they were not disposed to do that, and therefore they were interested in securing a just and equitable settlement.

SIR M. HICKS-BEACH (Bristol, W.) said, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had somewhat complained of the repeated discussions on various matters connected with the Bill, but he thought they might congratulate themselves on the fact that those repeated Debates had at last brought home to the mind of one of the right hon. Gentleman's followers—the only one who had ventured to express an independent opinion—that a real hardship was being inflicted on persons who were, if he might say so, the victims of existing marriage settlements. He did not profess to be able to discuss this sub-section, because he candidly confessed that he did not understand it; but it seemed to him to be as bad a specimen of drafting as could possibly be presented to the House. It referred first to the Act of 1881; secondly, to an amendment of that Act by the Act of 1889, and then, taking the two together, it said that they were to be construed as if real property as well as personal property were included, and certain words were omitted. Lawyers might understand these things, but he did not think that laymen could. They had had a statement clear and definite from the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for York, who had shown that he, at any rate, understood the Bill at least as well as the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He had stated that, in his opinion, the words proposed to be omitted by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Kingston did not bring within the scope of the Bill any kind of property not brought within its operation by other portions of the Bill. The hon. and learned Gentleman had appealed to the Government to give even a single example of any one kind of property thus newly brought in. He noticed that during the Debate the Solicitor General left the House presumably to consult the draftsman on this point, and he would, therefore, now press him for an answer to the appeal.

MR. R. T. REID said, the right hon. Gentleman had suspected an occult motive for his departure from the House, and he was perfectly right. In reply to the question which had been specifically addressed to him, he would say that he could well imagine cases which these words would cover, such, for instance, as the case of a father six months before his death making a settlement of his property on his sons and absolutely depriving himself of all interest in the property. The whole of the clause was fully explained by the Attorney General and himself. They need not be ashamed to state that the object was to make the net wide enough to catch all kinds of transactions which were successful in evading the Probate Duty. They did impose two duties, and they did not unjustly impose one duty upon property. There might be some overlapping, and he thought it would not be easy to effect the object they had in view in catching all properties without some redundancies. His hon. and gallant Friend had asked whether marriage settlements were included. The answer was in the affirmative. Supposing a man settled £10,000 upon himself for life and on his wife after his death? If he were sufficiently well-to-do to do that, why should the property escape duty when in the case of a man who, unable to settle it at the time, subsequently accumulated it, it would have to be paid by his widow?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, the hon. and learned Gentleman had dealt, in the latter part of his observations, with the formidable and burning questions whether it was or was not proper that marriage settlements should be made to pay this duty, and he had repeated with emphasis the argument so often put forward by the Chancellor of the Exchequer that any privilege given to rich men should also be extended to poor men. But the difficulty he had always felt was this: that they were dealing with husband and wife as two persons instead of one for the purpose of the Death Duties, and he did not think that that fitted in at all with the ordinary conditions of social life. Nothing that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had advanced had diminished the injustice which they felt would be inflicted, whether they were dealing with the rich or with the poor. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was very angry with his hon. Friend for going over and over again the Debates which had already taken place, but he was bound to say that having consulted hon. Members around him they were unable to recollect any speech by the Attorney General in explanation of these words; all they had was some obscure reminiscence by the Solicitor General of some speech by his learned Leader. The Solicitor General had cited the case of a father who six months before his death settled his property on his son without any power of revoking the settlement. But he did not believe that even such a case as that required these remarkable words in order to cover it. Although they did not always understand the Attorney General and what he was driving at, they knew he always talked law, and he could not believe that he had been understood by his own colleagues or that there had been a perfect recapitulation of his opinion. He felt driven, therefore, to support the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend. He should, indeed, in one sense be sorry to see these words left out; they were such a remarkable and interesting example of the legal style, and it would be a thousand pities to deprive the Statute Book of that gem of legal drafting. However, if his hon. Friend went to a Division he should support him, as they must not sacrifice everything to legal style, even although it ought to be inserted in any anthology of English law as a specimen of what the House of Commons and its legal advisers could do when they set their minds to work. But he would repeat they must not sacrifice everything to style, and therefore he would be compelled, in view of the future serenity of mind of executors and legal advisers, to support the removal from the Bill of a clause which, whatever its intrinsic charms, was one certainly calculated to perplex those whose duty it would be to interpret the measure, and to involve them in serious legal difficulties.

MR. WYNDHAM (Dover) said that, according to the Official Debates, when this matter was discussed on the previous occasion the Chancellor of the Exchequer expressed regret that the Attorney General was unable to be present, but added that the able and competent gentlemen who had drafted the Bill had considered the point carefully and regarded the words as necessary. The Solicitor General and the right hon. Gentleman were, therefore, scarcely justified in accusing his hon. Friends of a lack of memory because they failed to remember what explanations were given by the Attorney General. He gave none.

MR. FORWOOD (Lancashire, Ormskirk) said, the Solicitor General had, in reply to his hon. Friend below the Gangway, drawn a distinction between the case of a rich man making a marriage settlement of £10,000 and the case of a poor man, whose accumulations subsequent to marriage became liable to the Death Duties. But was it not a common practice in the case of a man unable to set apart the settled sum at the time of his marriage to keep the money in his business, and to covenant with the trustees to pay it off from time to time. Surely poor men as well as rich men were interested in this question. He would like to know whether in such a case as he had referred to, and assuming the settlor died before he had paid the settled money, but left sufficient estate to pay it, the trustees would be able to recover it from the estate without paying the Death Duty upon it?

[No answer was given.]

Question put.

The House divided :—Ayes 187 ; Noes 119.—(Division List, No. 165.)

On Motion of Mr. R. T. REID, the following Amendment was agreed to :—Page 2, line 29, to leave out "and all," and print the following four lines as Subsection (2).

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) moved to leave out lines 29 to 32 on page 2. He said, he still hoped that the Government would reconsider their position in regard to the taxation of foreign and colonial property. The question had been postponed from time to time, and representations had been made to the Government on behalf of the Colonies on the subject. He suspected that representations had also been made or would be made on behalf of foreign countries. He had reason to believe that the further representations made by the Colonies amounted to this: that they were by no means satisfied with the Amendment proposed to be introduced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It was of no use for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to say that the tax upon foreign property was not a new tax. Up to this moment the Government had never assumed or attempted to tax any property that was not either actually or constructively in this country. But in pursuance of the doctrine that moveable property followed the person it had been assumed that personal property was in the country where the owner himself was. Consequently, the State had assumed to a certain extent to tax personalty abroad. It had, however, only been taxed to the extent of the Legacy or Succession Duty upon it when it came into the hands of the successor. No attempt had ever been made to levy Probate Duty out of the United Kingdom for the very sufficient reason that Probate Duty only applied to property within the jurisdiction of the British Courts. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said that the new Estate Duty was the analogue of the Probate Duty. If so, the right hon. Gentleman must not attempt to levy it on any property out of the jurisdiction of the British Courts. The main increase of duty that would be levied under this Bill would be imposed upon property which had never been taxed before for Probate Duty. The Secretary for India (Mr. Fowler) had on the previous day referred to a case of £25,000. In an ordinary case of a testator domiciled in Great Britain leaving his property to persons in this country, the present Probate Duty was 4 per cent., and the widow would have to pay the percentage. If the property were situated out of the United Kingdom the individual would not pay a single farthing. Under this Bill she would pay £1,000 on the £25,000. If the property were left to a child that child would at present pay 1 per cent. on £250, while under the Bill he or she would pay £1,000. Then there was the case of £100,000. If personal property to the value of £100,000 situated outside the United Kingdom were left to the widow she would at present pay nothing, whilst under the Bill the property of the widow would have to pay £5,500. A child inheriting £100,000 would at present pay £1,000, while under the Bill he or she would pay £5,500. If property to the value of £1,000,000 situated outside the United Kingdom were left to the widow she would at present pay nothing, while under the Bill she would have to pay £80,000. He thought he had shown that there would be a very large nominal increase of duty in respect of property out of the United Kingdom. The increase was, however, really nominal, and could not become real. The Chancellor of the Exchequer knew that in the case of personal property left in charge of a foreign executor he could not hope for a single farthing of the duty. Was it not manifest that whenever a man had personal property situated out of the United Kingdom and was faced by such a terrible accumulation of duties as was proposed by this Bill—duties amounting in some instances to 19 per cent—he would take the precaution of putting his property into the hands of a foreign executor? If he did so the right hon. Gentleman would not get a farthing of duty. No doubt the right hon. Gentleman thought he would get it from the English executor, but he would only do so as far as the English executor had property at his disposal, and such property might be little or might amount to nothing at all. Take the case of a foreigner domiciled in this country and having £20,000,000 of property abroad and £1,000,000 at home. The duty on the total amount would be £1,600,000, and of course that could not be obtained out of the £1,000,000 in this country, even if that £1,000,000 were left in this country. His profound conviction was, and he believed it must be shared by the Department, that not a penny of the duty on property situate out of the United Kingdom would ever come into the coffers of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Was it worth while to dissatisfy the colonists and to run the risk of a difference with foreign nations for the sake of a duty which would give little or no return? He thought that when the Chancellor of the Exchequer considered the representations of the colonists and the representations he might also have had from foreign Powers, and when he had also consulted the able officers of the Department concerned he would see that he was running very serious risks without much chance of getting any return.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 29, to leave out from the word "property" inclusive, to the word "Property" in line 33.—(Mr. Gibson Bowles.)

Question proposed, "That the words down to 'only,' in line 30, stand part of the Bill."

SIR W. HARCOURT: This is a renewal of the discussion of a large question which has been discussed before. If I remember rightly, the proposal to charge foreign property passed in Committee without observation or opposition. As regards foreign property, I do not believe that any serious doubt exists in the mind of anybody that such property ought to be charged as far as we can get at it. The notion that we are to encourage investments abroad by giving them the enormous bonus of a relief from the taxation which falls upon investments made in this country is one which I believe the great mass of Members of this House and people outside would not entertain for a moment. I cannot conceive anything that would be more unjust or impolitic. The hon. Member advises me to take counsel with the officers of the Inland Revenue. I wonder whether he supposes that I have not done so or that I do not almost spend day and night in taking counsel with them as to every clause and line of this Bill. They know what they are about in this matter; they know that there is a certain amount of foreign property on which we can collect the tax and a certain amount on which we cannot. We do not pretend to be able to levy the tax on real property, and there are circumstances in which we cannot get at personal property. The hon. Member, however, has very correctly said that the doctrine of the law is that all personal property follows the individual. From that point of view personal property belonging to an individual in this country is, in the eyes of the law, situate in this country, and that is the principle on which we base our proposals. It is on that ground that we have always levied Legacy and Succession Duty on foreign property. As the hon. Member says, Probate Duty has not been levied on foreign property. That is not a question of principle, but a question of jurisdiction. The ecclesiastical jurisdiction of the Probate Court attached to probate methods of levying which were not applicable to the case of foreign property. In recasting the duty we saw no reason whatever why we should not levy the Estate Duty in respect of personal property, which, though situate in a foreign country, belongs to a person living here. All we propose to do is to remove the technical objection arising out of the peculiar constitution of a Spiritual Court which, up to this time, has prevented probate being levied on foreign property. That is the whole of the question. The hon. Member began his speech by painting a picture of the enormous sums that might be levied on property abroad. He pointed out that if a widow succeeded to £1,000,000 we should get £80,000. Well, I think that a lady with £1,000,000 could well afford to give us £80,000. Then the hon. Member said we should not be able to levy the tax on property abroad, and, indeed, that we should get less than we do now. It that be so, if the result of the ignorance and blundering of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Law Officers and the officers of the Inland Revenue is that we are going to levy less than is levied now, I cannot conceive why, from the hon. Member's point of view, he should oppose our proposals. As to the question of the Colonies, that does not arise now, but will come up on the Amendment to be moved later. We are proposing to charge nothing that we do not now claim to charge under the Legacy and Succession Duties, though it is quite true that we put an additional charge in the form of Probate Duty. We are quite aware that there are methods by which the attempts to collect the tax may be defeated, but that is no reason why such property should not be got at for the purposes of taxation in cases where it can be reached. The officials of the Inland Revenue are of opinion that as under the Legacy Duty and as under the Succession Duty we do at present get a certain amount of contribution from property held abroad, so we shall get it in future under the form of Estate Duty. I confess that I think those who are responsible for our finance past and future will be extremely unwise if they deprive the English taxpayer of the relief which he would obtain by contribution from property elsewhere and capital invested abroad, and if you give an enormous preferential bonus to holders of capital invested in other countries.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : I have always felt with the Chancellor of the Exchequer that this preferential advantage given to foreign investments is one which is very difficult for this House to accept. But, at the same time, we are forced to the conclusion that if you are going to insist upon taxing these investments abroad, the whole scheme of levying money by Death Duties has inherent objections which ought to have been taken into account by the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he first laid his plan before us. I entirely agree that we cannot have this preferential bonus upon foreign investments; but if it be true, as I think it is true, that you cannot without difficulty collect the duty abroad, then the dilemma brings clear to our minds the fact that this plan regarding the Death Duties is one surrounded by inherent difficulties which no legislative ingenuity will wholly overcome. I should like to ask the Government one question. They propose to tax personal property invested abroad, and not real property. Why? Because, says the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the principle of our law is that personal property is where its owner is—that mobilia sequuntur personam. Those, I think, were the words quoted, but language does not become good sense because it is couched in bad Latin, and it is really absurd to tell us that personal property is where its possessor is. It is nothing of the kind. There are some kinds of personal property which, no doubt, are where their possessor is; but to tell me, for example, that the lease of a house, a great property abroad, which I suppose, is personal property, follows the individual owner more than freehold property abroad, is really to ask me to accept a proposition which manifestly contravenes elementary common sense. The Government, in truth, are bound by their own proposals to tax not merely foreign personalty but foreign realty. It may be very difficult for them to get hold of it; but it will not only be difficult, but almost impossible to get hold of personal property. Why should the thing be done in the one case and not in the other? I think they say with great force, that not to tax personalty abroad is to put a premium upon foreign investments; well, not to tax realty abroad is also to put a premium upon foreign investments. As a matter of fact, a large amount of English money is invested in foreign realty in land in the colonies and abroad, and I cannot see why the Government, on the strength of this Latin quotation, are going to tax one form of property and not another. The Chancellor of the Exchequer throughout this Bill is nothing if not logical. He laid down certain general principles in his Budget speech which he appeared to confound with the eternal, immutable principles of justice, with which, however, they certainly have no identity or even in some cases similarity. But at least the right hon. Gentleman ought to carry out those principles logically, and if there be a logical conclusion to be drawn from the proposal now under consideration it is that every form of property, whether real or personal, situated in England or abroad, ought to pay this Death Duty whenever it can be made to do so. I will say no more upon that question, but I will content myself before I sit down with asking a question of the Chancellor of the Exchequer which I think will be of great importance when we come to the colonial question which will be raised on a subsequent Amendment. In a previous Debate the Chancellor of the Exchequer said very confidently that none of our Treaties with foreign countries in respect to commercial matters made the Most-Favoured Nation Clause applicable to the colonies. Well, the Chancellor of the Exchequer may have been right when he said that. I have, of course, no longer access to official documents, but I must say that my own recollection of the subject does not agree with that of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and I have seen it stated on very high authority that one insuperable practical objection to anything like a commercial union between Great Britain and her colonies is the existence of this very Most-Favoured Nation Clause. I hope when the opportunity presents itself that the right hon. Gentleman will be able to give us conclusive evidence that his interpretation of this matter is the correct one, because it would be a serious thing if, after the Budget has passed, it should turn out that he has acted against the letter, and perhaps the spirit, of our Treaties with other nations. It would cause great financial perplexity, and might require even legislative action.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Of course, we are prepared to bear in mind what the right hon. Gentleman has said on this subject, and to inquire into it.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. R. T. REID moved, in page 2, line 30, leave out from "if" to "but," in line 31, and insert—

"Under the law in force before the passing of this Act, Legacy or Succession Duty is payable in respect thereof, or would be so payable."

He said, there was no substantial difference in the two sets of words, but it had been thought more advisable to use the form he now proposed, so as to show it was not intended to impose the tax on property which was not liable to duty of some kind before.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 30, to leave out from the word "if," to the word "but," in line 31, and insert the words—

Mr. A. J. Balfour

"Under the law in force before the passing of this Act, Legacy or Succession Duty is payable in respect thereof, or would be so payable."—(Mr. R. T. Reid.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

MR. GIBSON BOWLES remarked that as the Amendment was originally put down it read "Legacy and Succession Duty," but he was glad to see the Solicitor General had adopted the form he (Mr. Bowles) suggested, and which he used in his Amendments, and had altered the expression to "Legacy or Succession Duty." But even if this Amendment were made, he did not quite see the necessity for these words. He observed that the result was that instead of having 13 they had 25 words. He supposed, therefore, the draftsman of the Bill was paid by the folio and not by the job. He did not see that the words added anything; they would have the same effect as the words which were used before, and he did not know that there was any material objection to them.

Question put, and negatived.

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES moved, in page 2, line 32, after "relationship," insert "to the deceased." He said, that if the Amendment were accepted the part of the clause to which it referred would then read—

"And all property passing on the death of the deceased when situated out of the United Kingdom shall be inclusive only if it is liable to Legacy or Succession Duty, or would be so liable but for the relationship of the deceased."

Of course, he understood that the relationship might not be to the deceased, but to the originator of the settlement, and it might be necessary to insert other words. He conceived that this was a Bill charging property passing on the death of the deceased which was the deceased's own property, therefore it would only apply to the particular property derived from the deceased. If otherwise, he should be quite ready to insert other words. Certainly they could not leave the word "relationship" alone as it stood. It must be relationship to somebody, and some words were required after the word "relationship." Whether he had suggested apt or sufficient words he did not know, but certainly some sufficient words were required.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 32, after the word "relationship," to insert the words "to the deceased."—(Mr. Gibson Bowles.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. R. T. REID said, this matter was highly technical. The words as to relationship were inserted here because there was no Legacy or Succession Duty where such property passed, and that being so, it was desirable it should be expressed in some kind of apt legal language. The hon. Member said the word ought not to be "relationship," but "relationship to the deceased." He did not assent to that. It might be that the liability to Succession Duty would depend upon the relationship not to the deceased but to the settlor, and, accordingly, the words of the hon. Member would not be appropriate. It might be the settlor or it might be the deceased, and the best way to meet the matter, as it seemed to him, was to use the language which now appeared—namely, "but for the relationship of the person to whom it passes;" it being obvious to all lawyers that this referred to those cases in which, by reason of the relationship, the Legacy and Succession Duty which would otherwise be payable would not be payable. The words were quite sufficient and clearly pointed to what was intended to be struck at. Under these circumstances, he deprecated the introduction of words which, instead of giving assistance, might lead to confusion.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR did not know that it was worth while pressing this Amendment. As a layman, he agreed with his hon. Friend. It appeared to him that usually the language of this Bill was English and unintelligible, or intelligible and un-English. This came under the second category. It was not English, but it was perfectly intelligible, and nobody reading the clause could have the least doubt as to what it meant. It was something to have the matter intelligible, and they were not disposed to quarrel with it on this account. He never, however, saw the word "relationship" used without implying to whom the relationship was. At the same time, as the meaning of the clause was perfectly clear he did not think the Amendment should be persisted in.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, that under the circumstances he would ask leave to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

On Motion of Mr. R. T. REID, the following Amendment was agreed to :— Page 2, line 33, after "not," insert "be deemed to."

MR. R. T. REID moved, in page 2, line 35, after the word "deceased," to insert the words "or under a disposition made by the deceased more than 12 months before his death where possession and enjoyment of the property was bonâ fide assumed by the beneficiary immediately upon the creation of the trust, and thenceforward retained to the entire exclusion of the deceased, or of any benefit to him by contract or otherwise."

The Amendment, he said, aimed at excluding from the definition of property passing on the death of the deceased any property held by the deceased in the way described.

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. BYRNE (Essex, Walthamstow) moved to amend the Amendment by inserting after the word "death" the following words :—

"Or in the case of a disposition for value made more or less than 12 months before his death."

His Amendment showed exactly how difficult it was to assent to the Amendment put down by the Solicitor General. As he understood, this clause was taken from the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889. Section 11, Sub-section 1, amended the Customs and Inland Revenue Act of 1881. Sub-section 2 of Section 38 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, hereby amended was as follows :—

"The description of property marked (a) shall be read as if the word 'twelve' were substituted for the word 'three' therein, and the said description of property shall include property taken under any gift whenever made, of which property bonâ fide possession and enjoyment shall not have been assumed by the donor immediately upon the gift, and thenceforward retained to the entire exclusion of the donor or of any benefit to him by contract or otherwise."

The words were taken from the old Act. The meaning of the old Act was in its application to what were commonly called "voluntary gifts." In the old Act they had a provision providing for the case where no value was given, and it was thought right to say that 12 months before the time of the death of the person making the disposition he should not be at liberty to make such a voluntary settlement. He thought the matter was not at all unimportant, but it was a little difficult to understand. The point was this: a man made a will; that was a voluntary instrument, and the persons taking under the will were volunteers. A man made a donatio mortis causa, on account of death, immediately preceding death, and that was looked upon as equivalent to a will, and therefore duty was payable under it. In reference to voluntary settlements within 12 months before death, they had been, for the purposes of duty, put upon the same footing as property passing under the will itself, and the persons were regarded as volunteers taking under a voluntary instrument. Now they had an entirely different thing. The clause proposed by the Solicitor General was applicable in its terms not merely to voluntary instruments but to instruments for value, and therefore it became extremely necessary to see they were not imposing terms in respect of property which passed for value, which the Legislature had not seen fit to impose in reference to voluntary instruments. There was no connection between a disposition by a man, even if only made a day before death, if he received money consideration for it, or whether he made it 25 years before death for the reason that it did not apply in that case. But it did apply in the case of a voluntary instrument. Why in the case of dispositions or settlements for value should the limit of 12 months be applied? It appeared to him it was quite clear and obvious that the words of the Solicitor General's Amendment ought only to be applicable to cases of voluntary gifts and settlements, and, therefore, he proposed to insert (as an Amendment to the Amendment), after the word "death," the following words:— "Or in the case of a disposition for value made more or less than 12 months before his death." As regarded all property which ought to be caught, Section 2, Sub-section (c), would catch them, because under the Act of 1889 it was already provided that such Act should read as if the words "voluntary" and "voluntarily" were left out. Take this case by way of illustration. Say a man settled a sum of Consols on his daughter's marriage, in consideration of the husband's father bringing in an equivalent sum on his part. Settlor A, the father of the woman who married, was himself one of the trustees. The money, £10,000, was invested in his name and the name of another person. Suppose that three months after the settlement A's co-trustee died and A became the sole trustee. Two months later A died himself. As the clause was drawn it appeared to him that duty would be payable on A's will with regard to the money in the settlement, and of which he was merely trustee. He begged to propose his Amendment, which he hoped the Government would accept.

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment, in line 2, after the word "death," to insert the words

"or in the case of a disposition for value more or less than 12 months before his death."
—(Mr. Byrne.)

Question proposed, "That those words be inserted in the proposed Amendment."

MR. R. T. REID said, the hon. and learned Gentleman was good enough to show him the words he intended to move a few minutes ago, so that he was aware that what the hon. Member was about to propose was somewhat different to the Amendment he had placed on the Paper. He thought that if he had the opportunity of discussing this question privately for a few minutes with the hon. and learned Gentleman he should be able to convince him this Amendment was an unnecessary one. Let him point out shortly what was the real purpose and bearing of this clause which the hon. and learned Member seemed to have misapprehended somewhat. Sub-section 2 of the clause provided that they should not tax property held by the deceased as trustee for another person under a disposition not made by the deceased. In the Committee stage he was asked to strike out the words "under a disposition not made by the deceased," on the ground that, if he was trustee, under no circumstances ought property he held as trustee to be considered as property passing on his death. The answer he then made was, that if they did omit the words they would never get property passing at all. Supposing that they were to exempt property held by the deceased as trustee when he himself created the trust, all he would have to do would be to create himself a trustee of his own property, and thus escape duty altogether. But for the purpose of still further safeguarding and exempting properties from this clause the Government proposed, in the Amendment down in his name, to say this: that although the disposition might have been made by the deceased himself, yet that it should not pay duty now if it complied with certain conditions, one of which was that it should have been made more than 12 months before death; and that the deceased should have divested himself of all possession and enjoyment of the property, but should still remain trustee. They had taken the analogy of the Account Duty. That course was found necessary in the case of the Account Duty, and it was felt that the analogous course should be followed here, and the period extended from three to 12 months, or otherwise this procedure would be used as a method for evading the duty. Then came the hon. and learned Member for Essex, who wanted to insert words in the Amendment, the effect of which would be to make the Bill declare that the tax should not be paid upon a disposition made by the deceased, for any value, more or less than 12 months before death. In other words, he said that although the deceased held property as trustee, and although he made himself trustee, yet that it might not be assessed to this tax in the case of a disposition for value made at any time by the deceased. Did the hon. Member mean the full value? because if he meant an inadequate value there was another object.

MR. BYRNE said, that his intention was that the disposition should have been made in consideration of the full value of the property, and that the trustee should be merely the bare trustee, having no beneficial interest whatever in the property himself.

MR. R. T. REID said, that in that case the Amendment was absolutely unnecessary, and for this reason: because it was not the intention of the Government that in the case of the death of one who happened to be a bare trustee this duty should apply. In such a case, what passed on death would be the bare trust; it was not a beneficial interest; nothing whatever passed except the bare trust and the obligation and duties of the trust. Therefore, when they really analysed the object and purport of the hon. and learned Gentleman's Amendment, it was to raise the question whether, in the case of a trustee having no interest whatever except the bare trust, the trust property was to pay duty or not. Besides what he had already stated, he would remark that the proper place to discuss this question was on the definition clause, and to introduce it now in reference to one particular class of property—namely, property of which a man should be trustee and of which he himself was the original owner, would be an entirely erroneous course. In his opinion, the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman was quite unnecessary, and he was also quite clear that even if it was desirable the question should be raised the proper place to raise it would be on the Definition Clause.

*SIR M. HICKS-BEACH (Bristol, W.) thought the House would be obliged to the Solicitor General for the clear and lucid explanation he had given them of this complicated matter. He had stated very fairly that he entirely agreed with the hon. and learned Member for Essex, and that he did not believe in the case which his hon. and learned Friend desired to provide against—that it would be possible any duty could be payable. Then there was no difference between the Solicitor General and his hon. and learned Friend, but both were agreed.

MR. R. T. REID: He meaning the full value.

SIR M. HICKS-BEACH said, that both agreed in such cases that no duty would be payable. The wording of the clause as it now stood did seem to justify the doubt raised by his hon. and learned Friend. What did the clause say? That property passing on the death of the deceased should not include property held by the deceased as trustee for another person. Then that statement the hon. and learned Gentleman proceeded to qualify by the words "or under a disposition made by the deceased more than 12 months before his death," and so on. Surely the introduction of this qualification limited the operation of the preceding words, and unless a case came within this qualification it would be one in which duty would be payable; therefore his hon. and learned Friend had moved to insert words to avoid any possible doubt as to a case on which both he and the Solicitor General were entirely agreed. The Solicitor General was responsible for the drafting of the Bill, and he dared say his hon. and learned Friend might not be disposed to press his suggestion at this particular point after the strong expression on the part of the hon. and learned Gentleman that the proper place would be the Definition Clause. He confessed he should have thought that where they stated definitely that the property should not be deemed liable to the duty under a disposition made by the deceased more than 12 months before death, that they ought also to say that such a disposition might be made at any time provided it was for full value. As there was a doubt, he thought, after the statement of the Solicitor General, they might look to the Government to insert some such words as his hon. and learned Friend proposed.

MR. R. T. REID wished it to be clearly understood that where a man sold a property for its full value, but remained a bare trustee for the purchaser, no duty would be payable. If there was any doubt as to the effect of the clause on that point the matter could be set right when the Definition Clause came before the House.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston) expressed the opinion that there might be certain cases which under the clause as it stood might be liable to pay duty on the death of a bare trustee, and therefore, though this might be of rare occurrence, it was necessary some Amendment such as that suggested by the hon. Member for Essex should be inserted.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, that if the Amendment was to be made at all, this, and not the Definition Clause, was the proper place for it. The Solicitor General told them they need not be afraid about a man who had made a trust 12 months before his death for adequate value, because that which would pass at his death would be a naked trust. But the clause showed that even where a bare trust passed, a man was still held liable for the duty, if the disposition was made by himself. Therefore, the explanation of the hon. and learned Member was not conclusive. But the explanation of the action of the hon. and learned Gentleman was that the addition to the clause which he proposed was part of the barbed wire, which he had taken from Section 31 of the Act of 1881, which was designed to prevent evasion, but evasion of a totally different kind. Section 31 of the Act of 1881 was intended to prevent voluntary evasion under voluntary settlements, and it was now proposed to apply it to a different state of things and to different settlements. What reason and what justice was there in bringing under this duty such cases as that of a man who had made a trust, and he himself became the trustee for valuable and adequate consideration? What did it matter in a case of that kind whether the trust was made within a year, or without a year, of a man's death? The Amendment was absolutely necessary, for without it they would charge Estate Duty on a bargain made by a man by which, for adequate consideration, he had divested himself of the real property and had only a fiduciary property in the estate; and if his hon. and learned Friend went to a Division he would vote for him with a clear conscience.

Question put.

Mr. BRYNE moved the omission from the Solicitor General's Amendment of the words "possession and." He did not think the hon. and learned Gentleman had fully seen the effect of taking words out of an Act passed for a different purpose and putting them into this Bill. He would give an illustration. A declared himself to be trustee for £5,000 in Consols for B; the dividends on the Consols went for 20 years to B; but the Consols were for all that time in the possession of A, and continued to be in his possession at the time of his death. Was it, or was it not, intended by the Government that at the death of A, who had possession of the Consols at the time of his death, duty was to be payable? for he asserted unhesitatingly that under the clause as it stood Estate Duty would be charged on that property on the death of A. Take another case. Suppose A declared himself to be trustee for a piece of land, and had got legal possession of the land, and held it for 20 years, the rents all the time being received by B, was it or was it not intended that at A's death duty should be payable? In his opinion, the word "possession" in the clause would make such property liable for the payment of duty. B was the sole beneficiary of the property; he was in the enjoyment of it, and it did not matter a bit whether he assumed possession of it in the legal sense or not. He wished to say, with all respect to the Solicitor General, that it was not a sufficient answer for the hon. and learned Gentleman to say that those words were in use in another Act, because that Act was passed for a wholly different object. It was quite clear the words were improperly introduced; that they would lead to the taxing of property that was not meant to be taxed, and that the words had been taken from a former Act without considering in what respect the object of that Act differed from that of this Bill.

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment, in line 3, to leave out the words "possession and."—(Mr. Byrne.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'possession and' stand part of the proposed Amendment."

Mr. R. T. REID said, the hon. and learned Gentleman did not appreciate the object of the Amendment, or he would not try to alter it. That object was to say that the Duty should not be levied in some cases where the deceased was a trustee, even upon property which he himself had voluntarily settled. The question was, under what conditions was it safe to exempt from taxation property which once belonged to a man, of which he still remained trustee, and which he parted with for no valuable consideration? Exactly the same problem came before the late Government in 1889, and they came to the conclusion that certain safeguards were necessary before you exempted from taxation property which had once belonged to the deceased; of which he remained a trustee, and for which he had received no value whatever. The late Government held, and laid it down in Section 11 of the Act of 1889, that they must require as extreme proof of the bonâ fide character of the transaction that there should be not only enjoyment, but also actual possession. Not only enjoyment, but possession was the test required by the late Government, and the present Government proposed to use precisely the same words, in order to secure external proof of the genuineness of the transaction.

MR. GRAHAM MURRAY (Bute-shire) said, if the words of the Amendment needed amendment, the House ought not to be precluded from amending them, simply because they were found in the Act passed by the late Government. He and his hon. Friends had not got such a mighty respect of the words of an Act of Parliament, even though it were passed by a Government composed of their own friends. The hon. and learned Gentleman had not dealt with the case put by the Proposer of the Amendment, and he had not shown what was gained by retaining the words except that they were in conformity with another Act. The case of his hon. and learned Friend who moved the Amendment was that if they allowed the words "possession and" to remain in the clause they exclude from the benefit of the clause the very transaction they desired to include—namely, where possession was in the hands of a trustee, and enjoyment in the hands of the beneficiary. The words would really have the effect of frustrating the object which the hon. and learned Gentleman's Amendment was intended to secure.

MR. LEES KNOWLES (Salford, W.) said, it seemed to him that there was considerable difference between the words "possession" and "enjoyment," and he was of opinion that the words "possession and" ought to be struck out.

Question put, and agreed to.

Words inserted.

Mr. R. T. Reid

MR. BYRNE said, he proposed to add the words "or the use or benefit of some person for whom he was trustee" at the end of Sub-section 1, which provided that Estate Duty shall not be payable on any reversion or annuity purchased "for full consideration in money or money's worth, paid to the vendor or grantor for his own use or benefit." A man might buy a piece of property for, say, £5,000, and convey it to some other person declaring himself to be trustee, but having no other interest except that of trustee for, it might be, his son, or daughter, or grandson. Why should that case be left out? After what the Solicitor General had said, he could not anticipate that the Government would accept the Amendment, but he certainly could not see why they should not.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 2, after the word "benefit," to insert the words "or the use or benefit of some person for whom he was trustee."—(Mr. Byrne.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. R. T. REID said, the object of this clause was to make doubly clear, so to speak, what was already provided—namely, that a reversion which had been sold by the deceased for value received should not be deemed to pass on the death. It was stated that the Courts of Law had laid it down in analogous cases that there was no danger of this; still these words had been put in. The hon. Member proposed the words, "or the use or benefit of some person for whom he was trustee." It seemed to him that, by importing trustees into a clause of this kind the door would be opened to a variety of evasions. The Amendment was one on which it was possible that there might be a great many questions arising, and he did not want to leave the matter in doubt. But if the hon. Member would consent to withdraw the Amendment in favour of the next Amendment, standing in the name of the hon. and learned Member for York (Mr. Butcher), which dealt with leases as a matter of concession, he would accept that Amendment with verbal alteration. He would propose to alter the last words of the latter Amendment so that they should read, "acting as a trustee." He did not know whether that would meet the view of the hon. Member. At any rate, he could not accept the present Amendment.

MR. BYRNE said, he could not withdraw the Amendment, for the reason that the insertion of the words the Solicitor General agreed to accept would increase the difficulty he (Mr. Byrne) wanted to obviate unless the present Amendment were adopted. They were simply intended to widen the scope of the present Amendment.

Question put.

The House divided :—Ayes 148 ; Noes 211.—(Division List, No. 167.)

*MR. BUTCHER said, he would move the next Amendment subject to the verbal alteration the Solicitor General had indicated. He proposed as an Amendment to Section 1 of Clause 3 to add words that would extend the exemption from Estate Duty allowed in that clause in the case of leases for lives that were sold in consideration of money or money's worth, provided that the purchase-money was paid to the grantor for his own benefit, to the case also of "a lease sold for the use or benefit of any person for whom the grantor was a trustee."

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 2, after the word "benefit," to insert the words

"or in the case of a lease for the use or benefit of any person for whom the grantor was a trustee."—(Mr. Butcher.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. R. T. REID said, he had stated that he would be prepared to accept this Amendment, altered as he had indicated, as a matter of compromise ; that was to say, in the event of the last Amendment having been withdrawn. The hon. Member for Essex, however, had rejected the compromise, saying that the present Amendment would injure the clause rather than improve the clause. Under the circumstances, hon. Members would agree that he was not strictly bound by the terms of his offer. Still, while he thought the Amendment was quite unnecessary, he did not wish to be unreasonable ; and if his hon. and learned Friend would agree that the Amendment should read "for the use or benefit of any person for whom the grantor was acting as trustee" he should not oppose it.

VOL. XXVI. [FOURTH SERIES.]

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

Other Amendments agreed to.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, he desired to move the Amendment standing on the Paper in his name, which, though a purely drafting Amendment, seemed to him to be necessary.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 10, after the last Amendment, to insert the words "subject to the provisions of this Act contained."—(Mr. Gibson Bowles.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. REID said, it would not be a good precedent to insert the words "subject to the provisions of this Act," because it was all, of course, so subject. If the Government were to consent to insert those words in this instance they might be asked to insert them elsewhere. Under those circumstances, he could not accept the suggestion.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, he would not press the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

*MR. CYRIL DODD (Essex, Maldon), in the absence of Mr. Banbury (Camberwell, Peckham), called attention to an Amendment to exempt property under Section 17 from aggregation. This point was, he said, raised in Committee both by Mr. Banbury and by himself, and the Solicitor General was then good enough to say that he would take it into consideration, and see what could be done. It seemed to him that the Amendment of the Solicitor General met the point.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 12, after the word "thereof," to insert the words "but property exempted under Section 17 shall not be aggregated."—(Mr. Cyril Dodd.)

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 5.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES asked the Solicitor General if he would state the exact meaning of "settled property" under this clause?

MR. REID said, that, as the clause stood now, it referred to property passing under the will of the deceased which after his death remained subject to any consideration. A question had been asked by the hon. and learned Member for Essex as to the meaning of the words "remaining settled." Beyond all question they meant property settled by the will of the deceased, or subject to provisions operating after his death. It was quite clear that the clause referred to persons who were competent to dispose of the property.

MR. BARTLEY suggested that it surely did not mean that Estate Duty was to be payable as well, and said that words should be inserted to relieve the unfortunate person succeeding to the property.

On Motion of Mr. R. T. REID, the following Amendments were agreed to:—

Page 3, line 25, to leave out "liable to Estate Duty," and insert "in respect of which Estate Duty is leviable."

Page 3, line 26, leave out "after his death remains settled by virtue of any disposition," and insert—

"Having been settled by some other disposition passes under that disposition on the death of the deceased to some person not competent to dispose of the property."

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 28, after the word "duty," to insert the words "called Settlement Estate Duty."—(Mr. R. T. Reid.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. GOSCHEN (St. George's, Hanover Square) asked whether this was a new name? for, if so, he could not understand it. He presumed it meant settled for the life.

MR. R. T. REID said, that besides the Estate Duty referred to in the Bill there was the further Estate Duty of 1 per cent. which had been re-christened "Settlement Estate Duty." The right hon. Gentleman would see there was an advantage in not calling it "further Estate Duty." The name was not very material after all. Names were often given which did not express what was really intended. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would not take any objection.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. R. T. REID moved an Amendment in the same clause to the effect that the further Estate Duty on the principal value of the settled property should be levied except where the interest in property after the death is that of wife or husband, and providing that where a settlement continued the Settlement Estate Duty should be payable only once.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 29, to leave out the word "but," and insert the words

"except where the only life interest in the property after the death of the deceased is that of a wife or husband of the deceased; but

(b) during the continuance of the settlement the settlement Estate Duty shall not be payable more than once."—(Mr. R. T. Reid.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'but' stand part of the Bill."

SIR R. WEBSTER (Isle of Wight) said, this had reference to a question with which he proposed to deal in a later Amendment. The condition of the extra duty being payable would not attach if the words now suggested were inserted, because the state of circumstances must arise upon which the Amendment depended which had been previously inserted with regard to the property passing to some person not competent to dispose of it. The words as they stood did not seem to be consistent with the intention of the Government.

Question put, and negatived.

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 31, to leave out from the word "settlement," to "payable," in line 32, and insert the words

"the Estate Duty shall not, nor shall any of the duties mentioned in the fifth paragraph of the First Schedule to this Act be."—(Mr. R. T. Reid.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

SIR R. WEBSTER moved as an Amendment to the Solicitor General's proposed Amendment, line 1, after the word "not," to insert

"unless the deceased was, at the time of his death, competent to dispose of such property."

This seemed desirable in order to make the Amendment consistent with that just adopted, and that was necessary to make the whole clause read together.

MR. R. T. REID pointed out that the duties mentioned in the Schedule would not be payable unless the person was competent to dispose at the time of the death. It seemed to be right as it stood.

Amendment—(Mr. R. T. Reid)—agreed to.

MR. R. T. REID moved, in page 3, line 33, to leave out "unless the deceased," and to insert "until the death of a person who." Those words, he thought, expressed the sense of what the hon. and learned Member opposite desired.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 33, to leave out the words "unless the deceased," and insert the words "until the death of a person who."—(Mr. R. T. Reid.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

SIR R. WEBSTER said, the insertion of these words would make clear the contingency under which the Estate Duty would become payable. That explanation afforded an answer to his Amendment which he would otherwise have moved. It arrived at the same result by a different process.

Question put, and negatived.

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

MR. BUTCHER moved to leave out of Sub-section (b) Clause 5, the words "or had been at any time" where it was provided that if Estate Duty has already been paid in respect of settled property since the date of the settlement, no further Estate Duty shall be again payable in respect thereof, unless the deceased was, at the time of his death, or had been at any time, competent to dispose of such property. Clearly the intention of the Government was that the Estate Duty should not be paid more than once on settled property during the continuance of the settlement. As the clause stood that intention would in certain cases be defeated, and therefore he proposed to leave out the words in question. If a husband and wife brought property into settlement, on the death of either Estate Duty would have to be paid. And again, on the death of the survivor, Estate Duty would have to be paid, because the survivor would have had power, before the property was brought into settlement, to dispose of part of the property. In other words, property might have to pay duty from 4 up to 16 per cent. though it had never passed out of settlement at all. The Government could hardly have intended that. Many other cases might be put in which a similar result must follow. In other instances objection had been made that if certain words were struck out certain results foreseen by the Attorney General, Solicitor General or the Commissioners would follow, though what they were was never explained. No such consequences could follow here, and if the words were too wide they should be narrowed.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 34, to leave out the words "or had been at any time."—(Mr. Butcher.)

MR. R. T. REID would not accuse the hon. and learned Gentleman of any wish to raise another Debate, but for his part he did not think the Amendment was necessary. A settlement came to an end when the property passed to the hand of one who was competent to dispose of it. It then became a free property again. If the hon. and learned Member's next Amendment were accepted—namely, to insert the words "during the continuance of the settlement" after the words "had at any time"—the difficulty would be obviated, and it would not be necessary to omit the words as proposed. Neither was it desirable to insert the words proposed in the next Amendment, and now that the House had ascertained the hang of it, hon. Members would, no doubt, acquiesce in his view.

SIR R. WEBSTER said, that he could not understand why the words "had at any time" were necessary. He suggested that the clause should read, "or had been at any time since the date of the settlement competent to dispose." His objection to the words "had been at any time" was that they appeared not to be wanted. What he hoped to hear from the Solicitor General was that one Estate Duty only was to be payable. In the condition of things it seemed to him that the words "had been" were necessary, because they could not imagine such a case. If the power of appointment only existed before the settlement, the right way to deal with it would be to insert the words "or had been at any time since the date of the settlement competent to dispose." Probably those words would meet the case put by the right hon. Gentleman. Under the words as they now stood there might be a state of things when a second estate duty would be claimed because the person who died had at a period antecedent to the settlement power to dispose of the property. The general words had no significance. He really thought the Solicitor General might give way.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, the hon. and learned Gentleman agreed with his friend behind him that it would be unjust to exact a duty because the property had been within the competence of a person to dispose before it was settled, but thought the matter would be better met by a later Amendment. He should like to know when, in the opinion of the Government, a settlement came to an end? For his part, he should think that a settlement came to an end directly a person came into possession of settled property who was competent to dispose of it. On behalf of the Government, it seemed to be argued that a settlement only came to an end upon the death of the person. If that were so, the next Amendment would deal with the point, because the settlement was not continuous.

MR. R. T. REID: The right hon. Gentleman asks when a settlement ends. It ends when the trusts created by it cease to be operative—that is, when a person comes into possession of the property who has a right to do what he likes with it.

MR. BYRNE said, they might put other cases than that which was put by the hon. Member for York—the case of a tenant having the power of appointment. Supposing he had released the power of appointment, why should there be a charge made in respect of that appointment? It appeared to him this was a case not met by the second Amendment of the hon. Member for York.

MR. HALDANE said, in such a case he thought the duty ought to be payable. You had tenants coming into possession with authority to use their powers, and if they chose to release them they came within the category of persons who were not exempt under the Death Duties. There was a class of settlement under which you re-settled under the power contained in the settlement, and it was the curious state of the law in this respect that the draftsman must have had in his mind when he chose these particular words.

Sir R. Webster

MR. TOMLINSON said, if the power to dispose had been released, and was, in fact, only an inchoate power, surely the settlement would continue.

MR. COURTNEY said, he did not think this Amendment ought to be pressed. The second Amendment which had been accepted by the Government seemed to him to fully meet the case. It was absolutely necessary that the cases mentioned should be met. If a person had an absolute power of controlling how an estate should go, and he said, "Let it go as it would, as if I had no such power," he created a new devolution. With regard to those persons who had that power before the passing of this Act, the Estate Duty was claimable. Why should not that occur again under precisely similar circumstances after the passing of the Act? The Government ought not to consent to the Estate Duty being evaded by allowing this re-settlement.

*MR. MATTHEWS (Birmingham, E.) said, the right hon. Gentleman met the case put by the right hon. Gentleman behind him by treating an abstention from exercising a power of appointment as a virtual re-settlement. There was something ingenious and plausible about that argument, but a power of settlement might disappear or cease to exist in other ways. It was conceivable that a tenant for life under a settlement might have a general power of appointment with the consent of the settlor. If the settlor died, his powers of appointment would be gone, but he had those powers at one time, and according to the provisions of the Bill the Estate Duty would be payable because at some time he had the power of disposal. The Government had not yet pointed out to the House any case for which these words were necessary or why it was necessary to charge a fresh duty in a case where the dying person once had an opportunity of disposing of the property.

MR. R. T. REID said, he would put the case of a property settled upon A for life, then upon B for life, and then upon C in fee-simple. One Estate Duty was paid, and then C came into possession. He re-settled the property. He was at one time competent to dispose of the property, but not at the time of his death. It was to meet such a case that the words of the clause were necessary.

Question put.

The House divided :—Ayes 217 ;
Noes 174.—(Division List, No. 168.)

On Motion of Mr. BUTCHER, the following Amendment was agreed to :—
“during the continuance of the settlement.”

On Motion of Mr. R. T. REID, the following Amendment was agreed to :—
perty,” to end of line 39.

line 39, at end insert—

“If, upon the death of the deceased, a life or any less interest in such property arises to the wife or husband of the deceased, the payment of the Estate Duty and the further settlement Estate Duty shall (if otherwise payable) be postponed till after the determination of such interest.”

He said that the effect of the Amendment was that the corpus of the property in such cases should not be touched by the Estate Duty until the death of both husband and wife. The Opposition maintained the principle of the unity of the husband and wife, and held that to make a husband or wife pay the duty in the circumstances set out in his Amendment would be contrary to natural justice. He imagined that the loss to the Exchequer which the acceptance of this Amendment would entail would not be considerable.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 39, after the word “payable,” to insert the words,—

“If, upon the death of the deceased, a life or any less interest in such property arises to the wife or husband of the deceased, the payment of the Estate Duty and the further settlement Estate Duty shall (if otherwise payable) be postponed till after the determination of such interest.”—(Mr Butcher.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

MR. R. T. REID pointed out that as a concession to the conjugal relations the Government had already agreed that the settlement Estate Duty of 1 per cent. should not be enacted from the survivor of a married couple. Beyond that the Government could not go. Husbands and wives had never been exempted from Probate Duty. But the whole of this subject had been discussed over and over again in Committee, and it was hardly necessary that he should repeat once more the reasons why the Government could not assent to an Amendment of this nature.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, that the fact that the Government had granted a concession in respect of settlement Estate Duty justified the Opposition in pressing this Amendment.
L'appétit vient en mangeant. If a husband or a wife ought to be treated differently from other people in respect of one Death Duty, married persons ought to be treated differently in respect of all such duties. The wily Chancellor of the Exchequer conceded the principle for which they were contending when 1 per cent. only was involved, but refused to apply it when larger sums were involved. He swallowed the sprats, but looked askance at the whale. This wicked Bill would revoke all existing exemptions in favour of husbands and wives, exemptions recognised for more than 100 years. How could the Government defend the remission of the settlement Estate Duty if they refused to remit the Estate Duty itself? The reasons for remitting the duties were precisely similar in both cases. He felt sure that everyone in that House who had ever been a husband or a wife would support this Amendment.

MR. HALDANE said, that the Report stage of a Bill ought not to be used for the re-discussion of matters definitely disposed of in Committee. The question now raised had been completely threshed out in Committee, and, therefore, it was not necessary to repeat now all the arguments against the Amendment. Husbands and wives had always been liable to Probate Duty. They had been exempted from Legacy and Succession Duty, and that exemption would continue. The duty which they would have to pay was analogous to Probate Duty.
The fact that this Amendment had been moved, after the exhaustive treatment accorded to the subject in Committee, ought to teach the Government that it was of little use to make concessions to the Opposition.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he thought the hon. Gentleman ought to show some gratitude to the Opposition for the way in which they had discussed this matter.
When the late Government were in power the then Opposition insisted upon discussing many Bills on the Report stage Government to that it had received, and with the same fulness as in Committee, and with the same wealth of argumentative, or rather non-argumentative, speech. The hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down had entered the House only a short time ago. Had he been present during the whole of the afternoon he would have known that the discussions on the various Amendments that had been proposed had been kept within very reasonable limits indeed. He agreed, however, with the hon. and learned Gentleman that a concession ought not to be made the basis for further demands from the Government. It ought not to be made a platform for further assaults upon their citadels. Therefore, he did not join his hon. Friend (Mr. T. G. Bowles) in pressing this Amendment as the logical conclusion of the concession already made. He did not use that concession as a weapon, but urged the acceptance of the Amendment upon its own intrinsic merits. They had heard from the Government nothing on the Amendment except a declaration from the Solicitor General that he had made so many excellent speeches on this subject before that he thought there was nothing to be gained by repeating them. He did not ask the hon. and learned Gentleman to repeat his speeches on this subject made relevant to another Amendment; but he did ask him for a speech relevant to this Amendment. Neither the arguments of the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down nor any other arguments he had heard touched the subject of the Amendment now before the House. He could express in two sentences the arguments contained in all speeches delivered by the Solicitor General. The first was that this proposal would ruin the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the other that to make an exception of any kind in favour of settled property only would be to favour the rich as against the poor. Neither of these two arguments touched the substance of his hon. Friend's contention. If the Amendment were carried the Exchequer would practically lose nothing, and there would be no favouring of the rich. The only question raised was whether the proper time to levy the Death Duty was when the wife had just lost her husband or when the husband had just lost his wife. In the circumstances, he thought the Amendment required some different treatment from the he should be prepared to support his hon. Friend if he went to a Division.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION BILL. (No. 302.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL ON EDUCATION (Mr. ACLAND, York, W.R., Rotherham) said, he begged to move the Second Reading of this Bill, and to express a hope that the House would allow the stage to be taken this afternoon. It was essentially a non-contentious Bill, and had, in fact, been introduced with the assent of the Opposition in both Houses of Parliament. Its object was to remove children from the surveillance of the Poor Law and to hand over to the District Councils the duty of appointing School Attendance Committees. He had been allowed to introduce the Bill without opposition, and he hoped it might now be read a second time without opposition. All parties were agreed as to the principle.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Acland.)

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston) said, he supposed it was not intended that the control of children in their elementary education should be handed over to the District Council.

MR. ACLAND : School Attendance Committees of the District Councils will be substituted for those of the Boards of Guardians. That is all.

*SIR M. HICKS-BEACH (Bristol, W.) : Before making a change of this kind it would be well to wait and see what the District Councils are like.

MR. ACLAND said, he had been pressed by the Opposition to proceed with the Bill without delay in order that the change might be made before the Local Government Act, 1894, came into operation.

It being after half-past Five of the clock, and Objection being taken to Further Proceeding, the Debate stood adjourned. Debate to be resumed To-morrow.

House adjourned at twenty minutes before six o'clock.

COAL MINES (CHECK-WEIGHER) BILL.
(No. 153.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE EARL OF CHESTERFIELD, in moving the Second Reading, said, this was substantially the same Bill as that introduced last year in another place by certain Mining Representatives. That Bill proposed to make it an offence for any coal-owner, agent or manager, by threats, bribes, promises, notices of dismissal, or by any other means whatever, to interfere with the appointment of check-weigher. As their Lordships were aware, a check-weigher or check-weighman was a person elected and paid by the men working in any coal-mine (paid according to the amount of minerals gotten) to supervise on behalf of the men the weighing of the coal. The Coal Mines Regulations Act 1887 (Section 13) described his position and duties. Sub-section 2 provided that owners and managers of mines were bound to give the check-weighman every facility for examining and testing the weighing-machines. Sub-section 3 provided that, on the other hand, the check-weighman was not to interfere with the working or management of the mine. By Sub-section 4 owners or managers could not dismiss a weighman if they thought he interfered with the working or management of the mine or exceeded his duties ; but they might summon him before the Magistrates, who might dismiss him if they considered the case proved. That system had worked well and without friction ; but cases had occurred where the check-weighmen had made themselves obnoxious to the management, who had dismissed them without doing anything to summon them before the Magistrates. It was obvious that the position of check-weighman conferred great powers of making mischief with the men, and owners had found the presence of the check-weighmen somewhat galling. They had discovered a loophole in the Act, and when desirous of getting rid of a check-weighman they had dismissed their men, but had agreed to take them back into their employment on condition that they would not re-elect the same check-weighman. That case had occurred in reference to the Meriton Colliery in Scotland in September, 1890, and the same course had since been adopted more than once. By the first clause of the present Bill mine-owners, agents, or managers, or any person acting on their behalf, were forbidden to interfere with the appointment of the check-weigher, or to neglect or refuse to give facilities for such appointment ; it also forbade the owners and their representatives to attempt by bribes, threats, promises, or otherwise to exercise improper influence in respect of any appointment, or to induce the men to vote or not to vote for any particular class of person under a penalty of £20 in the case of a mine-owner or manager, and £2 in the case of other persons. It was believed that the Act would be welcomed by the mining class, whose interests required that their choice should be free in appointing the check-weighmen, and that the managers should not be able to get rid of them unless for misconduct, which would justify their being got rid of under the provisions of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887. He asked their Lordships to read the Bill a second time.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Earl of Chesterfield.)

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

INJURED ANIMALS BILL.—(No. 134.)

Commons Amendment to Lords Amendments considered (according to Order).

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN said, the Amendment made by the House of Commons originated in a suggestion made by their Lordships' House, and which, according to the custom of Parliament, had to be agreed to by both Houses. He moved, therefore, that the Amendment be agreed to.

Commons Amendment agreed to.

ARMY EXAMINATIONS.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

*THE EARL OF STRAFFORD asked the Under Secretary of State for War whether he could conveniently make any statement as to the recommendations of the Committee appointed to inquire into the Entrance Examinations (in non-military subjects) of candidates for commissions in the Army; whether such recommendations had received the approval of the Military Authorities and the Civil Service Commissioners; and, if so, at what date they were to take effect? He said, his question referred to the very important and interesting Report of the Departmental Committee presided over by the noble Lord last year. That Report dealt with the examinations for the Army and those by medical officers. He would not occupy time by going through the evidence given before the Committee, but would only refer to two points. The first was the recommendation that Latin should no longer be a compulsory subject in Class I., but should be removed to Class II., retaining, however, the same number of marks—he believed 2,000. The other point was that the physical or medical examination should be of a rather more stringent character. With regard to relegating Latin to the second class, the recent conference presided over by the headmaster of Eton, and representing 85 public schools, had expressed their objections to any such step. Upon that he would make no comments of his own, but hoped the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State would give his view of the matter. As regarded the other point—namely, a more strict medical examination, it was reported that from 1889 to 1893 no less than 22 per cent. of the cadets who went to Sandhurst were not of the necessary chest measurement and height. It was nearly always the case that, although candidates on entering Sandhurst might be wanting in weight and measurement, they generally came out above the average. Upon that point he thought more care should be taken in the medical examination, and a recommendation had been made upon it by the Committee. He would not touch upon the other recommendations of the Committee, which were of a very interesting and important character, and hoped the noble Lord would be able to answer the question of which he had given notice.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Lord SANDHURST): My Lords, the question standing on the Paper can be very shortly answered. The position of affairs in regard to this Report is this:—It was sent to the Civil Service Commissioners to be reviewed, and has returned to the War Office, I believe, this very day. The Secretary of State will now take the Report into his consideration with the various opinions expressed upon it by the Civil Service Commissioners and members of the War Office, so I regret to say it is impossible for me to name a precise date at which any new regulations will be issued. My noble Friend has suggested that it might be convenient if I were to say something as to one or two of the suggestions contained in the Report, and I shall be very glad to do so briefly. There has already been some little criticism, and a memorial has already been circulated in the Press emanating from a body of gentlemen known as the Headmasters' Conference, taking great exception to the relegation of Latin from Class I. to Class II. I cannot help thinking that many criticisms have been made owing to that proposition, which has occasioned most comment, not being thoroughly understood. I should like, at the outset of my remarks, to explain the reason why the Committee, which has been styled an "administrative blunder," was formed. Early last year the Secretary of State received a deputation, consisting of headmasters and others interested in science, who pointed out that science was unfairly dealt with. There had also been much criticism by Members of the House of Commons, and a good deal of dissatisfaction had been expressed, so the Secretary of State for War ordered this Committee, the reference to it being to inquire into the system and to see whether any modifications could be suggested. The salient point of the Report is what we propose in regard to Latin—namely, that it should be transferred from Class I., where it is called obligatory, to Class II., which is voluntary. I venture to think that the term "obligatory" is here a misleading epithet, for what does it mean in regard to these examinations? It does not mean that a boy has to attain a certain excellence in the examinations—that unless he obtains a certain number of marks, he will be plucked; it merely means that no other subject can be taken up instead of it. Boys have been known to pass who have scored only three and 12 marks in this subject out of 2,000. That cannot be called a very high qualification; no qualification could possibly be lower. The reasons which led the Committee to adopt these proposals were these:—It was made clear to us that it would be advisable to have a scientific subject in the examination for Woolwich, the Academy preparing boys for the scientific corps. The plan has hitherto been to so arrange the examinations for Woolwich and Sandhurst that if a sharp boy just misses Woolwich he can go up for Sandhurst a few months later, at the next opportunity. But if both subjects had been put into Class I. the total would have been, it was considered, one too many. There are five subjects in Class I.—namely, mathematics, English, French or German, geometrical drawing, and Latin. If we put science into Class I. it would bring up the subjects in this class to the number of six, and it was thought undesirable to increase the subjects, and, moreover, we did not think science so necessary for Sandhurst. Therefore, we thought the best and the fairest plan would be to reduce the Class I. subjects to the number of four. They would then—be mathematics, French or German, English, and geometrical drawing. This would increase the choice of subjects to be taken in Class II. by one subject. For Woolwich we propose that of three subjects in this class one must be science, while for Sandhurst we leave it free to the candidate to choose any three of the subjects in the class, so that in the case of a boy taking up Latin there will be no change, for he will have his four subjects in Class I., and in Class II. one of the subjects may be Latin marked as at present up to 2,000. If we had suggested that some subject should be instituted for Latin in Class I., thereby keeping five subjects in this class, or had we proposed to reduce the marks for Latin from 2,000, say, to 1,000, there would have been something in the complaint of the schoolmasters; but, as I have shown, we have done neither of these things, and for a boy going up from Eton or any classical school the examination practically remains the same. In this matter we in no way wished to favour the crammers, nor did we wish to favour the schools. Our intention was to provide the most broad curriculum, and as for 100 vacancies there are about 700 or more candidates, we thought that the examination should be of such a nature that those who were not successful should not be handicapped in searching for another career. There is another point which has attracted a certain amount of attention—namely, the medical test. On that point the Committee took a certain amount of evidence. Among the witnesses were many who favoured the plan of giving marks for physical exercises. One gentleman presented an elaborate scheme under which so many marks would be given for riding, marksmanship, and running. In addition he proposed to permit gymnastics, jumping, or fencing, at the option of the candidate. Another gentleman suggested that the boys should be subjected to an endurance test of a 20 or 25 mile walk. On this proposal I think comment is unnecessary; but in the former scheme, for marks for riding and shooting, no doubt there is a certain attractiveness, but the more the subject is considered the more apparent become the objections and the difficulties. Supposing you give marks for proficiency in field sports, you immediately lay yourself open to the criticism that the rank of officer in the Army is a preserve for those who, owing to means or residence, have had special opportunities of practising field sports; while if you mark for gymnastics, a sort of athletic cram would arise, for your Lordships are well aware that there can easily be physical as well as intellectual cram, and the very object you have in view might be defeated by overtraining. It appeared to us on the Committee that the result of instituting such an examination might be to sow the seeds of future disease which would not be perceptible at the time of the medical examination. Another objection was that you would materially lengthen the examinations, which are already complained of as being too long, and it would be very difficult in apportioning marks to avoid charges of unfairness. Another suggestion was that it might be advisable to mark for physical development. In some minds the idea exists that our officers are small, but it is not wise to form conclusions upon this subject from casual observation. It is more satisfactory to look at reliable returns and to compare the physical proportions of our cadets with the proportions given in the tables composed for the Anthropometrical Society by a distinguished medical man, Sir W. Aitken. These tables relate to public schools, cadets, and students at Universities, and what do we find? It is true that the maximum height of our cadets, when the comparison was made, was less than that in the tables, but the average height of the cadets was higher. Our tallest young man was shorter by one inch than the greatest height given in the tables which I may say were compiled from measurements of cadets, public school boys, and University students. The greatest height given in the tables was 76in., while our tallest man was only 75. As I have said, however, the average height exceeds the statures given in the tables. In regard to chest measurement, our requirement at entry is 32in., and this measurement rises to

Lord Sandhurst

33·65in. at the age of 18; 33·84in. at 19; 34·05in. at 20; and 34·85in. at 21. Your Lordships are, of course, aware that these young men enter the colleges at various years. This, I submit, is not unsatisfactory. Our expert witness, Surgeon General Jameson, the second officer in the Army Medical Department, pointed out that, if we mark for physical development, allowance must be made for difference in the races from which these young men spring. He said in his evidence before us that of the inhabitants of these islands the Scotchman is the heaviest and has the greatest chest development; the Irishman is the tallest, but he is lighter; the Welshman is the shortest, and comes second in weight. Then, said the witness, you come to the Englishman, the typical man, who is next to the Irishman in height, and less than the Welshman in weight. A system of examination, which had to take these different types into account, would cause endless trouble and give no one satisfaction. I may point out that all those officers who have had experience of the younger officers in the Service—in the field and at manœuvres—speak in very high terms of them, and that the medical officer at Sandhurst thinks that the cadets have much improved in the last 10 years during his experience there. With regard to a medical test which my noble Friend alluded to, it is obvious there must be a test of some kind on passing these boys into the Army; but we think the matter should be very carefully considered, carefully defined, and strictly adhered to. But the Committee, upon these facts, came to the conclusion that there was no need for a radical change in our system to ensure adequate physical development. I sympathise most sincerely with those boys who have to suffer the galling disappointment of failing medically after a successful literary examination, and also with the parents who have had to bear the expense. To prevent as far as possible this disappointment, we considered that a special circular should be issued to masters, parents, and guardians when they first apply for information about examinations; that, in the circular, the medical requirements should be most clearly stated, and that a note should be added to the effect that, unless a parent is satisfied that his son can satisfactorily pass the test, it is useless for him to apply. I also attach considerable importance to the suggestion that these examinations should be carried out by Boards of medical officers, specially selected for this duty, without reference to rank or station. I have only to add that it should be understood clearly that the Report is but a collection of suggestions for the consideration of the Secretary of State. He is at the present moment engaged in collecting opinions and obtaining suggestions from the Civil Service Commissioners and the military authorities upon the Report before finally deciding what portions of it, if any, he will adopt.

EDUCATION CODE AND REPORT.

QUESTION. OBSERVATION.

LORD NORTON asked the Lord President of the Council up to what date the Code and Report of the Committee of Council on Education had been presented to Parliament; and when the next would be presented?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY AND LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (The Earl of Rosebery): My Lords, the Day-school Code of 1894 was presented to Parliament on March 19 and the Evening-school Code on May 4. The Report of the Committee of Council on Education for 1893-94, dealing mainly with the Statistical Returns for the year ended August 31, 1893, was presented on June 29. The large annual volume containing the Report for 1893-94, together with Appendices, has not yet been presented, and will not be ready before August. It is probable that the next Codes and Report will be presented at about the same dates next year.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

THAMES CONSERVANCY BILL (by Order).

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question proposed [10th July],

"That Standing Orders 223 and 243 be suspended, and that the Bill be now read the third time."—(Dr. Farquharson.)

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

SIR T. SUTHERLAND (Greenock) said, that in rising to move the Motion that stood in his name, he feared he must apologise to the House if he should detain hon. Members for some little time. They knew that he was not given to the undue occupation of time, or to the obstruction of Bills, much less a Bill of this kind. This measure, as a fact, had never been discussed on the Second Reading. No doubt it was a Private Bill, but at the same time all its provisions were of vital interest to the public. The compromise which had been arrived at between the Thames Conservancy Board and the London County Council made it all the more necessary, according to his view, that there should be this fresh discussion. He had no hesitation in saying that the outcome of the compromise was of a mischievous character. Under the arrangement arrived at four new members were to be added to an already redundant and excessive Board, all of whom would probably be politicians opposed one to the other. He was aware of the great susceptibility of the House as to interference with the judgment of a Committee on a Private Bill, and he was willing to say that he shared that susceptibility himself to the fullest extent, because he knew that opposition of this kind was sometimes brought forward for the purpose of wrecking Bills. There was no intention of the kind on his part. On the contrary, he did not desire that the Bill should be ended but mended. While he had the very highest respect for the labours of the Committee, he must say that he did not attach any particular sacredness to their decision, nor did he think it sacrilegious to question the wisdom and outcome of their judgment in some respects. He had heard hon. Gentlemen congratulating each other with regard to the compromise that had been come to, and he must confess that he was unable to understand how they came to be so well satisfied. He thought he ought to explain in a word or two the reason why this Motion was not brought forward at an earlier stage. The reason was a simple one indeed. They had hoped up to the eleventh hour, when the Bill was before the Committee, to be able to convince the Committee that it would be of the greatest possible advantage to the interests of all the parties concerned if there was a line of demarcation drawn as between the interests of the upper and the lower river. He would say nothing with regard to the judgment of the Committee in having refused the adoption of an idea of that kind. The Thames Conservancy Board opposed every proposal that was made in the shipping interest, and nothing could be done in that direction. That House, however, was at liberty to adopt a much wider view than a Private Bill Committee would be likely to do if it could be shown, as he submitted it could be shown, that the administration of the Port of London could be more successfully conducted by a controlling body other than that provided by the Bill. They had to look to the body that would develop and improve and make more efficient the facilities of the Port, and in this connection they had to consider whether the present Conservancy Board had done justice to the requirements of the Port. He would not offer any extreme criticism on this head, but would simply say that, according to the public opinion of the City, the Board had not kept themselves up to the level of the requirements of the day; that they were not sufficiently energetic; that they had not marched with the times, and were in possession of very little share of the public confidence. Hon. Members knew that within the last 20 years there had been a great revolution in the shipping industry. Despite this the facilities of London as a port had remained stationary. It was his duty to show upon a previous occasion that the mouth of the river at the Nore was constantly silting up, as a comparison of the charts would demonstrate. He brought the matter before the House, and as the entrance to the river at the Nore was beyond the ancient jurisdiction of the Thames Conservancy, he proposed an Instruction to the Committee upon the subject, which was adopted. But the fact was, that in the portion of the river and Port of London which had always been under the jurisdiction of the Thames Conservancy Board the channel was utterly inadequate to the existing wants, and that at the present moment there was nothing like sufficient anchorage for large vessels. A vessel leaving the London Docks in winter, and being caught two or three miles down in a fog, had to push on at all risks and take all chances. Only those who happened to be the underwriters of these vessels and those who were charged with the safety of numerous lives and an immense amount of property could appreciate the tremendous anxiety felt with regard to the navigation of the river. He had shown, further, that such was the state of the river that if a vessel coming from Gravesend were delayed from entering the dock at a given moment no anchorage could be found for her in the vicinity of the docks, but she must steam down to Gravesend and anchor until she could come up upon another tide. They asked when the clause was inserted in the Bill, in consequence of his Instruction, that the investigation which was to be made in regard to this matter by the Board of Trade should not be confined to the entrance of the river at the Nore, but extended up the river as far as the Royal Albert Docks. The Conservancy Board, however, objected as usual, and in accordance with what he considered to be their usual obstructive policy. The radical defect of the Conservancy Board was that it was too large, and too mixed, and too heterogeneous. They had a body concerned with the affairs of the Upper Thames, and another body interested in down-river affairs and the administration of the Port of London, and these two bodies had not only no necessary connection, but were, in fact, without anything like a community of interests. They were joined under an unfortunate Act of Parliament which was passed in defiance of the wishes of the Conservancy Board. With regard to the existing Conservancy Board of 30 members, he thought it was safe to say that not more than half-a-dozen of them possessed any practical knowledge whatever of the requirements of shipping and commerce in the Port of London. If that was so with regard to the present Board, what would be the state of affairs under the Board constituted by this Bill? That Board must, of course, be larger, more mixed, and less homogeneous than the Board which it replaced, and, as he thought, all the less competent to fulfil the duties of the Port Trust of the great River Thames. The new committee consisted of 37 members, and only of these would be representative of the shipowners, notwithstanding the fact that the shipping interest contributed exactly a half of the annual revenue of the Thames Conservancy. The main feature of the new constitution of the committee was that it brought into the committee something like nine County Council members from all parts of the provinces, and these were the gentlemen who, under this Bill, were to have under their control the shipping and commerce of the Port of London. He said that these delegates, however competent and eminent they might be in their own way, and however well able to look after such matters as fishing, pollution, or pleasure traffic in the upper part of the river, must be profoundly ignorant of maritime affairs; and to set up a body thus constituted as the Governing Body of the Port of London was an absurdity and anachronism in the eyes of every practical man. His contention was that the future constitution of the Conservancy Board would render that body more unsatisfactory still, and it was the desire of the shipowners, by means of the Motion which he now brought before the House, to convert an unmanageable and impractical into a manageable and practical body by the creation of two statutory committees—one whose business it would be to look after the upper waters of the river and the other whose special duty would be the conservation and improvement of the Port of London—a duty for which it would be directly and entirely responsible. In this proposal he was following the traditions which applied to all other great rivers of the United Kingdom. There was no other river dealt with as the Thames was dealt with under this Bill. What were the difficulties in the way of creating these two statutory committees? He took it that the up-river authorities had no desire that their revenue should be meddled with by authorities connected with the Port of London. Their revenue and expenditure ought to be maintained separately. He was quite sure that those connected with the lower river and the Port of London had no desire that their revenue and expenditure should be mixed up with that of the up river. At the present moment they contended that they were not receiving fair treatment from the Thames Conservancy, and that their revenue ought to be used for the improvement of the Port of London. It appeared that only a fourth of the revenue derived from the shipowners was expended in improving and dredging the river. This was a comparatively simple matter. If the House sanctioned the proposal he ventured to say that clauses could be drawn within an hour which would ensure these separate jurisdictions and authorities, and place upon both committees separate duties and responsibilities, while at the same time they could both meet under the common name of the Thames Conservancy for common interests outside the particular scope of their separate duties. If this Bill remained in its present form, notwithstanding the compromise which was come to on Tuesday last, it would never be a final settlement, and the Conservancy would linger on to a doomed existence until some more efficient instrument could be found to discharge its duties. He did not pretend to know what was in the minds of the Thames Conservancy Board, but he repeated that he was sure this so-called settlement would never be a final one. So far as he was concerned, he did not oppose the existence of the Thames Conservancy Board. What he wanted to do was to give it a more definite authority and enable it adequately to fulfil the great task which devolved upon it. He begged to move—

“That the Bill be re-committed to the former Committee, and that it be an Instruction to the Committee to insert provisions in the Bill for establishing distinct statutory committees of the Conservancy Board to manage the upper river and the lower river (including the port and harbour), to define the limits within which the jurisdiction of such committees should respectively extend, and to provide for allocating to purposes of the lower river, port, and harbour the income arising therefrom.”

SIR D. MACFARLANE (Argyll), in seconding the Motion, said he was satisfied that the attempt to manage the Thames from the Nore up to its source by one body was a practical impossibility. It was a great mistake that the management of the river was not separated into two parts. The Port of London should be under a special commission. He believed it was the case that the lower part of the Thames was being seriously neglected. Therefore, he approved of the idea of referring the Bill back in order that the able Committee might suggest some means by which both parties and interests might be satisfied. His hon. Friend, who was a very great authority on shipping matters, had laid very clearly before the House the enormous extent of the interests involved in the conservancy of the Thames, and had also shown that it was impossible for members from Berkshire and similar counties to understand the requirements of the Port of London. He seconded the Motion in the hope that the Committee would be able to find a solution of the question that would be satisfactory to both parties.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word “That,” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “the Bill be re-committed to the former Committee.”—(Sir T. Sutherland.)

*SIR F. DIXON-HARTLAND (Middlesex, Uxbridge) said, the Mover of the Motion had stated that it was not properly discussed on the Second Reading; but the reason was that it had not occurred to the shipowners until long after the Second Reading had taken place to move in the matter as they had done in the last few days. The shipowners presented a Petition against the Bill on the 27th of March, but the question of appointing statutory committees was in no way referred to in it. As a matter of fact, the shipowners did not move in the matter until the Bill had been in Committee for 14 or 15 days, and a very large part of it had been threshed out. He could not help thinking that if these after-thoughts were to be acted upon in such a way as practically to suspend the Rules of the House, a most dangerous precedent would have been introduced. If, after a Bill had been threshed out for 28 days, and after every Member of the Committee had been unanimously in favour of it, the Committee were to have a new proposal of this kind introduced, it would be the end of all Private Bill legislation in the House of Commons. The hon. Member had gone so far as to say that the Thames Conservators had never done any justice to shipowners with reference to the lower part of the river. Was the hon. Member aware that since the shipowners addressed a letter to the Thames Conservancy Board in 1887 the Board had spent no less than £79,000 in dredging the lower part of the river? In regard to the charge that the Conservators had not done their duty generally, had the hon. Member read the evidence given to the various Committees on the subject? Lord Farrer, when giving evidence as a member of the London County Council before Sir Matthew White Ridley's Committee, said, "I think the Conservators have done their very best," and he also stated that, from his knowledge of the Thames Conservators, he was satisfied that they had done everything in their power. Mr. Binnie, who was a great authority, stated that he was surprised that the Conservators had been able to do so much.

SIR T. SUTHERLAND : What is the date of this evidence?

SIR F. DIXON-HARTLAND : The hon. Member will find it on pages 48 and 49 of the Committee's Report.

SIR T. SUTHERLAND : Well, Lord Farrer has expressed the strongest view in favour of dividing the Thames Conservancy into two Boards.

SIR F. DIXON-HARTLAND said, that Lord Farrer had, at all events, given the evidence he had quoted. The late Deputy Chairman of the London County Council, Mr. Alfred Haggis, who was not at all prejudiced in favour of the Conservancy, stated that the London County Council had no grievance against the Conservancy, and that he could not lay a finger on a single thing in which the Conservancy were not doing their duty. He (Sir F. Dixon-Hartland) could honestly say that there was no body of men who had better done their duty under difficult circumstances than the Thames Conservancy, and he believed that what they were doing was very much appreciated by all classes of the citizens. The hon. Member had said there were not half-a-dozen members of the Board who were at all acquainted with shipping matters. Had the Deputy-Master of the Trinity House no knowledge of shipping matters; had the Admiralty, who had two representatives on the Board, no such knowledge; had the Board of Trade, who had two representatives, none; had the shipowners, the owners of steam-tugs, the dockowners, and wharfingers no knowledge of shipping? As to the remark that nine representatives of the County Councils of the upper river had been added, it was evident that the hon. Member did not know what he was talking about. Those County Councils had four representatives before, and only five representatives were added so as to keep the balance between them and London. He should like to know what London would be like if there were no upper river? It was of the utmost importance that the upper river should be properly protected in the interests of the Port of London. He quite admitted that there were Harbour Boards on the Mersey, the Clyde, the Tyne, the Humber, and the Ribble; and if these cases were looked into, it would be found that they were not at all analogous to that of London. The point for the House to consider was that if the Bill were sent back again to the Committee, it would be killed by effluxion of time, as it would be impossible for it to get through all its stages before the end of the Session. The Bill contained 308 clauses, and he believed that a very large number of these clauses would have to be altered if the proposed Instruction were agreed to. The Bill would go through if this Instruction were refused, and it would certainly be killed if the Instruction were agreed to. He appealed to the House not to virtually throw out on its Third Reading a Bill which had been brought in by order of the House, which had been most carefully threshed out by the Committee, and which, if carried, would go a long way towards consolidating all the questions relating to the Thames. If the hon. Member had a question to raise there was nothing to prevent him bringing in a Bill in another Session in accordance with his view; but it certainly was not fair, at this stage of the Bill, to attempt to override the Standing Orders.

*MR. DODD (Essex, Maldon) said, he had not the slightest hesitation in voting against decisions of Committees whenever he thought Committees had arrived at wrong decisions. He was not in any sense awestruck by the sacredness of the decisions of Committees; nor did he attach any great weight to the argument they so often heard that the Committee was a strong Committee. He had noticed that whenever any question about a Committee was raised, that Committee was always a strong one. He did not allow the imposing spectacle they had on a previous occasion of all the strong men on this strong Committee rising to impress him too much. It had been said that there was only one opinion in the Committee with regard to this Bill. He had no doubt that was the case, and he had not endeavoured to investigate whose opinion it was. He had looked at the Bill, which contained a very large number of clauses, and had satisfied himself that if the proposed Instruction were carried, the proposed Bill would be killed. Under these circumstances, if the provisions of the Bill were of any value the House ought not to pass the Instruction. The hon. Member had said that the Bill added to the Conservancy Board a certain number of politicians on one side or the other, and that politicians would not be of the slightest use on the Board. Yet the hon. Member came to a House composed of politicians, and asked them to override the decision of the Committee which had heard all the circumstances of the case. He (Mr. Dodd) had no prejudice against politicians, but he thought that those who had heard the evidence and considered all the circumstances were more likely to be right than were the general body of Members. The hon. Member proposed to instruct the Committee to insert provisions in the Bill for establishing distinct statutory committees of the Conservancy Board to manage the upper and lower river. This might be right or wrong; but it would certainly require a great deal of consideration, and the House was not now in a position to give it that consideration. The decision with reference to the other part—the financial part—of the Instruction must depend upon a mass of details which the House had not in its possession and which the Committee could not have except after a considerable lapse of time, and practically long after the present Session had been concluded. If the matter were left alone the Bill would go through, and something would be done which would be of use, at any rate, for some period. He honestly thought that the Committee were absolutely right in their decision, and he hoped the House would not accept the Instruction.

*SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.) said, that when the hon. Member (Sir T. Sutherland) brought this subject before the House recently he (Sir A. Rollit) felt it his duty to vote for the Instruction, and he very much regretted that he was unable to support the hon. Member on the present occasion. He certainly did not agree with the statement that had been made that the hon. Member knew nothing about that matter. On the contrary, he did not think there was in the House a man more capable of representing the great shipping interests of the country and of pointing out the importance of making the access to the Port of London as good as possible. When he heard it said that there was no analogy between London and other ports—

SIR F. DIXON-HARTLAND said, What I said was that there was no analogy between the Acts which governed those ports and that which governed the Port of London.

SIR A. ROLLIT said that the difference between London and other ports was that, whilst in other ports, both in this country and abroad, the authorities were doing their best to improve the means of access, in London the port was being neglected. Such obstacles as the hon. Baronet had referred to were utterly at variance with the interests of the nation. He quite sympathised with what the hon. Member for Greenock had said about having so many representatives of the Upper Thames on the Board. If the Conservancy Board of the Humber had amongst them the representatives of the small tributaries of the Ouse and the Trent, he could quite conceive that it would not be advantageous to the shipping interests of the Humber. The House, however, had to bear in mind that it had ordered this Bill to be brought in, and that if it were not passed the settlement of the question would go into other hands. Though he quite accepted what the hon. Member had said, to the effect that his object was not to wreck the Bill, he was very much afraid that the carrying of his Instruction would have that effect. The Bill would accomplish a great deal, although it did not give adequate representation to the shipping interest. The £79,000 which it was said had been spent for a series of years over the improvement of the lower river was utterly incomparable with what was being done in one year or half a year in the Mersey and other estuaries and rivers for the purpose of removing obstacles to the navigation. Anyone who knew how Hamburg and Antwerp had diverted traffic that used to come to English ports might also know how much was being done to give better access to those important ports, as in straightening the River Schelde by cutting off arms of the river and the like. He believed that at a very early period the Government must appoint a Commission or a Committee to take this matter in hand, and see that the interests of the great Port of London were properly safeguarded. Much had been said about the Committee, and he thought the House ought as a general rule to respect the decisions of Committees. He would point out, however, in reference to the constitution of the Committee on this Bill that all its Members were more or less representatives of inland interests. That they gave the greatest attention to the subject, and brought great ability to bear on it was unquestionable, but he did not see on the Committee the name of a representative of any great port or of anyone having special knowledge of conservancy matters. In part the Committee carried out the wishes of the hon. Member by increasing the area of the duties of the Conservancy. Though they had not seen their way to fulfil all reasonable requirements yet to destroy the Bill would be unjust to the Conservancy, and would not ultimately, perhaps, be in the interest of the object the hon. Member had in view. He hoped the hon. Member would bring this matter before the House until the just interests of London, from a commercial and shipping point of view, were attended to, and in that effort—though not on this occasion and at the late stage of this Bill—he (Sir A. Rollit) would be able to support him.

MR. JACKSON (Leeds, N.): As a Member of the Committee, I desire to say a few words on this Motion. I confess I am a little surprised that the hon. Member should have selected this opportunity for bringing forward such a Motion. I can only suppose that it is entirely an after-thought, because I noticed in his speech when he moved the Instruction to the Committee, which was intended to confer on the Conservancy Board enormously larger powers than any they have hitherto had, there never was a single word in his speech or even a suggestion that there should be statutory committees at all. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Argyllshire, who seconded the Motion, occupies quite a unique position, because, although I cannot say he was a Member of the Committee, I cannot say that he was not a Member of the Committee. As a matter of fact, he was a Member of the Committee for one portion of the Bill, though he was not a Member when this portion of the Bill was dealt with. We all, I am sure, regret the loss of his services, and particularly the cause which kept him away. But I am a little surprised, under these conditions and in his position, that he should have found fault with the Committee for not having adopted statutory committees, because the question was before the Committee and was discussed at great length; therefore, the hon. Member who is supporting the Motion, I think I am justified in saying, is condemning the Committee—

SIR D. MACFARLANE: I was not aware that this question had arisen before the Committee, or that evidence was taken on it.

MR. JACKSON: The House must forgive the hon. Member for having seconded the Motion under such conditions. It will, no doubt, attach the weight that ought to be attached to his objection. I am not going to discuss the question on its merits. All I would say is that the question was brought before the Committee, evidence was given, and after most careful attention to that evidence the Committee were unanimously of opinion that it was not necessary or desirable to appoint these statutory committees. I hope the House will support the decision of the Committee. But I should like to point out this fact: The hon. Baronet, I should have thought, had not read the Bill, and certainly not the evidence, because I should contend that the particular objects he desires to attain can be obtained and are obtained by the provisions of the Bill. The hon. Member never said one single word to show us what is the particular virtue of a statutory committee. What is the position with regard to the Board? The Board not only has the power, but by its practice hitherto has managed the lower navigation by a separate committee and has managed the upper navigation by a separate committee.

SIR T. SUTHERLAND: Very badly.

MR. JACKSON: That may be the hon. Member's opinion, but there was not a witness who came forward who charged the Conservancy with neglect of its duty. And I would point out that there were two Members representing directly the shipowners on the Conservancy Board, yet not a word of evidence was given before the Committee to show that these Members had any complaint to make of their colleagues neglecting their duty. Therefore the Board, as constituted under the Bill, may, if it so determines, at the first meeting appoint a separate committee for the lower navigation and a separate committee for the upper navigation; and I would point out that there is an absolute majority on the Board representing the interests of what my hon. Friend would call the lower navigation. Therefore, under no circumstances, unless by their express wish and determination, can there be any other management of the river than by separate committees. I think my hon. Friend will see that his object can be obtained by the Bill if the members of the Board so determine.

Mr. Jackson

SIR T. SUTHERLAND: Money derived from the lower navigation will be spent on the upper navigation.

MR. JACKSON: There again the hon. Member is in error. What he says shows—as I suspected—that he has never read the evidence. Not only has the Board power to appoint separate committees, but the Bill as it came to the Committee proposed the amalgamation of the funds of the upper and lower navigation. The Committee rejected that, and have separated in the Bill the funds of the lower and upper navigation. Therefore, under the Bill nothing can be spent on the upper navigation which is drawn from the lower navigation. The things are to be kept distinct.

SIR T. SUTHERLAND: What about administration expenses?

MR. JACKSON: The proportions are defined by the Bill. The hon. Member may take it from me that in future the funds derived from the lower navigation will be expended on the lower navigation.

SIR T. SUTHERLAND: Will not the lower navigation be laid under contribution for the expenses of the upper river?

MR. JACKSON: Whatever expenses are required for the upper river will be found by the revenue of the upper river.

SIR T. SUTHERLAND: Is that provided in the Bill?

MR. JACKSON: The hon. Member will find it is clearly defined by the Bill how the funds, both from the upper river and the lower river, are to be expended. In the past there have been a certain portion of the central administrative expenses which have been more largely drawn from the lower navigation than from the upper. We have given to the Conservancy Board under this Bill an additional income, which is allocated to the upper portion of the river—

SIR T. SUTHERLAND: Do I understand that the Bill lays down that the revenue of the upper river is to be expended on the upper river, and the revenue of the lower river expended on the lower river, and the expenses of administration shared?

MR. JACKSON: The hon. Member will find that everything he states is carried out by the Bill. It has been said that the limit within which the jurisdiction should extend should be defined. Well, we have defined it. The accounts have been so kept in the past that practically no financial question arises, and I cannot but think that everything my hon. Friend desires by his Resolution can be accomplished by the Bill as it stands, and that the Resolution is absolutely unnecessary. I hope my hon. Friend will withdraw it and allow the Bill to be read a third time.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. BRYCE, Aberdeen, S.) said, no one would dispute the authority of his hon. Friend the Member for Greenock in matters relating to navigation, and if Members were now sitting on the Second Reading of the Bill or upon an inquiry into the question of the best administration of the whole of the River Thames, including the Port of London, there would be a great deal of force in the Resolution. He did not now enter into the merits, because it appeared to him this is not the moment for doing so; but he put it to the hon. Member whether it was possible for him at this stage to convince the House that there was so much validity in his case as to render it desirable to lose the Bill? That was what it practically came to. His hon. Friend asked the House to pass judgment upon a most difficult proposal, which would require elaborate inquiry. It had already been inquired into and reported against by a Select Committee, who had very carefully investigated the whole question during the 28 days they had devoted to the subject. The Bill, everyone admitted, was a most valuable one. The differences were settled on Tuesday last, and the settlement received the sanction of the House. The Bill would be wrecked by the carrying of the Resolution, for there would be much time required by the consideration of the proposals of the hon. Member, and the measure would go so late to the House of Lords and would probably meet with such opposition that it would probably not pass this Session, and all the time and money that had been expended upon it would be lost. He put it to his hon. Friend whether he would not be satisfied with the progress he had made. He would remind him that out of 37 members 24 would directly or indirectly represent the interests of London. That was a very substantial representation for London. He hoped the settlement which had been arrived at would not be disturbed, and that his hon. Friend would be satisfied and withdraw his Motion.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.) said, he supported the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for Greenock, and though he was loth to take up the time of the House, yet he thought hon. Members would admit that the County of Essex, which had a river border of some 60 miles, from the Lea marshes to Shoeburyness, had a right to be heard on this subject. His constituents had suffered a good deal through the want of proper care of the river by the Conservancy. The Member for Uxbridge had said that £79,000 had been spent on the river; all he could say was, speaking from his own personal experience, that they had got very little change for their money. In the lower reaches of the Thames the river was silting up, and their fishing grounds were being destroyed. What the County of Essex asked was to be let alone, and that they should have a free hand to manage their own affairs. The Essex County Council was unanimously in favour of the policy indicated by the Member for Greenock. He did not know what line the London County Council were going to take with regard to the management of the lower reaches of the Thames; but he was bound to say that though he did not as a rule support the London County Council, they had done more than any other body to improve the condition of those parts of the river under their control. He could not understand why his constituents should not be allowed to manage their own part of the river, and he should therefore support the Motion, which he considered would be in the interests of the fishing community and the Port of London.

SIR T. SUTHERLAND said, that after the views expressed on both sides of the House, especially by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, he thought he would best consult the wishes of the House by asking leave to withdraw his Motion.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

(Queen's Consent, and Prince of Wales' Consent, given.)

Bill read the third time, passed.

QUESTIONS.

WELSH BURIAL GROUNDS.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he can inform the House what is the number of the non-parochial burial grounds in Wales attached to chapels or belonging to the various religious denominations; and, if not, whether he will cause a Return to be made of them; and whether the provisions of the Bill before the House for vesting in the Local Authorities the burial grounds attached to churches will apply equally to burial grounds attached to Dissenting chapels?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. ASQUITH, Fife, E.): In reply to the first paragraph, the only authoritative information on the subject is contained in the Return entitled "Population and Burial Places, England and Wales," presented on June 12th, 1877, and I must refer the hon. Member to the figures given in the summary on page 467, which could not be comprised within the reasonable limits of an answer to a question. If the second paragraph relates to Clause 6 of the Established Church (Wales) Bill, my answer must be in the negative.

SMALL HOLDINGS IN SCOTLAND.

MR. SEYMOUR KEAY (Elgin and Nairn): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland, in the case of the ten County Councils who received applications for land under Section 5 of the Small Holdings Act, but who declined to put the Act into operation, whether he will state the number of applications thus received, and the amount of land applied for; whether the inquiries prescribed by the same section of the Act were publicly held; whether evidence was taken and record kept of the proceedings; and from whom were the 86 acres purchased which have been acquired by the County Council of Ross and Cromarty; where are they situated; and what price was paid for them?

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Sir G. TREVELYAN, Glasgow, Bridgeton): In Stirling and Renfrew there were a few applications, not under Section 5, which were fully inquired into. In Orkney there was only one application in respect of which no inquiry was held, in view of the general recommendation of the Small Holdings Committee that the demand for holdings did not justify the Council in putting the Act into operation. In Kirkcudbright one application was received for four acres of land; in Roxburgh four applications, about 138 acres being wanted on lease, and about 30 acres to purchase; in Fife four applications, in three of which two to three acres, and in one 30 acres were applied for; in Bute ten applications, in respect of a total of about 48 acres; in Sutherland 46 applications, but the quantity of land was not always specified; in Elgin two applications, in respect of about 25 acres; and in Argyll, 349 applications in respect of pieces of land varying from two to 60 acres. In the counties of Kirkcudbright, Roxburgh, Elgin, and Argyll, the inquiries prescribed by the Act were publicly held, evidence was taken, and a record kept of the proceedings. In Fife, Bute, and Sutherland, inquiries were duly advertised, applications reported upon by their respective Small Holdings Committees, and Minutes kept of the proceedings; but in Fife no evidence was taken in consequence of the small demand for land; in Bute no public inquiry was held, as the circumstances of the applicants were well known; and in Sutherland, where there was a public inquiry, the petitions were remitted to the proprietors, who replied that there was no land available for breaking up into small holdings. The 86 acres acquired by the County Council of Ross and Cromarty are situated at Knockrast, in the parish of Kiltarn, and were bought at auction for £1,175.

VOLUNTEER LONG SERVICE MEDAL.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, the personal production of a verified certificate of discharge, after 20 years' efficient service in the Volunteer Force, and proof of identity, may be held to be sufficient qualification, other things being suitable, to justify the actual Commanding Officer of the regiment in which the applicant formerly served to recommend him, although not on the rolls for 1st January 1893, for the long service medal?

*SIR F. DIXON-HARTLAND: At the same time, may I ask the right hon. Gentleman if a War Office certificate of 21 years' efficient service, without intermission, will be deemed a satisfactory proof of service for Volunteers' long service medals to be distributed?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Stirling, &c.): As I stated in the Debate on Army Estimates, I have this subject under consideration, and due weight shall be given to the suggestion of the hon. Member for Sheffield. This answer will also apply to the question which stands in the name of the hon. Baronet the Member for Uxbridge.

THE COLONIES AND IMPERIAL DEFENCE.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies if he is now able to fulfil his promise and inform the House what has been the capital expenditure incurred by Canada, Australasia, New Zealand, Cape Colony, and Natal during the past 20 years in the erection and armament of fortifications, ships of war, and other land and sea defences; and what is the annual expenditure to which they subject themselves in and about the maintenance of such defences, and the pay, equipment, and training of regular and auxiliary soldiers and sailors?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (MR. S. BUXTON, Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I have endeavoured to obtain the information desired by the hon. and gallant Member, but I must warn him that I cannot give an exact and categorical answer to his question, for the information at our disposal bearing on the question varies considerably from colony to colony, and does not for the most part go back as far as 20 years. But I may state in round figures that within the last 20 years the Australasian Colonies, including New Zealand, alone have spent at least £3,000,000 in the erection and armament of fortifications, and the Cape Colony £47,000; the total expenditure of Canada, the Australasian Colonies, Cape Colony, and Natal on defence and defence forces for the 10 years ending 1892 was not less than £11,700,000, and their total annual ordinary expenditure at the present time is about £1,200,000.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER (Belfast, W.): If the hon. Gentleman grants a Return will he add to it the amount spent on corresponding services by the United Kingdom?

MR. S. BUXTON: I do not propose to give a Return.

RAILWAY PASSES FOR MILITIAMEN.

MR. DIXON (Birmingham, Edgbaston): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been called to the case of George Henry Harvey, a Militiaman who was recently arrested at Droitwich, and imprisoned, for travelling without a ticket; whether he is aware that Harvey was on his way to join his regiment at Worcester; that he had lost his military warrant; and that he was not allowed to go on to Worcester, where he could have been identified; and whether the War Office will take steps to prevent similar incidents in future?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The rule is that a Militiaman is served with a notice paper requiring him to attend the training of his regiment, but a travelling warrant is not issued with the notice, as the men are only entitled to travelling expenses within the limits of the county. On the notice, however, is a printed instruction showing how the man is to obtain a pass if he has no funds from which to pay for his journey. Harvey did not act upon this instruction, but travelled by railway without a ticket, and on the journey lost the training notice, which would have established his identity. The railway authorities then gave him into custody. On the whole, the present system has worked satisfactorily, and as the troubles of the man referred to arose from his own neglect, no sufficient cause is seen for making an alteration.

ARMY BOOTS.

CAPTAIN NORTON (Newington, W.): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether the boots now supplied to the Army by means of a yearly contract give general satisfaction ; and who is responsible for the proper carrying out of the contract for Army boots, and how are they passed ?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. WOODALL, Hailey) : The boots that are passed for the Army under the present contracts do give satisfaction. The Director of Clothing is the officer responsible that the conditions of the contract are duly carried out ; and the boots are only passed after being "severely" examined by experts under the Inspector of Boots.

METROPOLITAN POLICE BOOTS.

CAPTAIN NORTON : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will have a copy of the conditions of the contract for the supply of boots for the Metropolitan Police furnished to him ; who is the Receiver of Metropolitan Police, what is the amount of his salary, and by whom was he appointed ; who is the Examiner, what is the amount of his salary, and by whom was he appointed ; upon what grounds he bases his non-admission of the statement that there has been marked dissatisfaction throughout the force for many years with respect to the boots supplied ; and, whether he will take steps to hasten the inquiry now said to be taking place in connection with the dissatisfaction as regards these boots, and give immediate publicity to the result of the inquiry ?

MR. ASQUITH : I have already informed my hon. Friend that he can see a copy of the contract for the supply of boots for the Metropolitan Police any day that it is convenient for him to call at the Home Office. The Receiver of Police is under Section X. of the Act 10 Geo. IV., cap. 44, appointed by Her Majesty. The present holder of the office is Mr. Pennefather. The salary attached to the office is £1,200 a year. The present Examiner, Mr. Powell, was appointed by the late Home Secretary on the recommendation of the Receiver of Police. The remuneration is, I am informed, a penny per pair of boots examined, which includes all travelling and other expenses. The assurances which I have received from the Commissioner and Receiver of Police give me very good ground for believing that the men are not dissatisfied with the present contract. The question of the boot supply is before the Commissioner, who thoroughly appreciates its importance ; but, as I have already stated, the contract has three years to run, and cannot be put an end to, even if it were thought to be desirable ; but I am not to be understood as admitting that these complaints are well founded.

CAPTAIN NORTON : Will the right hon. Gentleman supply me with a copy of the contract ? I have no desire merely to see it. I want to take possession of it.

MR. ASQUITH : No. But the hon. Member can see it.

CAPTAIN NORTON : Shall I be permitted to make a copy of it ?

MR. ASQUITH : I will consider that.

ARTILLERY PRACTICE ON THE FIRTH OF CLYDE.

SIR C. CAMERON (Glasgow, College) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he has yet received the Report of the Board of Officers appointed to inquire into the circumstances under which a steamer was struck and seriously injured by a 64-pound shell, fired by a company of the Argyll and Bute Volunteer Artillery during practice on the 18th of May last ; whether it is proposed to compensate the owners of the steamer for the damage sustained ; and whether, in view of the danger arising from the deflection of elongated projectiles by contact with waves, and consequent danger to shipping in crowded waters like the Firth of Clyde, he proposes to issue any new rules for the regulation of Artillery practice over such waters ?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : I have received the Report on this accident, which appears to have been of a most unlooked-for character, but which, fortunately, had very trifling results—a cracked plate in the steamer's side and a small hole, which was stopped with a carrot. The War Office will consider any claim made for cost of repairs. The question of how far the angle of reputed safety should be enlarged, in view of this curious case of ricochet, is under consideration.

Captain Norton

FROZEN MEAT SUPPLIES AT GIBRALTAR.

MR. COLSTON (Gloucester, Thornbury): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether Mr. Cuby undertook to erect freezing chambers at Gibraltar, from plans approved by the Inspector General of Fortifications, for the purpose of supplying the garrison and public with frozen meat; whether an agreement was drawn up by the Governor of Gibraltar, under instructions from the War Office, on the faith of which Mr. Cuby made all arrangements, at considerable expense, for the erection of the necessary buildings; whether the War Office subsequently inserted a clause in the agreement reserving to themselves the right to supply the public out of stores of their own; and whether it is in accordance with Military Regulations for the public to be supplied directly or indirectly from Government stores?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Mr. Cuby is a private individual who is desirous of erecting a freezing chamber at Gibraltar from which frozen meat might be supplied to the civil population and possibly to the garrison of Gibraltar. His plans were approved by the War Office, but the approval was subject to the completion of an agreement, and Mr. Cuby objects to a clause in it which enacts that the contractor to the garrison, who has the use of the Government freezing chamber, may store meat in that chamber, over and above the garrison supply, for sale to the civil population. It is considered that this is an essential condition as tending to cheapen the Government supply, and to encourage the introduction of the new supply of frozen meat at Gibraltar.

BEHAR CADASTRAL SURVEY.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Kent, Faversham): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether Lord Elgin and the Government of India, in their review of the last Annual Report of the Survey Department, censure Sir Charles Elliott and the Government of Bengal for the excessive cost of the initial operations of the Behar Cadastral Survey; what is the actual cost, so far, of those operations; how far is this in excess of the estimated cost, and what proportion does it bear to the probable total cost; whether the Government of Bengal will bear the burden of any costs incurred by them in excess of their estimate; and what decision has been arrived at as to the incidence of the costs generally?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. H. H. FOWLER, Wolverhampton, E.): In reply to the first question, the Government of India, in their review, say—

“The cost rate (of the survey) in Behar is still above the level which it is hoped will be reached when the subordinates have had further practice and experience.”

I do not regard this statement as a censure on Sir C. Elliott and the Government of Bengal. According to the Bengal Director's Report, of which a Government review was published in The Calcutta Gazette of the 6th June, 1894, the expenditure on the Behar Cadastral Survey and Record of Rights has been—from the beginning till 30th September, 1893—District Mozufferpore, Rx.19,252; Districts Sarun and Chumpan, Rx.14,306; total, Rx.33,558. I cannot state precisely what proportion this amount may bear to the total cost that will be incurred. It is expected that the total cost of the operations in North Behar will not, in the end, exceed the estimate of eight annas per acre, given at page 151 of the Parliamentary Paper No. 188, of 1892. I am still in correspondence with the Government of India regarding the shares in the cost to be borne by the Government Treasury, the zemindars, and the ryots respectively.

NAVAL CONSTRUCTION.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty when it is anticipated that the construction of battleship No. 4 will be commenced; and if he can state in what yard it is proposed to carry out the work?

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Sir C. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH, Lancashire, Clitheroe): This battleship is the last of seven included in the Estimates for commencement during the present financial year. At page 206 of those Estimates it is stated that she is to be laid down at Chatham. The time will be early in 1895.

INSANITATION IN THE FINCHLEY ROAD.

MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty) : I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he will take steps to require the newly-built shops and premises on the Grand Parade, Finchley Road, N.W., to be put in a sanitary condition ?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. SHAW-LEFEVRE, Bradford, Central) : The Local Government Board have no jurisdiction in the matter referred to. If the premises are in such a state as to be a nuisance or injurious or dangerous to health, the Sanitary Authority, or on their default the London County Council, can take proceedings to secure the abatement of the nuisance.

ARDCHATTAN EPISCOPAL SCHOOL.

SIR D. MACFARLANE (Argyll) : I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland if an Inspector recently visited the Ardchattan Episcopal School ; and if he can state the substance of the Inspector's Report upon the same ?

SIR G. TREVELYAN : It is the case that the Inspector has recently visited Ardchattan Episcopal School, with a view to inquire as to the attendance. He reports that the attendance has considerably increased ; but he has not yet made his Annual Report on the general work of the school, and it may be well to postpone further consideration of the case until that is received.

GOVERNMENT ADVERTISEMENTS.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury by whom the advertisements on behalf of the various Departments are distributed among the newspapers ; and on what principle they are so distributed ?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. T. HIBBERT, Oldham) : In pursuance of a decision of the late Government in 1888, advertisements on behalf of the various Government Departments are distributed among the newspapers in accordance with instructions given by the Parliamentary heads of those Departments, each of whom is responsible for the choice of newspapers for the purpose, and for the principle on which they are chosen, due regard being had to economy and publicity.

CUMBERLAND ASSIZES AND SESSIONS.

MR. J. W. LOWTHER (Cumberland, Penrith) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that at the last Midsummer Quarter Sessions of the Peace for the County of Cumberland, both the Grand Jury and the whole of the Common Jury Panel were summoned to attend at Carlisle, although there were no prisoners for trial by reason of the fact that the Assizes preceded the Quarter Sessions by a day, and that Her Majesty's Judge of Assize had cleared the gaol ; whether the dates for the holding of Quarter Sessions are fixed by Act of Parliament ; whether the dates for the holding of Assizes are fixed by the Home Secretary ; whether it would be possible to dispense with the attendance of such a large number of farmers and yeomen, at a particularly busy time of the year in the hayfield, when it becomes evident that there is no probability of their services being required ; and with whom, if at all, does such dispensing power rest ?

MR. ASQUITH : The Commission days of Assizes are fixed by the Judges in accordance, so far as may be, with a scheme issued by Order in Council. Quarter Sessions are fixed by the Justices within the limits prescribed by Statute. This Session an Act was passed enabling Justices to alter the time so as to prevent Quarter Sessions from clashing with Assizes ; but the Act only received the Royal Assent on the 1st of June, and was not known to the Justices in time to allow them to make the necessary arrangements in the last Quarter Sessions, and consequently the panel of jurymen was summoned as usual. The difficulty, I hope, is not likely to occur again.

GOVERNMENT MESSENGERS IN GLASGOW.

MR. PARKER SMITH (Lanark, Partick) : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the Treasury Minute of 17th February, 1894, as to office-keepers, messengers, &c., applies to Government offices in Glasgow ; and, if so, when the recommendations, especially that as to length of leave, will be brought into effect ?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: I am not aware to what Government offices in Glasgow my hon. Friend refers; but if he will kindly furnish me with the particulars, I shall be pleased to inquire into the several cases.

THE EDUCATION DEPARTMENT AND SCHOOL GRANTS.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Rochester): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education when the quarterly Return ordered in April last as to the schools from which the Department has threatened to withhold the grant, and which is now due, will be laid upon the Table of the House?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Mr. ACLAND, York, W.R., Rotherham): The Quarterly Return for the three months ended 30th June last has been prepared, and is now being carefully revised, to make sure that it is correct. It will be laid upon the Table of the House in two or three days.

THE CANADIAN CATTLE TRADE.

MR. CHAPLIN (Lincolnshire, Sleaford): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture if he is now able to state the results of the special inquiry into the cases of the Canadian cattle suffering from disease and landed at Liverpool on 6th June and 20th May last; whether the services of the right hon. Member for Bury and Dr. Burdon Sanderson in connection with that inquiry are completed; and, if so, what is the conclusion at which he has arrived; and whether he is aware of the great inconvenience which is occasioned to farmers and others engaged in the cattle trade by the prolonged uncertainty as to his decision?

SIR J. LENG (Dundee): At the same time may, I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, in the inquiry into the recent cases of Canadian cattle suspected to be suffering from contagious pleuro-pneumonia, the lungs were subjected to microscopic examination; whether experts have discovered any bacillus peculiar to contagious, as distinguished from non-contagious, pleuro-pneumonia; whether healthy animals have been inoculated with matter from the lungs of these suspected animals, and with what results; whether any cattle in contact with those from which the lungs were taken had any symptoms of infection; and whether any reports have been received, since these cases occurred, of cases of contagious pleuro-pneumonia in Canada or in the United Kingdom?

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): Could not the right hon. Gentleman remove the restrictions so far as store cattle from Canada are concerned?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. H. GARDNER, Essex, Saffron Walden): Perhaps my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee will allow me at the same time to answer the question on this subject which he has put on the Paper. I very much regret any inconvenience which may have been entailed upon farmers and others by the action I have been obliged to take with regard to the landing of cattle from Canada, but I may remind the right hon. Gentleman that under the law as it stands some uncertainty must of necessity from time to time exist. With regard to the first portion of the question, I am glad to be able to say that, as far as I can see, all the necessary evidence has now been taken as to the morbid appearances present in the lungs of the cattle to which the right hon. Gentleman refers, and I hope that I may shortly be able to lay upon the Table of the House a copy of that evidence and also a Minute embodying the conclusions at which I may arrive thereon. I think that my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee will find that the first three paragraphs of his question are fully dealt with in that evidence and in the Minute to which I have just referred; and in answer to the remainder of his question I may say that no cattle forming part of the cargoes in which disease was detected were found to be affected other than those referred to, and that no reports have been received such as those suggested. I am sorry to inform my hon. Friend the Member for West Aberdeenshire that there does not seem to be any prospect at present of my being able to dispense with the normal statutory requirement of slaughter at the port of landing in the case of cattle imported into this country from Canada.

CHAIRMEN OF DISTRICT COUNCILS AS JUSTICES OF THE PEACE.

MR. RANKIN (Herefordshire, Leominster): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether, under Section 22 of the Local Government Act, 1894, the Chairman of a District Council qualifying as a Justice of the Peace by virtue of his office is entitled to act as a Justice of the Peace for the remainder of his life, or only during such time as his office of Chairman of the District Council shall continue.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE: It is only by virtue of his office that the Chairman of a District Council is a Justice of the Peace for the county in which the district is situate, and therefore when he ceases to be Chairman he ceases to be a Justice of the Peace.

OPEN SPACES AT DEPTFORD.

MR. DARLING (Deptford): I beg to ask the Civil Lord of the Admiralty whether it is the intention of the Admiralty to contribute to the cost of securing land for an open space or recreation ground in the vicinity of the Royal Victualling Yard, Deptford?

THE CIVIL LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. E. ROBERTSON, Dundee): I regret to say that there are no funds at the disposal of the Admiralty from which a grant for the purpose could be made.

THE GREENWICH DISTRICT BOARD.

MR. DARLING: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board when it is intended to give a decision in the matter of the appeal of Mr. J. Belsham, a ratepayer, against certain expenditure of the Greenwich District Board?

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE: Mr. Belsham's appeal is against the allowance of several items of expenditure by the Guardians of the Greenwich Union. There has been considerable correspondence for the purpose of ascertaining the facts, and the information at present before the Board is not sufficient to enable them to decide the appeal; but they expect to be in a position very shortly to give their decision on the several objections which Mr. Belsham has made.

Mr. H. Gardner

THE "COSTA RICA PACKET."

MR. HOGAN (Tipperary, Mid): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Netherlands Government has consented, under certain conditions, to refer its liability in the case of the Costa Rica Packet to arbitration; and, if so, will he state what those conditions are?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir E. GREY, Northumberland, Berwick): The Netherlands Government has suggested arbitration in the case of the Costa Rica Packet, and Her Majesty's Government will consider whether this proposal can be accepted, and, if so, under what conditions.

THE VOLUNTEER CAPITATION GRANT.

MR. COLSTON (Gloucester, Thornbury): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the Capitation Grant paid in April, though calculated upon the return of efficient on the 31st of the previous October, is intended to be a payment, not for past services, but in respect of those about to be rendered in the year then commencing; whether the Volunteer corps in existence when the Capitation Grant was first given in 1862, or those subsequently raised, were ever informed that the grant was a payment in advance, and not one which they had earned, and had a right to expect; and whether, seeing that, if this view is correct, there would be no fund out of which to meet the liabilities of corps should they for any reason be disbanded, he will take steps at the earliest moment to relieve officers of so serious a responsibility, which must still further increase the difficulties of filling the commissioned ranks?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The payment of the Volunteer Capitation Grant made in April is intended to meet the expenses of the year then commencing, although necessarily based upon the statistics of the previous year. The grant was made, in the first instance, not to pay debts which the Volunteers, under the self-supporting system, had already incurred, but to provide for current expenses in the future, and this must have been well understood. Should a corps be unfortunately disbanded its case would be dealt with according to the circumstances.

MR. COLSTON: I should like to inquire whether the same rule applies to the Volunteer corps formed before the first Capitation Grant was made as well as to those formed afterwards?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Oh, yes; I think to all.

A TRADE DISPUTE IN WALES.

MR. RANDELL (Glamorgan, Gower): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that, arising out of a tinplate trade dispute, the workpeople interested held a demonstration at Gorseinon, near Swansea, on the 26th of June last, and, though orderly, were charged and batoned by a small body of police; that many persons who took no part in the proceedings were chased across the common, and severely wounded by the police; that in the early morning of the following day some 18 or 20 tinplate workers were resting in a timber yard by permission of the proprietor, and whilst many of them were asleep, were attacked and bludgeoned over and through a barbed wire fencing which encloses the premises, and seriously injured by the police; can he state at whose instance, and by what authority, this attack was made?

MR. ASQUITH: I am inquiring into this matter, and I shall be obliged to the hon. Member if he will postpone his question.

SWAZILAND.

MR. CAYZER (Barrow-in-Furness): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he is yet in a position to give the House any definite information as to the conditions of the future government of Swaziland; and whether he will lay upon the Table copies of the agreement or the agreements entered into in reference to the same?

MR. S. BUXTON: I stated on Tuesday that the Convention of 1893 had been prolonged for a year, subject to its earlier termination if the Swazis agree to the organic proclamation. I have at the present moment no further information to give, nor can I at present say when I shall be able to lay further Papers.

MR. CAYZER: I would like to ask whether, in the event of Swaziland being placed under the Government of the Transvaal, Her Majesty's Government will make it a condition that British subjects shall not be commandeered for military service or be required to contribute money or goods?

MR. S. BUXTON: We are now in negotiation with the South African Republic for a general convention which will cover Swaziland.

GUNPOWDER IN BRITISH CENTRAL AFRICA.

COMMANDER BETHELL (York, E.R., Holderness): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, whether Her Majesty's Government have received any information from British Central Africa confirming the statements appearing in a Reuter's telegram, dated Blantyre, 13th May—namely, that the German steamer on Lake Nyassa has recently, on more than one occasion, conveyed large quantities of gunpowder to the slave-raiding Arabs in British Central Africa and in Congo Free State; and, if such confirmation has been received, whether Her Majesty's Government will lodge a protest with the German Government against such proceedings?

*SIR E. GREY: The Acting Commissioner in Nyassaland reports that several loads of powder and a native but not a slave caravan are said to have been conveyed across Lake Nyassa in a German steamer and landed, not in British, but in German territory, at a point, however, whence they could easily pass into British territory without inspection. The Acting Commissioner is in friendly communication on this subject with the German authority on the spot, and the German officers on the lake have been, according to our reports, actively and successfully intercepting slave caravans.

DUTIES ON BRITISH GOODS IN SOUTH AFRICA.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, in view of the strong expression of opinion on the part of the authorised representatives of the great self-governing Colonies to the Imperial Conference now sitting in Canada, that a Customs' arrangement between Great Britain and her Colonies, placing trade within the Empire on a more favourable footing than Foreign trade, is advisable, the Secretary of State will reconsider his refusal to assent to the suggestion of the Premier of Cape Colony that a proviso should be inserted in the Agreement with the British South Africa Company that no higher duties than at present or protective duties should ever be levied on British goods in Matabeleland and Mashonaland, whatever change may be made in course of time as to foreign goods?

MR. S. BUXTON : As soon as the proceedings of the Conference are reported to the Secretary of State the resolutions passed will receive the most careful consideration of Her Majesty's Government. The Secretary of State remains of opinion that it is undesirable to raise large questions of fiscal policy on a side issue in the manner that was proposed by the British South Africa Company.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT : Does the Secretary of State withdraw his Despatch?

MR. S. BUXTON : Certainly not.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT : He maintains it, then. I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when the Vote for the Colonial Secretary's salary will be taken?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT, Derby) : I hope very soon.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT : Can the right hon. Gentleman name the exact date?

SIR W. HARCOURT : It is an engagement for which a day cannot be named just yet.

COMMANDEERING IN THE TRANSVAAL.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT (Sheffield, Ecclesall) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether British subjects in the Transvaal are now being commandeered for supplies of money and goods, with no fixed assessment for such commandeering but what is arbitrarily settled by the Boer Field Cornet in command; and what reply has been made to the protest of the British Government?

MR. S. BUXTON : As far as I understand the law, it is as follows : There is no "fixed assessment." The assessment is made by a standing commission in each hamlet or country division, consisting of the Field Cornet and two burghers of the hamlet. The assessment is to be fairly and proportionately made, according to the means of the person commandeered, the levy varying from a minimum of £1 to a maximum of £15. There is a right of appeal to the Council of War, and no contribution appealed against can be actually levied until the decision of the council is given. In regard to the last question, we have not yet received any further reply.

THE ACCIDENT IN A LANARKSHIRE MINE.

MR. CALDWELL (Lanark, Mid) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to an accident which took place at Holm Farm Pit, Lanarkshire, on 27th June last, whereby three men, Edward Branuan, William Stevenson, and Matthew Corbett were killed; and whether he will order a public inquiry into the matter?

MR. ASQUITH : Some delay has been caused in this case owing to the absence of the principal witness in Ireland. The matter is still under the consideration of the Crown Counsel, and perhaps my hon. Friend will repeat his question.

MR. CALDWELL : On Monday.

LEAFLETS ON AGRICULTURE.

MR. HEYWOOD-JOHNSTONE : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture if he has yet been able to make arrangements for the leaflets issued by the Board being obtainable at rural post offices?

MR. H. GARDNER : I am glad to be able to inform the hon. Member that the Postmaster General has readily consented to the proposal to give facilities for the gratuitous distribution of special leaflets issued by the Board of Agriculture through rural post offices, and that arrangements are now being made for the general exhibition of lists both of the leaflets and of the larger publications of the Board.

THE DREDGING OF THE MEDWAY.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Kent, Faversham) : I beg to ask the Civil Lord of the Admiralty whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that, owing to the peculiar zigzag form of the River Medway, it cannot be made deeper, as what is taken out by dredging on one tide is silted up by the next; and, if this is so, whether he will consider the expediency of lengthening the docks at Sheerness, so as to prevent the necessity which now exists of vessels going down the Medway to Chatham for repairs?

MR. E. ROBERTSON: The dredging of the River Medway to deepen the approach to the entrance locks of the basins is proceeding satisfactorily. A considerable portion of the channel has been deepened, and it is not the fact that what is taken out by dredging on one tide is silted by the next. There is no present intention of lengthening the docks at Sheerness.

MERCHANDISE MARKS (CUTLERY) BILL.

MR. STUART-WORTLEY (Sheffield, Hallam): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Board of Trade when he proposes to convene the Select Committee on the Merchandise Marks (Cutlery) Bill?

THE SECRETARY TO THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. BURT, Morpeth): The Bill referred to is not promoted by the Board of Trade, and I do not consider that the duty of convening the Select Committee is one that falls upon me.

MR. STUART-WORTLEY: I would like to ask the hon. Gentleman whether three weeks have not now elapsed since the Committee was nominated on the motion of the Government themselves; whether the Government did not acquiesce in the Second Reading of this Bill after debate; whether the Government did not also discriminate in favour of this Bill, by impeding of another Bill of like object; and if the Secretary to the Board of Trade, being a Member of the Committee, is not responsible for convening of the Committee, who is?

MR. BURT: It is quite true that the Government did not object to the Bill, but that is a very different thing from taking the responsibility for it. I have already said it is not the duty of the Government to convene the Committee, and it is for the hon. Gentleman to find out whose duty it is.

THE PROPOSED NEW POST OFFICE FOR WOLVERHAMPTON.

SIR A. HICKMAN (Wolverhampton, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether a Petition has been received by the Lords of the Treasury from the Corporation of Wolverhampton, setting forth that the erection of a new general post office in that town was decided to be necessary in the year 1891, and that the purchase of land for the purpose was completed in 1892, but that nevertheless the buildings had not been commenced?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: I am very sorry that the erection of the new post office should have been delayed. As intimated in the reply sent to the Memorial of the Corporation, the delay has not been caused by any disregard of the postal convenience of the borough. It has, in fact, been due to the financial exigencies of the year. Orders have, however, been given for the preparation of the plans to be proceeded with at once, but they will require some months for completion, so that I fear it will not be possible to commence the works before the close of this year. They will be pushed on so as, if possible, to make a beginning during the winter months.

SCOTTISH POLICE PENSIONS.

MR. PAUL (Edinburgh, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether he has received a Memorial from the City Police of Edinburgh, praying that as regards pensions the Scottish police may be put on the same footing as the English; whether it is the fact that an English constable may retire with two-thirds of his pay after 25 years' service, while a constable in Scotland must serve 34 years for the same pension, the contribution of both to their respective pension funds being identical; whether in Scotland a constable may not join the force after he is 25 years old, nor leave it with a pension before he is 55, whereas in England there is no limit of age at all, but only a limit of 25 years' service; whether in England a constable incapacitated by infirmity may receive a pension after 15 years' service, whereas in Scotland the period in such cases is 20 years; whether the Inspector of Constabulary for Scotland has reported in favour of removing these and other discrepancies between the police in the two countries; and whether the Government will take steps to remove them?

MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): Before the right hon. Gentleman answers that question, I should like to ask him whether it is not the fact that the scale of pensions in Scotland was settled by a Select Committee under the late Government, and that under that settlement the cost to the people of Scotland is only £40,000 a year, whereas the other scheme would have cost £60,000 a year in addition to the Government grant?

SIR G. TREVELYAN: The facts as stated by the hon. Member are perhaps sufficiently accurate, though, on reference to the Schedules in the respective Acts, I find that the English scales in regard to pension are not so favourable as he represents. My hon. Friend is quite right in saying that the provisions of the Police (Scotland) Act, 1890, were fully considered and approved by a Select Committee of this House, which (with one exception) was entirely composed of Scottish Members. No doubt the general effect of the decision of that Committee was in the direction the hon. Gentleman states. I have received the Memorial referred to, and others from various police forces in Scotland, but none from the Police Authorities themselves, who are also interested parties in the question of pensions. I am unable, therefore, to hold out any present prospect of legislation on the subject.

LIBRARY COMMISSIONERS.

MR. MACDONALD (Tower Hamlets, Bow): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether Library Commissioners, or other similar bodies of Commissioners nominated by London Vestries, necessarily retire from office when the new Local Government Act comes into operation?

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE: I am advised that the Library Commissioners nominated by the London Vestries do not necessarily retire from office when the Vestries are elected under the new Local Government Act.

A STATUE OF OLIVER CROMWELL.

MR. EVERETT (Suffolk, Woodbridge): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether he can arrange to add a statue of Oliver Cromwell to those of the other historical personages whose statues now enrich the precincts of the House?

MR. DARLING: Before this question is answered I would like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the statue of this eminent man is omitted from the roll of other statues on the ground that we learn he was an owner of race horses?

*MR. H. GLADSTONE: The statues erected at the public expense in the Palace of Westminster were, generally speaking, selected in pursuance of recommendations by the Fine Arts Commissioners. In their Fourth Report is a list of distinguished men recommended for selection by a committee of that body, who included Cromwell in a separate schedule of names for which they were not unanimous. William III. was put in the same category, but his statue has since been placed in Westminster Hall. Probably hon. Members would be glad to see a statue of Cromwell, equestrian or otherwise, within or in the neighbourhood of the House. There is no money at present available for this purpose, but I shall be glad to consider the matter.

ASSISTANT WARDERS IN PRISONS.

MR. W. LONG (Liverpool, West Derby): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is now able to make any announcement with regard to the position of the assistant warders in prisons?

MR. ASQUITH: This matter has received my careful consideration, but I am unable to press the Treasury to do more than they have already done, when they had before them the recommendations of the Departmental Committee.

BANKRUPTCY PROCEEDINGS.

MR. HEYWOOD JOHNSTONE: I beg to ask the Attorney General if his attention has been called to the case of Mr. W. E. Warren, late of Iping Paper Mills, Sussex, who was adjudicated a bankrupt 27th August, 1891, he being at the time detained under certificates as a person of unsound mind; and if the jurisdiction of the Judge in Lunacy under Part IV. of the Lunacy Act, 1890 (relating to the management and administration of the affairs of persons lawfully detained as lunatics), is ousted or superseded by the bankruptcy of a lunatic; if he is aware that no person was appointed by the Court to represent the debtor, in accordance with Rule 271 of the Bankruptcy Acts, 1883 and 1890, and that no order was made to dispense with his public examination; whether the estate of an alleged lunatic is liable to be administered in bankruptcy without anyone being appointed to protect his interests, and without any communication being made to the Commissioners or to the Judge in Lunacy, or to the Lord Chancellor; and if he will take steps to secure that when proceedings in bankruptcy are taken against an alleged lunatic, they shall be brought under the knowledge of the Commissioners or of the Judge in Lunacy?

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir J. RIGBY, Forfar): My attention has been called by the question to this case. The hon. Gentleman, I believe, has already been informed by the President of the Board of Trade that no order was made under Section 271 of the Bankruptcy Act in the case. The bankrupt appears to have been for a short time only in the Asylum, and I believe also that no order was made to dispense with the public examination, though he has got his discharge. All the circumstances have been brought before His Honour the County Court Judge, on an application by the bankrupt to cancel the proceedings, and the learned Judge has held that there was no sufficient ground for the application, and that no injustice had been done. With reference to the general question put by the hon. Gentleman in paragraphs 1 and 3, I can answer them generally in the negative. The question of the sufficiency of the provisions contained with reference to persons of unsound mind in the Bankruptcy Act is under the consideration of the Board of Trade. I have no power or jurisdiction to direct the steps suggested in the last paragraph. The matter will be brought again to the attention of the Board of Trade and of the Lord Chancellor.

MR. HEYWOOD-JOHNSTONE: Might I ask if it is any person's business under Rule 271 to apply to the Court to have somebody appointed to represent the lunatic in the bankruptcy proceedings?

SIR J. RIGBY: I am afraid I cannot answer that question without notice.

JABEZ BALFOUR.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: I beg to ask the Attorney General if he can state whether the papers necessary for the institution of proceedings against those responsible for the conduct of the Jabez Balfour Companies were placed before the Law Officers of the Crown eight months ago?

*SIR J. RIGBY: It appears that the matter of the institution of proceedings referred to was informally brought before the Attorney General at the end of January last, and again on the 17th of April last, on which latter occasion he gave directions which are now being acted upon. No papers have been laid before the Law Officers. It is a question for the Attorney General of the time being, and not for the Law Officers as such.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: In consequence of the unsatisfactory reply of the hon. and learned Gentleman, I beg to give notice that on the Vote for the Law Officers' salary I shall call attention to the extreme delay and neglect of the Government in this matter.

THE VACANT LORDSHIP OF APPEAL.

MR. D. A. THOMAS (Merthyr Tydvil): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if it is the fact, as stated in the public Press, that it is not intended to fill up the vacant Lordship of Appeal at present, and, if so, why the appointment is delayed?

SIR W. HARCOURT: If the public Press have made such a statement they are mistaken. I believe the appointment is shortly to be made.

THE CIVILLIST PENSION TO PROFESSOR RHYS-DAVIDS.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether Professor T. W. Rhys-Davids, who has just been granted the largest Civil List Pension given this year, £200, a sixth of the whole sum granted to literary men and women in necessitous circumstances, is the same person as the Professor of a similar name who was formerly in Ceylon, who is in receipt of a salary as secretary of the Royal Asiatic Society, who is under 50 years of age, and who is starting directly after his proposed marriage on a remunerative lecturing tour in America?

MR. PAUL said, before this question was answered, he should like to ask whether Mr. Rhys-Davids was not one of the greatest living Oriental scholars, and one of the greatest authorities on the history of Buddhism, and whether such studies were not as unremunerative to the individual as they were invaluable to the cause of learning and research?

MR. BYLES (York, W.R., Shipley) asked whether, if the pension had been granted for Oriental scholarship, there was any impropriety in the holder of it communicating his special knowledge to the public by means of lectures?

SIR W. HARCOURT: Professor Rhys-Davids is one of the most distinguished Oriental scholars in this country, and the pension referred to was awarded to him mainly on this ground. I believe he is secretary to the Royal Asiatic Society, but I have no information as to his salary, or as to the other circumstances mentioned in the question. Civil List pensions are not intended, as the hon. Member appears to suppose, for "literary men and women in necessitous circumstances." The sixth section of the Civil List Act (1 Vict., cap. 2) provides that they may be granted to

"such persons only as have just claims on the Royal beneficence; or who, by their personal services to the Crown, by the performance of duties to the public, or by their useful discoveries in science and attainments in literature and the arts, have merited the gracious consideration of their Sovereign, and the gratitude of their country."

MR. BARTLEY: Then I presume that the answer to my question is in the affirmative, and that the Professor is one and the same person? I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it is not the fact that practically this bounty has always been given to reward those who were in necessitous circumstances; whether it has never yet been given to persons who are fairly well off and do not require it; and whether there are not a great number of necessitous persons in literature and science to whom this grant would have been of much greater service?

SIR W. HARCOURT: I must answer in the negative every one of these questions. I have never yet heard that the late Lord Tennyson was in necessitous circumstances.

MR. BARTLEY: I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it is not the fact that this Professor is an active member of the National Liberal Club?

[No answer was given.]

COUNTY COUNCILS AND LIGHT RAILWAYS.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT (for Major Rasch): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether County Councils are empowered without further legislation to borrow money from the Board of Works for light railways; and, if so, under what Act they are enabled to rate the districts thereby benefited?

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE (who replied) said: I am not aware of any statutory authority for County Councils borrowing for the purpose of light railways.

EXTON SCHOOL.

VISCOUNT WOLMER (Edinburgh, W.): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether in 1891 the Education Department required the managers of Exton School, near Dulverton, to build a new class room; whether he is aware that the plans were submitted to and approved by the Department, and no suggestion made by it as to a second door or gallery; that the class room was accordingly built in 1891-2; that after the room was built the Department ordered a second door to be made in it in 1893; and that in 1894 it has ordered a gallery to be built; and whether, in view of the fact that both these demands, which might have been easily and cheaply complied with when the room was building, have now been complied with at greater difficulty and cost, he will take steps to secure that greater foresight be shown at the time of making such demands?

MR. ACLAND: In his Report for 1891 Her Majesty's Inspector expressed a hope that the managers of this school would provide a class room, and this they at once proceeded to do, in accordance with plans which were approved. In 1893 plans of the school were sent up in connection with certain alterations in the offices, and the demand for a new door was then made. In his Report for this year Her Majesty's Inspector expresses the opinion that a gallery for the infants would be found beneficial, but the managers have not been required to provide one. I do not understand why the new door was ordered last year, and am making further inquiry. I shall let the noble Lord know when I have ascertained the facts more fully.

SCOTCH PRISONS—MAT-MAKING.

MR. QUILTER (Suffolk, Sudbury): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether he is aware that in Scotch prisons coconut mats and mattings are being manufactured by the prisoners for sale to the detriment of free workmen in those trades, a practice which the late Home Secretary put an end to in England; and whether in Perth Prison such manufacture has been increased by the use of machinery, a principle condemned many years ago in the case of Wakefield Prison?

SIR G. TREVELYAN: The Prisons Commissioners for Scotland inform me that no coconut mattings are made in Scottish prisons, and no machinery is employed at Perth General Prison. Mat-making has been a prison industry for many years, and is considered by the Prison Commissioners to be a useful industry to teach prisoners, in order that they may be able to earn an honest livelihood on discharge. But the manufacture of mats is not carried on to the detriment of free workmen in Scotland. I understand, however, that the whole question of prison labour is under the consideration of a Committee recently appointed by the Home Secretary to inquire into the administration of Prisons in England, and, before considering whether any change should be made, I shall await the recommendation of that Committee.

MR. QUILTER: Are any coconut mats or mattings made for sale in any Scottish prisons?

SIR G. TREVELYAN: In a letter I have received to-day I am informed that no coconut mats are made in Scottish prisons. Whether other kinds of mats are sold I do not know, but it is not done to the detriment of workmen.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

FINANCE BILL.—(No. 303.)

CONSIDERATION. [FOURTH NIGHT.]

Bill, as amended, further considered.

Clause 5.

MR. BYRNE (Essex, Walthamstow) rose to move, in page 4, line 3, after "death," insert—

"If any property settled by a parent upon a son or daughter and the issue of such son or daughter reverts on the death of the deceased (whether by operation of law or otherwise) to the settlor, Estate Duty shall not be payable on such death in respect of such property."

He said, this matter was discussed shortly on the Committee stage, and on the 7th June last the Chancellor of the Exchequer was good enough to say he would consider the matter. He did not know whether the right hon. Gentleman had yet had an opportunity of doing so. Suppose property was settled by a father upon a son or daughter, and the issue of the marriage, and it should happen that the son or daughter died during the lifetime of the parent who settled the property without leaving any issue, the property would revert to the settlor. Under these circumstances, it did not seem fair or reasonable that duty should be payable, inasmuch as the same life would be in being as at the time when the settlement was made, and duty would be payable on his death. In the Succession Duty Act where the predecessor and successor were the same person an exemption was accorded in a similar case to this. If the settlement had really failed altogether, and the property reverted to the settlor, it was only reasonable that in that case no duty should be payable until the settlor died. He begged to move the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 3, after the word "death," to insert the words—

"If any property settled by a parent upon a son or daughter and the issue of such son or daughter reverts on the death of the deceased (whether by operation of law or otherwise) to the settlor, Estate Duty shall not be payable on such death in respect of such property."—(Mr. Byrne.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR J. RIGBY was understood to say that in the case put by the hon. and learned Gentleman, where the predecessor and successor were one and the same person, he did not pay the duty, but they did not consider that the Estate Duty they now proposed to levy was in any way analogous to this case of the Succession Duty. The meaning and intention of the Act was to make this duty analogous in its main features to the Probate Duty.

MR. GRANT LAWSON (York, N.R., Thirsk) said, the Amendment was only a very small instalment of the justice which had been promised in this matter on two occasions during the passage of the Bill. On the 5th of June his right hon. Friend the Member for West Bristol proposed an Amendment to the effect that from Clause 2 should be excluded "property which reverts to any person under disposition made by himself." The Solicitor General then stated that the point referred to would be met by Sub-section 3 of Clause 6, and the right hon. Member for West Bristol said that on that understanding he would withdraw his Amendment. There must be some mistake in the report, for Sub-section 3, Clause 6, did not apply to the case at all, but so the matter was reported in Hansard. On another occasion, June 15, the hon. Member for North St. Pancras moved to exclude from the Estate Duty any property upon which duty would not be payable under Section 12 of the Succession Duty Act, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer said that if the matter were allowed to stand over it would be carefully considered. On that understanding the Amendment was withdrawn. What his hon. and learned Friend now proposed was only a small section of the proposal of his right hon. Friend the Member for West Bristol on June 5th. His hon. and learned Friend only proposed that in the case where the predecessor was the parent and the successor was the child duty should not be payable, whereas the proposal of his right hon. Friend the Member for West Bristol was much wider, covering as it did all cases in which property reverted to any person under disposition made by himself. If the Solicitor General had said that point would be met, perhaps he would now explain where it would be met.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. R. T. REID, Dumfries, &c.) said, the report in Hansard was obviously incorrect, for it represented him as having said that the point would be met by Sub-section 3 of Clause 6, which had no earthly bearing on the subject at all. He certainly never gave a promise that the point would be dealt with. He might have promised that the subject would be considered; and it was considered, like a great number of other points, but the Government did not see their way to accede to the proposal.

MR. T. H. BOLTON (St. Pancras, N.) said, he had a distinct recollection of the Chancellor of the Exchequer having promised that the Amendment which he moved, raising exactly the same point, would be carefully considered. It was understood at the time that that promise meant that the subject was to be brought up again on Report, and that some explanation would be given if the Government were not prepared to make the change suggested. Under the circumstances, he thought some fuller explanation should be given by the Government.

SIR M. HICKS-BEACH (Bristol, W.) said, he felt quite certain that the Solicitor General would have redeemed any promise he might have given. He was bound to say that he was not entirely clear as to what passed on the occasion referred to, as he had not an opportunity of consulting Hansard with regard to it; but his impression was that he then raised the general question as to whether duty should or should not be payable in all cases where property settled by a person returned to that person again. His argument was that duty ought not to be paid under such circumstances. He tried to enforce his argument by taking the case of property which on a marriage was settled by the husband on the wife, and possibly also by the wife on the husband, and which property reverted by death to the husband or the wife, as the case might be; and the Solicitor General, agreeing with the point, dealt with it in a sub-section which was now in the Bill. He could not say that the hon. and learned Gentleman made a promise to deal with every case in which property reverted to a person under disposition made by himself; but he would like to point out that precisely the same argument which justified the insertion of a sub-section in the Bill dealing with the case of a husband and wife justified the adoption of the Amendment now before the House with regard to the case of a parent and child, and was entirely opposed to the argument of the Attorney General that they should in this matter adhere to the line of the Probate Duty, and should not go beyond it.

MR. JAMES LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet) said that, in connection with the alleged promise of the Solicitor General, he agreed with the hon. and learned Gentleman in thinking that incorrect extracts from the Debates should not be taken as sufficient proof of the promise. But so far as his perusal of the extracts from Hansard went, they certainly bore out what his hon. Friend the Member for Thirsk had said, though he had no doubt the quotation was erroneous, for otherwise the Solicitor General would have acted upon it. On the occasion referred to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Bristol drew attention to what was practically the same point that was now under consideration, but said he did not wish to press his Amendment if the Solicitor General would give him an assurance that the point would be dealt with in some other way, as it was a point that should not be left in doubt. Then the Solicitor General was reported to have said—"The point the right hon. Gentleman referred to would be met in Sub-section 3 of Clause 6." That was obviously a mistake, because that part of the Bill did not deal with the subject. But he thought his hon. Friend the Member for Thirsk had made a good point, which was that the Solicitor General was misunderstood not only on the floor of the House, but in the Reporters' Gallery, as having intimated that the point would be dealt with.

MR. R. T. REID said, he had now read the report in Hansard. He was sure that anyone who read it and understood the legal point involved would see that it was incorrect, and that the reporter had of his own sweet will put down what he had got on his notes and left out the rest. The report ran—

"Sir M. Hicks-Beach said, he had handed in an Amendment to the Amendment to add at the end, 'but exclusive of property which reverts to any person under disposition made by himself.' He had asked the Solicitor General a question as to the effect of the Bill on Marriage Settlements—where property through the death of one of the parties to the marriage settlement came to the other party. He had understood the hon. and learned Gentleman to say that in such a case no Estate Duty would be payable. The hon. and learned Gentleman in proof of that had referred to his Amendment to Clause 6. But that Amendment had no reference to the case he (Sir M. Hicks-Beach) was now putting. He did not wish to press his Amendment if the hon. and learned Gentleman would give him an assurance that the point would be dealt with in some other way. It should not be left in doubt."

He (the Solicitor General) was then reported to have said—

"The point the right hon. Gentleman referred to would certainly be met in Sub-section 3 of Clause 6."

He could not have said that, because Sub-section 3 of Clause 6 had no connection with the point. He could only say that if he had a shadow of doubt about the point raised by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Bristol, he would have done what he could to enforce the proposal on his colleagues. But all they could promise at the time was that they would give the Amendment consideration. They had done so, and they were sorry they could not accept the Amendment.

MR. GOSCHEN (St. George's, Hanover Square) said, they quite accepted what was stated by the hon. and learned Gentleman. It was perfectly clear that no promise was given that the matter should be dealt with; but the hon. and learned Gentleman himself admitted that a promise was given that the matter should be fully considered, and he stated that it had been considered. But unfortunately the House had not been told the reasons which had induced the Government to reject the Amendment. No one would have thought from the perfunctory speech of the learned Attorney General that the matter had been carefully considered, because in that speech the only objection urged against the Amendment was that it ran counter to the general principle of the Bill. But that objection must have been known to the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Solicitor General when the promise was given that the point would be carefully considered. Pledges had been given to the House that the matter would be fully considered. The House was entitled to have the result of that consideration fully stated; and some attempt should be made by the Government to convince the Opposition that they were in the wrong. The general question was whether in the cases referred to in the Amendment Estate Duty should be again paid. His hon. and learned Friend who moved the Amendment had made out a case that it should not be paid, and nothing that had fallen from the Government Benches militated in the slightest degree against that case.

SIR J. LUBBOCK (London University) pointed out that his hon. Friend the Member for North St. Pancras had stated to the House that when he brought forward practically the same case in Committee, the Chancellor of the Exchequer promised that he would deal with the matter on Report. He regretted the Chancellor of the Exchequer was not present in the House. Of course, they could not expect the right hon. Gentleman to be always in attendance, but it was rather unfortunate that he was not present at that moment to explain the promise which he was understood to have made to deal with this question on Report. If something was not done in the matter a man would be called upon to pay Estate Duty on what was really his own property. That would be carrying the intention of the Government to an extraordinary extreme, and one that could not be justified.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) said, they had again a reappearance of the musty old argument that this Estate Duty was the analogue of the Probate Duty. It was nothing of the kind; and whatever the Attorney General might say, it was plain from Amendments put down by the Chancellor of the Exchequer and statements made by the right hon. Gentleman over and over again that he did not think it was anything of the kind. If that was the only serious argument against the Amendment then there was no argument at all against it.

Question put.

The House divided :—Ayes 177; Noes 223.—(Division List, No. 170.)

MR. GRANT LAWSON said, that since the last discussion he had been convinced that the pledge the Solicitor General had given did not refer to the subject of which he had spoken.

MR. BYRNE moved, in page 4, line 3, after the word "death," to insert the words—

"If, upon the death of any person, Estate Duty, or Estate Duty and Settlement Estate Duty, become payable in respect of any settled property, the Commissioners may allow such duty or duties, or any part thereof, to be paid (with interest at three per cent. from the time when such duty or duties shall become due) at such time or times during the continuance of the settlement and in such manner as they shall from time to time direct."

Everybody who had had anything to do with the administration of estates knew that occasionally it was not only burdensome in the ordinary sense of the word, but extraordinarily burdensome to pay Death Duty—when the money had to be raised at exorbitant rates of interest. The object of the Amendment was to enable the Commissioners, if they thought a proper case had been made out for it, to postpone during the continuance of the settlement the payment of the duty for such time or times as they thought reasonable. It was left entirely at their discretion. Members must be familiar with cases where the necessity for raising money to pay Death Duties had so impoverished the beneficiary that he had been practically without income for years. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue could tell if they were asked many stories of the hardships involved through making it obligatory to pay duty at a certain specified time or times. Under the Amendment when payment was postponed interest would be charged, so that there would be no loss to the Revenue.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 3, after the word "death," to insert the words—

"If, upon the death of any person, Estate Duty, or Estate Duty and Settlement Estate Duty, become payable in respect of any settled property, the Commissioners may allow such duty or duties, or any part thereof, to be paid (with interest at three per cent. from the time when such duty or duties shall become due) at such time or times during the continuance of the settlement and in such manner as they shall from time to time direct."—(Mr. Byrne.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. R. T. REID said, the House would observe that the hon. and learned Gentleman proposed to allow a discretion to the Commissioners to postpone the payment of the Estate Duty without giving them any guide as to the circumstances under which they ought to exercise that discretion. The result would be that they would be bombarded with applications for permission to postpone payment. The hon. Gentleman had forgotten Clause 8, Sub-section 7, which seemed quite adequate for the purpose the hon. Member had in his mind. The sub-section said—

“Where the Commissioners are satisfied that the Estate Duty on any property cannot be raised at once, they may allow payment to be postponed for such period, to such extent, and on payment of such interest not exceeding four per cent., or any higher interest yielded by the property, and on such terms, as the Commissioners think fit.”

These were words which, if his memory served him right, were inserted in Committee. He was afraid the Government could not go further in the way of concession than they had already gone.

MR. W. LONG (Liverpool, West Derby) said, the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General made two objections to the Amendment. The first was not a very serious one. The hon. and learned Gentleman said there was no guide given to the Commissioners—no rule laid down for them to follow. Surely it would be impossible within the limits of an Amendment to lay down rules for the guidance of the Commissioners. The difficulties that would beset the persons who would have to pay these duties might proceed from very different causes. Sub-section 7 of Clause 8 did not meet the point the Amendment was framed to deal with, for the reason that that sub-section made it a condition that the Commissioners should be satisfied that the Estate Duty could not be raised. That was not the position his hon. and learned Friend took up, and that was not the precise sort of difficulty the hon. Member desired to meet. No doubt, in many cases, it would be possible to raise the duty at the moment, but only at very considerable sacrifice on the part of the unfortunate owner of the property. In the case of real estate, under the existing great agricultural depression, and in view of the burdens that were already weighing heavily upon land, hon. Members would have no difficulty in believing that in order to pay the new Death Duty landowners would frequently have to resort to second mortgages. There were circumstances under which the raising of second mortgages would be almost an impossibility, and, if they were possible, only to be effected at great expense, Those were the cases the hon. and learned Member wished to meet by his Amendment. It had been said repeatedly by the Government themselves that a great deal might be left to the discretion and common-sense of the Commissioners in the administration of this Act. Undoubtedly, however perfect they might seek to make the measure, a great deal would depend upon the way the Commissioners administered it. If they were competent to deal with the complicated and difficult questions they would find submitted to their decision in the Bill, surely they would be competent to exercise a discretion in the matter dealt with in the Amendment. All the hon. and learned Member desired in proposing the Amendment, and all hon. Gentlemen desired in supporting it, was that there were cases of special difficulty, and money could only be raised by casting on unfortunate owners for the time being an unfair burden. The law should not be of a cast-iron character. They desired that the Commissioners should have a discretionary power, and should be able not to remit, but to postpone payment until such a time as there might have been a recovery in the market or an improvement in local circumstances which would enable the landowner to pay. There were cases where properties had large charges on them which were not permanent in their character, but which would terminate at a given period. It might be that a successor coming in would find it almost impossible, or at any rate very difficult, to find the duty in a lump sum or in an annual payment, and still there might be a prospect of improvement in the property which would enable him to pay the money in a year or two. The hon. and learned Member proposed an Amendment to meet these particular cases. They were not likely to be very numerous. He did not think the Government themselves would desire to inflict hardship on the poorer class of owners of property, and yet they would do that if they did not accept this Amendment or something of the kind.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) said, that in throwing over the discretion of the Inland Revenue Commissioners and suggesting that they could not be relied upon unless they were fettered by Clause 8, surely the Government had forgotten Clause 12, which gave the Commissioners absolutely unfettered discretion in far more complicated circumstances and sets of conditions. In that clause there was no restriction on their power at all. Undoubtedly his (Mr. Bowles's) belief was that this Bill would not work at all. It would destroy a nicely-balanced and cleverly-adjusted engine of taxation. He hoped he might prove to be wrong, but certainly if it did work it would be solely and exclusively by virtue of the powers given to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, and largely by Clause 12, which would leave their discretion unfettered. This clause left the discretion unfettered, but limited the period of time during which that discretion would be exercisable. The duty must be paid—early or late—during the continuance of the strike, and that seemed to him to be a most reasonable provision. If the Amendment were not accepted, it would have to be incorporated in the Amending Act which the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer would certainly have to bring in next year if he still occupied his present position on the Treasury Bench. It would be found that the Commissioners would require to have this power. The Amendment was a reasonable one. It would not affect the strong box of the Exchequer. There would not be a halfpenny lost by it; on the contrary, he believed that a great deal of extra duty would be got through it.

SIR M. HICKS-BEACH said, he would make a suggestion to his hon. and learned Friend who had moved the Amendment. After what the Solicitor General had said as to Sub-section 7 of Clause 8, it would be better to raise the real point of difference on that sub-section rather than here. That sub-section was in one respect wider than the proposal of his hon. Friend, as it applied to more than settled property—to all property. The Solicitor General had, very properly, urged that the discretion of the Commissioners should be limited. This might be done, and still the cases referred to by the hon. Member for Liverpool might be covered.

MR. BYRNE said, he would follow the course indicated by his right hon. Friend.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Gibson Bowles

MR. BRODRICK (Surrey, Guildford) said, the Amendment he was about to move was not upon the Paper, but the Solicitor General was aware of its purport. It would be in the recollection of the House that in Committee on the 7th June, at the time the pledge was given by the Solicitor General to which allusion had been made, the subject-matter of this Amendment was deferred to the Report stage. His Amendment dealt with the case where a husband settled upon his wife a sum of money during her life, and over which he had no control. Money was often settled in this way in cases of what was known as "pin money." It would be a hardship that on the death of the wife to whom the money had been given—it might be under marriage settlement—the husband should have to pay Estate Duty on receiving back his own money. This Amendment was different to all the other proposals made in the course of the discussions on the Bill. It could not be said, as was argued in the case of the last Amendment but one, that this was a disposition in place of a disposition by will. Nor could it be settled by the favourite analogy of the Probate Duty, because in a case of this kind no Probate Duty would be payable. If the Estate Duty was on the analogy of the Probate Duty, this particular case ought to be exempted. He had adopted in his Amendment language which would absolutely avoid all collusion between husband and wife at the expense of the Exchequer. The words he proposed were these:—

"If any property settled by a husband upon a wife where possession and enjoyment of the property was bonâ fide assumed by the wife immediately upon the execution of the settlement, and thenceforward retained to the entire exclusion of the husband or of any benefit to him by contract or otherwise, reverts on the death of the wife (whether by operation of law or otherwise) to the settlor, Estate Duty shall not be payable on such death in respect of such property."

It was obvious that the Amendment would not operate unless the husband was free from control of the property, and from any contract which would enable him fraudulently to evade duty, nor would there be any power on his part to obtain custody of the funds pending the death of the wife. For these reasons he thought the Attorney General would do well to favourably consider the Amendment. It was entirely in keeping with the principle which had been laid down on several occasions. It would be politic on the part of the Government to make a concession in this case of the husband and wife, for there was the strongest possible feeling out of doors as to the injustice of the policy of the provisions of the Bill in relation to husband and wife. He felt sure that when the Amending Act, of which the hon. Member for King's Lynn had spoken, was brought in, the relations between husband and wife would be one of the grounds on which it would be proposed. This was a point which, apparently, appealed to everyone but the Law Advisers of the Crown.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 3, after the word "death," to insert the words—

"If any property settled by a husband upon a wife where possession and enjoyment of the property was bonâ fide assumed by the wife immediately upon the execution of the settlement, and thenceforward retained to the entire exclusion of the husband or of any benefit to him by contract or otherwise, reverts on the death of the wife (whether by operation of law or otherwise) to the settlor, Estate Duty shall not be payable on such death in respect of such property."—(Mr. Brodrick.)

SIR J. RIGBY was understood to say, the Government had refused to accept a similar Amendment as to money settled on children, and it would not be logical to accept a proposal as to money settled on the wife. They were now asked to open up once more the question as between husband and wife. Personally, he should be glad to do anything that could be done, but the question was purely one of finance, from which sentiment was shut out.

MR. BYRNE said, he would call attention to what happened on the 7th June on an Amendment moved in Committee by the hon. Member for St. Pancras (Mr. T. H. Bolton) on the 7th June. The Amendment was to exempt property which would have been free from Succession Duty under the 12th section of "The Succession Duty Act, 1858." The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Wight (Sir R. Webster) said on that occasion—

"This was not really Death Duty. Take the case of a father in his lifetime making a settlement upon a son for life of so much money; the son died, and the property came back to the father. There had been no instance there of Death Duty ordinarily leviable, and it had never been treated as succession."

That was analogous to the case under consideration. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was understood to say—

"Lord Stowell, with the object of avoiding Death Duties, made a settlement on his son. The son died intestate, and the father was his heir. The same property thus paid Death Duty on the death of the son and again on the death of the father. The Amendment could not be accepted at once; but, if the matter were allowed to stand over, it should be carefully considered."

The hon. Member for St. Pancras then said—

"On this assurance he was willing to withdraw the Amendment, reserving to himself the right to again bring forward the question on the Report stage if the right hon. Gentleman took an adverse view of it."

In face of this, he (Mr. Byrne) should like to ask if this matter had been considered since, and if the Government had come deliberately to the conclusion, after what took place before, that this was not one of the cases which ought to be exempted exactly as it was exempted from Succession Duty? Apart from precedent or anything which had been said before, he could not help thinking that there were some cases which appealed to one's ordinary sense of justice, and these were amongst them. The State had no right to expect more than the duty on one life. Ordinarily the lives of husband and wife would be regarded as one. They would be approximately of the same age. There were exceptions, no doubt; but on an average they would be of the same age, and if the Government got one duty it was all it had a right to expect.

MR. GOSCHEN (St. George's, Hanover Square) said, he had thought that the Solicitor General would reply to the appeal of his hon. and learned Friend. This appeared to be another of those cases in which the Government, to get out of an awkward position, promised in Committee to favourably consider the matter if the hon. Member would withdraw his Amendment. He should like to be informed whether they had considered the question at all, and, if so, upon what grounds they had come to an unfavourable conclusion with regard to accepting the Amendment? The Attorney General had just told them that it was a question to be determined solely upon the principles of finance, and that, as the Amendment would cause a heavy loss to fall on the Revenue, it could not be accepted. Had the Inland Revenue made an estimate of the loss that would occur if this Amendment were accepted? That seemed to him to be a legitimate comment on the speech of the Attorney General. He would ask the Attorney General if he had the slightest idea of what difference it would really make to the Revenue? When the estimate of the gain by the change in the Death Duties was drawn up did the Inland Revenue take note of the gain which would accrue in the particular case dealt with in the Amendment? If the injustice and inequity of the Bill were removed in the method proposed, the effect on the general finance of the scheme would be but small. This was a case where the hardship would be real if the Bill were unamended, but in which hardship could be avoided without loss to the Revenue. He must repeat his protest in regard to the finance of the Bill. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General said that the Amendment would interfere with finance, but the House had never been told what was the real finance of the Bill. All they were told was that there was to be a million received during the present year, and that the receipts another year would probably be three or four millions—sometimes it was three, sometimes four. There seemed to be great uncertainty in the matter, therefore, to tell them seriously that an Amendment of this kind should be resisted, because it would interfere with the finance of the Bill, was going too far. The Government did not know to a million what next year's finance would be. The House could not shut its eyes to the fact that the Government wanted to get as much money as it could through the Death Duties, but were ignorant of, and could form no estimate as to what would be the effect of this or that clause. They could not if they would form anything like a reliable estimate of the amount of revenue which would be secured under the Bill. They should, therefore, be ready to meet, he would not say hard cases, but hard classes of cases, seeing that they did not know how much money they would want or what the financial result of the Bill would be. The finances of this country were not in such a position that the Government were entitled to refuse equitable demands. No doubt under a certain condition of things it was imperative for the welfare of the country that the Revenue should extract every penny that it could from the taxpayers, but that was not the case now, and he thought, therefore, that the Amendment should be accepted.

Mr. R. T. REID said, it was stated that a promise had been given that this subject should be considered, and he was asked if there had been any special estimate made of the diminution in the Revenue which this Amendment would bring about. The right hon. Gentleman opposite had never been charged with the duties of law officer of the Crown, or he would have known that a law officer had plenty to do without attempting to inform himself as to the financial condition of the country. He had, he thought, himself promised that this matter should be considered. He had brought it to the notice of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and had also taken the opinion of those best able to advise the Government, and he might say that the reasons that had compelled them to refuse this and similar Amendments were many, and of a substantial character. He, however, could state that he had been told by a very competent authority that he had come to the conclusion that if this class of Amendment had been accepted by them the Revenue would have lost fully £3,000,000 a year, and every one of these Amendments, he was sorry to say, had been supported by hon. Gentlemen opposite. If an exemption were once granted in favour of one hardly-treated class of individuals, then where would these remissions cease? No doubt there were many hard cases. The case of a widow who had been left £1,200 or £1,300, with seven or eight children, was a hard one when she was called upon to pay duty—much harder than the case of a man with £60,000 who had to pay duty on his late wife's £1,000 a year pin money passing to him. With every desire to sympathise with hard cases, he could not help pointing out that the Amendment was not restricted to people of small means. No doubt it would only affect a small amount in the aggregate, but the Government felt bound to oppose it for the reasons he had stated.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he had listened with great astonishment to the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General, which astonishment was not at all diminished by the comparison he made between that speech and the speech of the hon. Gentleman's colleague, who opposed the Amendment earlier in the Debate. When the Attorney General was arguing the case he put it exclusively upon the financial loss to the country that would ensue upon the acceptance of the Amendment. Then the Solicitor General got up and said the Law Officers of the Crown could not look into the question of finance. They had too much to do to look into these questions of statistics. Had the Attorney General less to do than the Solicitor General? If not, how came it that the Attorney General had time to inquire into the matter, and to arrive at the conclusion that these cases, although rare, would involve a loss to the Chancellor of the Exchequer which that unfortunate pauper could ill sustain? He passed from that to the detailed argument of the Solicitor General. The hon. and learned Gentleman had been asked whether, in accordance with the promise made on the previous stage of the discussions, the Government had favourably considered the Amendment. The reply was that the Amendment had been considered, but that the Government had been driven to the conclusion that it was not one they could accept. He could not help picturing to himself the council of war when the Law Officers, who confessed that they had no time to attend to financial questions, were discussing the principle of the present Amendment. The financial authorities had considered this Amendment as one of a series which, if they were all carried, would cost the Exchequer £3,000,000 of money, and in addition to that there were certain cases of poverty which might easily be imagined, and which would move hearts the most stony, but which would not be relieved by this Amendment, and perhaps could not be relieved by any other Amendment. In these circumstances, it had been argued that this Amendment must be rejected. Was ever such an argument laid before the House before? The House had to consider these Amendments on their merits and not as forming part of a series. If the House accepted this Amendment, was it thereby driven by the logic which the Attorney General had discarded to accept that other series of Amendments which in their cumulative effect would have a disastrous consequence to the Exchequer? No. This Amendment was one which the House could accept without taking account of the other Amendments proposed dealing with the succession of children and other analogous cases. Would anyone deny that the case of husband and wife was one which was marked off and divided from every other case of succession? Would anybody maintain for one moment that it stood in the same category? It did not, and no one had ever argued that it did. Was there a case more obvious in its justice than this? When a man gave his whole property to his wife, whose whole interests were bound up with his more intimately than that of any other relationship, even more than in the relationship of father and son, was it too much to ask that when the man received back his own property by the death of his wife he should not be asked to pay Estate Duty upon it? The hon. and learned Solicitor General had adverted to the case of a poor widow left with a comparatively small fortune and a very large family. The case of poor widows left with large families was undoubtedly a serious one, but it was not a hardship which could be remedied under the Bill. But simply because they would not under the Bill extend eleemosynary aid to certain embarrassed persons were they to refuse equity and justice in a case like that raised by the Amendment under Debate? He would simply say, in conclusion, that absolutely no argument had been advanced by the hon. and learned Gentlemen opposite dealing with the merits of this Amendment. He trusted the House would vote on this Amendment on its merits.

*MR. LEES KNOWLES (Salford, W.) said, the hon. and learned Member for Walthamstow had put a very modest case before the House, because he had cited the case of a man who only had one wife in his lifetime. But it was quite possible that a man might marry three or four times and settle property on each of his successive wives. Supposing the first wife had property apart from her husband, it would be aggregated with the sum which had been settled, and the husband might be called upon to pay a duty of 8 per cent. The second wife might be in exactly the same position, and in that way the husband might go on paying ad infinitum until he himself died, and then it might be found that all the property settled on his wives had been paid to this greedy Government and the officials at Somerset House in Estate Duty.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) confessed that the case cited by his hon. Friend the Member for West Salford did not enlist his sympathy, because if a man chose to marry half-a-dozen wives in succession it was only fair, especially if they were all millionaires, that he should pay half-a-dozen duties. But his object in rising was to draw attention to the statement of the Solicitor General that the Government had favourably considered and accepted 80 per cent. of the Amendments moved from the Opposition side of the House. If that were true, it at once, in his opinion, disposed of the charge of obstruction levelled against the Opposition, especially if it were remembered in addition that the Government still had on the Paper five pages of their own Amendments. Since, however, the Government had entirely disregarded all rules of logic in the Bill and in their Amendments, he was bound to say that his sympathies were with the Government on this point, though he did not think the Chancellor of the Exchequer had realised how many leaks had been opened up in the Bill, and what an enormous amount of rateable property the right hon. Gentleman had given up. It would be his duty to do his best to indicate those leaks and omissions on the Third Reading of the Bill, by which time the Government would have drawn the noose tight enough for themselves. If a man chose to divest himself of his property in order that his wife might spend it as "pin money," it was only fair that when the wife died, looking to the vast necessities of an almost pauper Chancellor of the Exchequer, the husband should be called upon to pay the duty on the re-transmission of the property. The husband ought, in his opinion, to have given his wife an allowance and should not have made a settlement upon her. Therefore, he was reluctantly compelled to differ from the hon. Members around, not on the ground of logic, but on the ground that the necessities of the Exchequer justified the Government in resisting the Amendment.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 179; Noes 228.—(Division List, No. 171.)

MR. BYRNE then moved, after the word "paying" in the next line (line 4, Clause 5), to insert "any duty payable under this Act." He was not quite certain, after the learned Solicitor General's explanation, whether it was intended that the Settlement Estate Duty should stand, or who the person was by whom it was intended the further Estate Duty was to be payable. He had failed to understand whether any reduction was to be made in respect of further Estate, or Settlement Estate Duty.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 4, after the word "paying," to leave out to the word "upon," in line 5, and insert the words "any duty payable under this Act."—(Mr. Byrne.)

MR. R. T. REID said, the ad valorem stamp was not only in reference to what might be called the further Estate Duty or settlement Estate Duty, but also upon the ordinary Estate Duty. That was the purpose and intention of the words objected to by the hon. and learned Gentleman. There was no reason for deducting the ad valorem Stamp Duty from the amount of the duty chargeable, as in the case of all other property.

MR. BUTCHER (York) could not understand on what principle the Government refused to make a deduction of the ad valorem Stamp Duty. The hon. and learned Solicitor General had forgotten that there was a large class of cases where the further Estate Duty would not be payable when he said it would be deducted when there was the liability. For instance, if a man had settled his property upon his wife for life and then upon his children no settlement Estate Duty would be payable. In a case of that kind there was no conceivable reason why the ad valorem Stamp Duty should not be deducted. When this question was discussed in Committee he was under the impression that this deduction was to be made in all cases, and he had heard no reason brought forward why it should be payable.

Question put, and agreed to.

Page 4, line 7, after "settlement," add "in respect of that property."

MR. R. T. REID moved to add a clause after line 7 in reference to estates settled by Act of Parliament or Royal Grant. He said there were a few estates in this country which had been so settled, either by Act of Parliament or Royal Grant, that the persons successively in possession were not competent to dispose of them within the meaning of this Act. Consequently, unless some such clause as this were inserted, there might be ground for saying that these estates should escape payment of the duty, or that one payment should free them for ever from the Estate Duty, which, of course, was not the intention.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 7, after the word "settlement," to insert the words—

"Where any lands or chattels are so settled, whether by Act of Parliament or Royal Grant, that none of the persons successively in possession thereof are capable of alienating the same, whether his interest is in law a tenancy for life or a tenancy in tail, the provisions of this Act with respect to settled property shall not apply, and the property passing on the death of any person in possession of the lands and chattels shall be the interest in the land and chattels of his successor, and such interest shall be valued, for the purpose of Estate Duty, in like manner as for the purpose of Succession Duty."—(Mr. R. T. Reid.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR R. WEBSTER (Isle of Wight) said, the learned Solicitor General's explanation had rendered further information necessary as to how the interest of the successor was to be calculated—was it on his life interest or on the principal value? It was desirable that the House should be afforded some information as to the scheme upon which Her Majesty's Government proposed the tax should be levied. What was the intention, for instance, in the case of money left for the Public Service? Unless some explanation were given hon. Members would not understand where they were.

*SIR J. RIGBY said, in dealing with the estates in question the Government had fallen back upon the Succession Duty Act, and each successive interest would be calculated upon the present rule, unaltered by this Act; in other words, it would be calculated in the same manner as Succession Duty.

SIR R. WEBSTER asked whether it would be aggregated?

SIR J. RIGBY: Certainly.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES pointed out that this was clearly a case in which, contrary to all the protestations of the Government, duty was to be charged on the interest of the successor, the beneficiary, and not otherwise. In dealing with these hard cases they had had to fall back on that despised Statute, the Succession Duty Act. With these hard cases away went the analogue of the Probate Duty. Here was a case which the Government found themselves unable to deal with under the present Bill. He appealed to the Attorney General and Solicitor General whether, if the sub-section was to apply to perpetual settlements or perpetual pensions, it ought not, when the same state of circumstances arose, to apply to all settlements, and, therefore, he moved to add after "Royal Grant," "or otherwise." The same course should be followed where the circumstances justified it, irrespective of origin, whether the grant originated from Charles II. or any other Royal Sovereign who lavished grants, or whether it emanated from Parliament for public services such as the victory of Trafalgar. Whatever the circumstances under which the grant existed, the Government must fall back upon the Succession Duty Act. He anticipated that the Attorney General felt as he did upon this matter, and that he would accept the Amendment which he proposed—that in line 2, after the word "Royal grants," the words "or otherwise" should be inserted.

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment, in line 2, after the word "grant," to insert the words "or otherwise."—(Mr Gibson Bowles.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'or otherwise' be there inserted."

*SIR J. RIGBY said, that if there were any other possible cases which could be brought within the rule under similar circumstances of Parliamentary sanction there could be no objection to such cases coming under it. But the hon. Member had not mentioned any such cases, and he did not know how they could arise except under similarly special circumstances.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. BARTLEY said, this Amendment raised a question of considerable importance. The Solicitor General had stated that the reason for introducing this clause was that the property referred to could not be sold or alienated; therefore, the Government inserted a clause to get the money in some other way. They had, therefore, got the fact that it was clear to the view of the Government that in the majority of cases the Estate Duty would have to be raised by the sale of the estate. What had happened was that the Government had brought in this Bill, and carried it through to the present point, and then had found out that there were some estates which were unsaleable. Consequently, they wanted to get the money by some other process.

MR. R. T. REID said, the cases under consideration were of a special character. If the estates were not alienable no person was competent to dispose of them. They were so settled that no person could ever be competent to dispose of them, and only one Estate Duty could be got out of them. The estates were perpetual settlements, which were very different from ordinary settlements.

MR. BARTLEY said, the fact was that these estates being perpetually settled there would be no practical possibility of raising the money to pay the Estate Duty, and consequently the Government said, "We shall lose our duties on these estates unless we find some other means of raising the money." They had been arguing that for the last three weeks, and saying that such must be the result of the measure. He was not going to say whether it was a good or a bad thing that estates should be sold in order to pay the duty, but they had, at all events, got an admission out of the Government.

MR. BYRNE said, he supposed that at present Succession Duty was payable in respect of persons succeeding to an estate. He saw no negative movement on the part of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, and he took it that the interests of the successors were now subject to payment of Succession Duty. The Government said by their Bill that they could not impose Estate Duty on estates of this kind, but they did propose to more than double the Estate Duty at present payable. So that they must bear in mind that if this clause was passed a person who had a limited interest might have to pay Succession Duty where no Estate Duty could be charged upon the corpus of the property, at a rate of double the Succession Duty now payable. That had all to come out of the limited interest which was alienable. That appeared to him to be a most unfair proposition. The clause would bear very heavily and unfairly on those successors to the description of interests or property referred to who had no independent means of paying the heavy duty to be imposed.

COLONEL KENYON-SLANEY (Shropshire, Newport) said, they had heard time after time in the course of this Debate that if an estate should be so situated that it could not pay Succession Duty the Government could come down upon the estate itself. Assuming that Estate Duty was demanded, he wanted to know what steps would be taken by the Government in order to get the money. He appealed to some Member of the Government to enlighten him and other laymen on the question before the House. Was he to understand that when a man was so situated that he could not pay the duty the Government in the last resort were to come down upon him and compel him to sell his estate? The Government, it seemed to him, had got the whole matter into a hopeless muddle, and it was impossible for a layman to understand how matters stood.

SIR R. WEBSTER said, he understood the observations of the Attorney General as to the reasons why this procedure should be taken when Estate Duty could not be levied in the ordinary way, but the hon. and learned Gentleman said nothing about aggregation or graduation. At present he did not see how that system could be applied to this clause. Was he to understand that the life interest of the successor was to be valued under the Succession Act, and then aggregated to the property of the person who had just died? He should really like to have some simple statement made as to the manner in which it was proposed to carry out the clause.

SIR D. MACFARLANE said, he did not see any hardship or difficulty in the proposal submitted by the Solicitor General. He understood that the duty was not to be charged upon the capital value on an estate but upon the income. If there was no income there would be no duty payable, but if there was an income the owner had eight years in which to pay it. It was perfectly reasonable that the tax should be paid upon an income accruing from an estate the possessor could not sell, but which was as much the property of the successor as the corpus of property which might have been left him by will.

SIR J. RIGBY said, that everything that passed was aggregated for the purposes of the Estate Duty.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, that for the purposes of aggregation the value of these lands and chattels would be reckoned on the principle of the Succession Duty, which he presumed was the principle under which the Succession Duty was dealt with under the existing Act. There was one verbal criticism which had occurred to some of them. He thought it desirable that the clause should be so worded that it could be interpreted by the ordinary lay mind. The words "interest in lands and chattels to his successor" obviously meant the interest of his successor in lands and chattels. He would move after the word "interest" to insert "of his successor."

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment, after the word "interest," to insert the words "of his successor."—
(Mr. J. Lowther.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'of his successor' be there inserted."

SIR J. RIGBY said, he agreed that the right hon. Gentleman's alteration was obviously desirable.

Question put, and agreed to.

COLONEL BRIDGEMAN asked that an answer should be given to the question put by the hon. and gallant Member for North Shropshire.

SIR J. RIGBY said, he was always ready to gratify any hon. Member's reasonable curiosity if his question was couched in the ordinary terms. The hon. and gallant Member had thought fit to say that the Government were in a "hopeless muddle," and a question asked in that way he must decline to answer. As, however, the question had been repeated by another hon. Member he would reply. Unfortunate Dukes, like other people, were liable to be haled before the Courts of Justice, and when they were debtors to the Crown it would be found that there were effective means of making them pay up.

SIR M. HICKS-BEACH said, he must point out that ordinary settlements were, in respect of some of the interests concerned, just as irrevocable as settlements under Act of Parliament or Royal Grant. A person succeeding to a life interest in an estate under an ordinary settlement could not dispose of the estate. Why, then, should he be compelled to pay duty on the principal value of the property and not on his life interest? It was unjust that he should be made to pay on the principal value, and the injustice ought to be patent to the framers of the Amendment under consideration.

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

SIR R. WEBSTER moved, in page 4, line 12, after "property," to leave out to the word "on," in line 13, and insert "passing to him as such." He said this alteration provided that an executor should only be liable to pay Estate Duty in respect of personal property passing to him as executor. The clause as it stood would render an executor liable for Estate Duty in respect of all personal property wherever situate of which the deceased was competent to dispose at the time of his death. The clause would thus make an executor liable in respect of all the personal property of the deceased, whether it could be brought under his control or not. The effect of this provision would be to impede and delay the winding up of estates and to render the discharge of an executor's duty extremely difficult. He really could not understand why a form of words should be insisted upon that would give rise to so much complication.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 12, after the word "property," to leave out to the word "on," in line 13, and insert the words "passing to him as such."—(Sir R. Webster.)

SIR J. RIGBY said, the Government desired that the executor should be liable to the Estate Duty on the property wherever situate which the testator had power to dispose of, and that he should not be liable for a farthing beyond that. The result of adopting this Amendment would certainly be that the authorities would be harassed and delayed in the collection of the duty, and under these circumstances he was sorry to say that he could not assent to the proposal.

MR. LEES KNOWLES (Salford, W.) said, the Attorney General seemed to have omitted to consider the point respecting locality. He (Mr. Knowles) did not object in the least to the executor being rendered liable for the duty on the property of which the testator was competent to dispose; but the difficulty that occurred to him was that such property might be situate in some very distant part. The testator might be possessed of property, say in Russia, and the executor would then be unable to deal with the estate until he knew whether the testator was competent to dispose of such property, of what the property consisted, and the extent or amount of the property. If the words with regard to locality were omitted the difficulty might, to some extent, be avoided.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, it was the duty of the executor to pay the duty in respect of every farthing that came to him as executor, but his moral duty extended no further than that, and his statutory duty ought not to be made to extend beyond his moral duty. The Bill, however, said that he should be liable up to the fullest extent of the property in his possession for all the duty on the deceased's property wherever situate of which the testator was competent to dispose. The deceased person might conceivably leave £1,000,000 in another country and £10,000 here. The duty on the £1,000,000 would be £80,000, and the Inland Revenue authorities would consequently go to the unfortunate executor who had only £10,000 in his hands and say, "We want £80,000 from you, if you please, because other property in another country has not paid the duty." It was evident that this provision was inserted in the Bill on account of the wild, insane, and unfruitful endeavour of the Government to get money out of property which was out of the jurisdiction of the British courts. The Government knew that they would not be able to carry out their desires in this respect, and so they were going to commit highway robbery on the English executor. Such a monstrous proposition was never before made as the proposition that the Inland Revenue authorities should go to the executor and say that every farthing in his hands should be impounded in respect of the duty on foreign property. If a man had £1,000,000 invested abroad and £50,000 invested in this country, he would take the greatest possible care to send the £50,000 out of this country. No reasonable man with common sense would leave £50,000 to be impounded by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue for paying the duty on property with which that £50,000 had nothing to do. He (Mr. Gibson Bowles) could not conceive even the Solicitor General, much less the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, pinning his faith to such a wild, mad project as that which underlay the provisions of this Bill. Let the executor pay the duty on the property that came into his possession, but let the Government abstain from trying to levy duty upon him in respect of property which did not come into his possession—property over which he had no power whatever, and which was situate in another country. The Opposition would divide upon this proposition with all the strength of which they were capable.

MR. GRANT LAWSON pointed out that in the case mentioned by his hon. Friend (Mr. Gibson Bowles) the whole of the £10,000 in this country intended possibly for persons in this country would be collected for duty, and £70,000 of duty would be left outstanding on the £1,000,000 abroad, as it would be impossible to recover any duty from the person who received the £1,000,000.

MR. BOUSFIELD (Hackney, N.) said, he understood that the Attorney General was willing to meet one of the points put by his hon. Friend the Member for King's Lynn (Mr. Gibson Bowles). It had been explained on behalf of the Government that the clause did not mean exactly what it said, and that the executor would not be called upon to pay the £80,000 in the case mentioned by his hon. Friend, but would only be called upon to pay the £10,000 which came into his hands. He wished to know whether a verbal Amendment would be introduced by the Government to make this clear? Would the Solicitor General object to the insertion of some such words as the following "to the extent of the assets over which he has control"? It must be borne in mind that measures of this kind were intended to be understood, not only by lawyers, but by laymen, and he thought the provision ought to be made perfectly clear.

MR. R. T. REID said, he should have thought that every lawyer in the House would have agreed that when the Bill said the executor was to pay certain duty, it meant he was to pay it, not out of his own pocket, but out of the funds which came into his hands as executor. His recollection was that words were introduced into Clause 8 in order to make this point, which was clear already, doubly clear. Unless the English language ceased to have its present meaning the present clause needed no amendment whatever. He would assume that it was desirable to tax the assets in foreign countries of British subjects. He would say nothing about the colonies, but he assumed that nobody wanted to allow a man the day before his death to send all his property over to Calais in order that it might escape duty. That being the case, would any hon. Gentleman suggest how the Exchequer were to get duty on personal free assets situated abroad unless by providing that the executor was to pay duty on them out of the personal free assets in this country? They were there to protect the Revenue. If the duty was to be imposed at all it should not be imposed in such a way as to enable persons to cheat the Revenue by sending the whole of their property abroad, say, a month before death. He would point out to the hon. Gentleman opposite that probate only applied to property within the United Kingdom. In his view, it was trifling with the House to propose Amendments such as this.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 138; Noes 89.—(Division List, No. 172.)

On Motion of MR. R. T. REID, the following Amendment was agreed to:—In Clause 6, page 4, line 15, leave out the first "ou," and insert "in respect of."

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, he wished to move the Amendment standing in the name of the hon. Member for York (Mr. Butcher). He only wished to make one remark, which was that this was the 24th place in which the Government had found themselves obliged to make these verbal Amendments in the Bill.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 18, leave out the word "thereon," and insert the words "in respect thereof."—(Mr. Gibson Bowles.)

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 33, to leave out the words "received or."—(Mr. Johnson-Ferguson.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

MR. R. T. REID said, in line 33 the hon. Gentleman proposed to leave out the words "received or" and afterwards the words "from or," but he did not propose to insert any other words. He thought it would be well to accept these and subsequent Amendments, so that they would run together. The Amendment would be, Clause 6, page 4, line 33, leaving out "received or" and also in line 34 leaving out "from or," then inserting in line 34, "down to and outstanding at," so that the clause would run—

"All income accrued upon the property included therein down to and outstanding at the date of the death."

He thought that was what was meant.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, he thought the matter required some further consideration. The thing was in a great muddle, as he had endeavoured to show. As the hon. and learned Gentleman proposed it, he would provide for the income received and outstanding, but it could not be both received and outstanding.

MR. R. T. REID said, what he proposed was that every estate should include all income accrued therein down to "and outstanding at the date of his death." Anything paid already would not be included, but anything outstanding ought to be included.

MR. BARTLEY said, they had had a good deal of discussion on this, but it appeared to him that "accrued" raised a difficult question. Did it mean that supposing dividends were due three months hence that those would be allotted? Take a dividend due on the 1st June and the death occurred on the 1st April, three months' dividends had accrued, and were they to be taken into account in considering the value of the estate? He thought the words received would be enough.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES asked if it was proposed to leave out the words "received or," as that would meet the case?

MR. R. T. REID: Yes.

MR. FREEMAN-MITFORD asked how it would affect arrears of rent which might never be collected?

MR. R. T. REID: If they were not ultimately received they would be deducted.

MR. BARTLEY said, he should like to press the point as to "accrued dividends."

MR. R. T. REID: In my opinion, what has accrued in this section is what has become payable, and would not include quarterly dividends which were not absolutely payable.

Question put, and negatived.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 35, to leave out from the word "deceased," to end of Sub-section (5), and insert the words—

"(6) Interest at the rate of three per cent. per annum on the Estate Duty shall be paid from the date of the death up to the date of the delivery of the Inland Revenue affidavit or account, or the expiration of six months after the death, whichever first happens, and shall form part of the Estate Duty.

(7) The duty which is to be collected upon an Inland Revenue affidavit or account shall be due on the delivery thereof or on the expiration of six months from the death, whichever first happens.

(8) Provided that the duty due upon an account of real property may, at the option of the person delivering the account, be paid by eight equal yearly instalments, or sixteen half-yearly instalments, with interest at the rate of three per centum per annum from the date of the death less Income Tax, and the first instalment with the said interest shall be due at the expiration of twelve months from the death, and the interest on the unpaid portion of the duty shall be added to each instalment and paid accordingly, but the duty for the time being unpaid, with such interest to the date of payment, may be paid at any time, and in case the property is sold shall be paid on completion of the sale, and if not so paid shall be duty in arrear."—(Mr. R. T. Reid.)

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill," put and negatived.

SIR R. WEBSTER said, he did not rise to move the two Amendments which stood in his name, but the first Amendment which was in the name of the hon. and learned Member for York, and which was to omit Sub-section (6) of the proposed new clause of the Solicitor General. He confessed he thought there must have been some little slip in drafting this Sub-section (6), the result of which would be, if passed, to do that which was absolutely unknown to the law of England—namely, to charge interest on interest. The injustice of charging interest on interest had been recognised so long that except in cases of breach of trust amounting to fraud, compound interest was never charged. By Sub-section (5) of Section (6), the immediately preceding sub-section of this clause as it stood when the Bill left the Committee, interest would be included at the rate of 8 per cent. on the total value of the Estate Duty from the date of death up to the filing of the affidavit or the expiration of six months after the death, whichever should first happen. That having been provided by Sub-section (5) of Section (6), now by the new clause which the Solicitor General had moved, it was proposed that interest at the rate of 3 per cent. on the Estate Duty should be paid from the date of the death up to the date of the delivery of the Inland Revenue affidavit or account, or the expiration of six months after death, whichever first happened. Therefore, as the proposed clause now stood, the Solicitor General was contemplating not only charging interest on the Estate Duty, but interest upon the interest in respect of the Estate Duty. He could not help thinking there must be some slip. He could not see what was the reason of this Sub-section (6) as Sub-section (5) included all the interest which ought to be paid. He, therefore, formally begged to move the omission of the proposed Sub-section (6) in order that they might have an explanation as to why this sub-section was considered necessary.

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment, in line 1, to leave out Sub-section (6).—(Sir R. Webster.)

Question proposed, "That the words '(6) Interest at the rate of three per cent. per annum on the Estate Duty shall' stand part of the proposed Amendment."

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. R. T. REID said, that if the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman were accepted, and they were to leave out Sub-section (6) altogether the effect would be to provide that no interest at all should be paid on the Estate Duty from the date of the death up to the date of the filing of the Inland Revenue affidavit or account. The substance of the Amendment before the House was that the equivalent interest should be paid as was paid in respect of probate, and if they said that interest was not to be charged until that date the result would be that people would have a direct interest in not paying the duty until they were absolutely obliged. He thought the hon. and learned Gentleman could not intend to support an Amendment which would have so deleterious an effect upon the Exchequer. The hon. and learned member had put a different point and he felt a doubt as to whether he could discuss that point on the present Amendment. The point was whether there ought to be interest or compound interest charged after a period of six months, or after the delivery of the Inland Revenue affidavit or account? The hon. and learned Gentleman referred to the condition of this clause as it now stood in the Bill, and he thought it ought to be stated how the clause came to be in the ambiguous shape in which it was at the present moment. The original clause in the Bill proposed to follow the rule of the Probate Act, and to include in the estate all the income that accrued to the date of the delivery of the Inland Revenue affidavit. That was strictly following the precedent of the Probate Duty, and that was that the income would be roughly equivalent to interest at 3 per cent. Mr. Arthur O'Connor, who was in the Chair, ruled one evening that this was out of Order because it was not in compliance with the Resolution arrived at in Committee of the House, and, therefore, they were all considerably put out—"No, no!" Well, of course, it disarranged the scheme of the Bill altogether; and the Government, therefore, at the moment had to deal with the emergency as best they could, and the result had been the difference that there was in the phrasing of the clause. Under the circumstances, the Government had provided that the Estate Duty being payable, as in the case of probate it would be payable, on the death, if it were not paid interest upon it, until the expiration of six months, or the delivery of the Inland Revenue affidavit should be added to the Estate Duty. This provision would practically have the same result as the original scheme proposed by the Government. The interest, of course, would be terminated at any moment that the executor gave in the return of the property to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue. In taking this course the Government had simply followed the analogy of the Probate Duty. He could not help saying that the Amendment now before the House was another instance of the way in which the proposals of the Government were nibbled at at every stage of the passage of the Bill through Committee. If the Amendment were carried it would afford inducement to everybody liable to pay this duty to postpone payment to the last imaginable moment; and he was sure that even hon. Gentlemen opposite, if they came into Office, would be bound in the discharge of their official duty to introduce a Bill to remove so great a temptation to the non-payment of the tax.

MR. BUTCHER said, the hon. and learned Gentleman had not answered the argument that the proposal of the Government amounted to a charge of compound interest. The clause provided that interest should be payable on the Estate Duty from the date of the death to the taking out of the affidavit, or up to six months after the death, and that such interest was to form part of the Estate Duty, and it was also provided in another section that interest at the rate of 4 per cent. would be charged on all arrears of Estate Duty; so that there would be interest upon interest, which would really be compound interest on the Estate Duty. Was there any precedent for this proposal in the whole course of our financial legislation? He knew of no other instance in which the Government had ever imposed compound interest in the case of any duty payable to the Exchequer not having been paid by the appointed time. The Solicitor General did not deal with that point at all; but said that if this clause were struck out one of two things would happen—either no Estate Duty would be charged until the delivery of the account or until six months had elapsed from the date of the death. He did not think that either would be an unreasonable thing to do, because the executor would take six months to find out what the estate consisted of, and having found that out, the Estate Duty would then become payable, and, if not paid, interest could be charged until it was paid. He would ask the Government to accept one of two views—either that Estate Duty should not be payable until six months after the death, or else that the Estate Duty should be payable, and be treated as payable from the death, and that simple interest should run from the death. In the latter case they would not have the unjustifiable expedient of charging compound interest, which was now embodied in the Bill. The Solicitor General objected to leave out the clause because the payment of the duty might be indefinitely postponed. That could not, however, happen, because the executor was bound to deliver his account within six months, and therefore he could not avoid the operation of interest for a longer period than six months.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES pointed out that the sub-section proposed that interest at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum should be charged upon the property between the date of the death and the delivery of the account, which was not to exceed six months, and that that proposal amounted to a compulsory charge of 3 per cent. per annum upon the estate during six months. In other words, the Government which could borrow money at 2 per cent. made, as it were, a compulsory loan to the person accountable for the Estate Duty and charged him 3 per cent. for the enforced accommodation. That, really, was what the proposal amounted to. The executor could not reasonably be expected to bring in his account before six months—in fact, it would be impossible for him to do; and 3 per cent. was, under the circumstances, an extortionate rate of interest to charge him. There was another point on which he desired information. The

“(6) Interest at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum on the Estate Duty shall be paid from the date of the death up to the date of the delivery of the Inland Revenue affidavit or account, or the expiration of six months after the death, which ever first happens, and shall form part of the Estate Duty.”

What was the meaning of the word “account” in the sub-section? It seemed to him that the “account” was used in an ambiguous manner. He wished to know whether, in the present instance, the word meant an account of personal property; or meant, as in another part of the Bill, an account of realty or settled personalty such as did not come within the functions of the executor?

SIR D. MACFARLANE (Argyll) said, he did not think that 3 per cent. was an exorbitant interest to charge under the circumstances. The executor might save the payment of the interest by estimating the amount of duty payable on the estate and handing it over to the Inland Revenue, and he could settle the real amount later on.

MR. BARTLEY considered that the Government, by imposing interest for the first six months, had condescended to a most paltry act. They knew perfectly well that it was impossible for an executor to make any use of the funds of the estate during the first few months; he certainly could not get 3 per cent. on the money, and yet the Government were mean enough to increase the heavy duty already imposed upon the estate by charging a further sum of 3 per cent. interest from the date of death. Of course, the action of the Government was easy of explanation. They wanted to increase the Revenue. He calculated that the Estate Duty would bring in three millions a year, and the interest would amount to an additional £100,000 for the Exchequer. But it was a mean enactment. It seemed to him that the proposal that duty should not be payable for the first six months, and that if not paid by that time interest should then be charged, was both reasonable and just, and he hoped that the Government would see their way to agree to it.

*SIR J. RIGBY said, that at present, in the case of an account for the purposes of Probate Duty, the income of the estate up to the furnishing of the account was brought in and treated as capital. So that the Government had had a precedent when they proposed in Committee that that also should be done in the case of Estate Duty. But, objection having been taken to that system, the Government now proposed, as they could not carry in the actual income of the estate up to the taking out of the affidavit, that in all cases interest at the rate of 3 per cent. should be charged from the date of death on the estate plus the Estate Duty down to the delivery of the affidavit. With reference to the question put by the hon. Member for King's Lynn as to the meaning of the words "the Inland Revenue affidavit or the account," he would point out that they were dealing with two classes of cases. It was correct enough to say that the Inland Revenue affidavit referred to the personal estate that came into the hands of the executor, while the account was brought in with respect to any property as to which Estate Duty was leviable and which was not included in the Inland Revenue account.

MR. BYRNE said, it was all very well from the Revenue point of view to impose this 3 per cent. interest as an equivalent for what the Government originally intended to impose in Committee by means that were not justified by the Resolution of the House. This contention was all very well for the Revenue, but it was rather hard on persons entitled to estates which during the first six months, or even during the first year, did not earn 3 per cent. After the testator's death the executor's duty was to get in the estate; and the money was paid into a bank which in some cases gave a small rate of interest, but which in most cases gave no interest at all. Then, again, the system of aggregation appeared to be forgotten. Under that system the estate that came into the executor's hands bore no relation to the estate on which duty was payable. Estate duty might have to be paid on £50,000, while the money that reached the executor's hands only came to £25,000, the other £25,000 being made up, under the system of aggregation, of property disposed of by the testator in his lifetime by way of settlements. Therefore, double the amount of Estate Duty was payable on the estate that passed; and was it not most unfair and unjust to add 3 per cent. interest to that double amount of Estate Duty? The Solicitor General feared that if the subsection were rejected the payment of the duty would be indefinitely postponed. But there was a method which had been adopted in former cases, by which executors might be tempted to bring in their accounts at an early date, and that was by offering them discount.

Question put.

The House divided :—Ayes 68 ; Noes 125.—(Division List, No. 173.)

SIR R. WEBSTER said, he begged to move the Amendment standing in his name with regard to instalments. He had understood that the case of instalments would be met in the new clauses.

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment, in line 2, after the word "shall," to insert the words "unless the Estate Duty is paid by instalments as hereinafter provided."—(Sir R. Webster.)

Question proposed, "That those words be inserted in the proposed Amendment."

MR. R. T. REID said, the Amendment amounted to this—that interest was not to be paid on real property as between the date of the death and the date of the delivery of the account 12 months later.

MR. BRODRICK said, he would remind the hon. and learned Gentleman of what had already occurred. He (Mr. Brodrick) had brought this matter forward in Committee, and it was recommended on the ground that it was proved that in the case of real property rents were not received in time to enable the interest to be paid except by borrowing.

SIR W. HARCOURT said, the Government were disposed to accept the principle of the Amendments, but thought that the words on the Paper in the name of the Member for Thirsk or the Member for Guildford were preferable to those before the House.

SIR R. WEBSTER said that, under the circumstances, he would withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment to the proposed Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. GRANT LAWSON said, he desired to move the Amendment standing in the name of the Member for the Loughborough Division of Leicestershire.

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment, in line 8, after the word "property," to insert the words "or upon so much of an Inland Revenue Affidavit as relates to chattels real."—(Mr. Grant Lawson.)

Question proposed, "That those words be inserted in the proposed Amendment."

SIR W. HARCOURT said, it would be impossible to accept this proposal, as it would be introducing a system of payment by instalments which had never been practised before.

Question put, and negatived.

SIR R. TEMPLE said, he desired to move an Amendment standing in the name of the hon. Member for King's Lynn (Mr. Gibson Bowles) to strike out from the Solicitor General's Amendment the words after "eight equal yearly instalments," as far as "and the interest on the unpaid portion," &c., and to insert—

"whereof the first instalment shall be due at the expiration of 12 months after the date on which the successor became entitled in possession to his succession, or to the receipt of the income and profit thereof."

sion to his succession, or to the receipt of the income and profit thereof."

He moved this Amendment because it was of a similar character to one he had moved in reference to Sub-section 5 of Clause 6 as it stood in the Bill as amended in Committee. His object was to protest against interest being charged on the eight yearly instalments, or 16 half-yearly instalments, allowed to the executors of landowners. Interest might fairly be charged where the duty might have been paid, but was not paid. That would be a just principle, but in the case of land it could not, in all probability, be said that the owner or the executor could have paid, but had failed to do so. The executor would fail, not through any fault of his own, but because from the nature of the case it was impossible to pay the duty immediately out of the estate. To charge interest, therefore, was nothing else but fiscal rapacity. It was not only severe, but utterly and flagrantly unjust, and he desired to record an emphatic protest against this system of charging interest.

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment, in line 10, to leave out from the word "instalments," to the words "and the," in line 13, and insert the words—

"Whereof the first instalment shall be due at the expiration of twelve months after the date on which the successor became entitled in possession to his succession, or to the receipt of the income and profit thereof."—(Sir R. Temple.)

Question proposed, "That the words down to the word 'date,' in line 11, inclusive, stand part of the proposed Amendment."

SIR W. HARCOURT said, that it was hardly necessary to argue this point again. From the first the principle laid down by the Government had been that all classes of property should contribute equally. According to that principle real property owed the same debt as every other class of property from the time of the death. It was an extraordinary indulgence to allow real property to pay the duty in instalments. Another indulgence had been allowed—perhaps unjustifiably—in then permitting the first twelve months to go without interest. The principle was that all property should pay alike, and he should like to ask on what principle had land the right to be so treated, while a mill or ironworks, neither of which could be sold at once to pay the duty any more than land, had not the same indulgence? He was only astonished that the owners of other forms of property had not complained of the exceptional treatment given to landowners. There were other properties on which it would be quite as difficult to realise the duty as on land which did not receive this indulgence. This Amendment only showed how inveterate was the view of hon. Members opposite that land and land alone should be placed on this exceptional footing.

SIR M. HICKS-BEACH said, the right hon. Gentleman had given another proof that he did not understand his own Bill. His hon. Friend was asking for no special favour for land. He was pleading for real property in which, as a rule, a mill or ironworks were included. The instances given by the Chancellor of the Exchequer—invidious as all his instances were—had nothing to do with the Amendment. If the right hon. Gentleman had said that there were leaseholders who might fairly claim this indulgence, as well as real property owners, he should have been inclined to agree with him. He (Sir M. Hicks-Beach) had raised that very point in Committee. This question had been fully discussed in Committee, and he did not wish to press it further. They had done their best to enforce their view on the Government of the extreme injustice of charging interest on the instalments, as it had never been charged before. In granting the principle of payment by instalments the right hon. Gentleman was granting nothing that realty was not already entitled to. He (Sir M. Hicks-Beach) was afraid it was useless to argue the question. The right hon. Gentleman had hardened his heart, and looked on the question as one merely affecting land, which he wished to treat invidiously. Let them take a Division, and have an end of the matter.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, that as this was really his Amendment, he desired to say a word or two on it before the Division was taken. The Chancellor of the Exchequer did not seem to understand the clause. He had informed them that landed property would have an indulgence, inasmuch as it would not pay duty for 12 months. Nothing of the kind. The account was not to be brought in for 12 months, but interest had to be paid from the date of the death. ["No, no!"] Then he took it the Bill had been amended. The harlequin charges made in the Bill were such that, if one was absent from the House for a moment, he found on his return that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had in the interval adopted some new Protean shapes. Every day the Solicitor General put down 20 or 30 new Amendments.

MR. SPEAKER : Order, order !

MR. GIBSON BOWLES : Well, he understood that the Government had given up the principle that duty was to be charged from the date of the death until the delivery of the account. There was to be no duty paid for 12 months on real property. But that was not enough. Under Clause 18 the first instalment was not due until 12 months from the date when the successor was to come into beneficial enjoyment—not from the date of death. The successor might not come into beneficial enjoyment till the death of the widow of the testator. In one part it was stated that they were going to levy the duty 12 months after such succession, and in the amended clause it was laid down that they were to levy on identically the same property passing on identically the same death under identically the same disposition as Estate Duty in which the Succession Duty was merged. Originally it was intended to levy it on the death, but the Government gave way in one of their Protean Amendments, and now an interval was to be allowed in the case of the Estate Duty in which was merged the Succession Duty. Unless the Amendment were accepted, they would be in the ridiculous position that a Succession Duty of 1 per cent. merged in the Estate Duty would be levied 12 months after the death, while under another clause a Succession Duty of 3 per cent. would be levied 12 months after the successor had come into possession. It seemed to him, therefore, that the Amendment was one which ought to be pressed. Had it not been for the strange experiences they had had of late years he would have been surprised at the failure of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to deal with this point. The Government had enshrined the principle in Clause 18; why should they refuse it admission in the clause under debate?

MR. R. T. REID said, he must remind the hon. Member that this clause dealt with Estate Duty and not with Succession Duty.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: But the Succession Duty is merged in the Estate Duty.

MR. R. T. REID said, that that was not germane to the argument. What had happened was that the Government, in compliance with a promise made by the Secretary of State for India, had considered the matter, and had made the concession that with regard to real property interest should begin to run from 12 months after the death. They were asked how best that could be secured, and they intimated their willingness to accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for Guildford. That concession having been made, an Amendment was moved to substitute for a year after death a year after obtaining possession, which might not be for years after the death. Fair play was a jewel, and he could not think the Opposition would deem it right to follow up the concession just made by pressing this Amendment.

SIR J. LUBBOCK (London University) said, there were a great many surprising things in this Bill, but the one thing that astonished him most of all was the extraordinary animosity which the Chancellor of the Exchequer showed to agricultural land. He not only proposed to tax it unjustly, but he never missed an opportunity of insulting the owners of it. The right hon. Gentleman admitted that it was absolutely necessary in the case of land to give some time for the collection of the revenue, but he still objected to this Amendment, and said he was surprised that a similar advantage had not been claimed for mills and manufacturing property. So far as they were real estate they would come under this clause as it stood. But there were many that were leasehold property, and he confessed he was astonished that none of those who represented manufacturing interests had pointed out the very great inconvenience and loss that would be inflicted on them by levying this duty immediately upon death. In some cases this would involve the suspension of prosperous business. He believed that if manufacturers really understood this they would press on the Government the absolute necessity of accepting the Amendment.

MR. GOSCHEN said, the Government had made a substantial concession by consenting that interest should not be charged for 12 months, and he would therefore advise his hon. Friend behind him not to press the Amendment further. He wished to mark his own sense of the fairness of the Solicitor General and to meet him as far as he could. There were other points on which they still hoped to get concessions and they did not wish to discourage him.

SIR R. TEMPLE said, that after the appeal of the right hon. Gentleman, and in order to encourage the Solicitor General and to fortify him in the course he had begun, he would withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment to the proposed Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendments proposed to the proposed Amendment, in line 11, to leave out the words "of the death," and insert the words "at which the first instalment is due"; and in line 12, to leave out the words "with the said interest." — (Mr. Brodrick.)

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

MR. BUTCHER said, he wished next to move to amend the clause by inserting words that would have the effect of deducting debts due from the deceased to persons domiciled out of the United Kingdom. It would be most unfair to aggregate all the property that a man left without making a deduction for the payment of a man's debts abroad. He could well understand that under the old system, when Probate Duty was only paid on property situated in the United Kingdom, it was reasonable enough not to allow the deduction of debts due out of the United Kingdom. But now, for the first time, duty was to be paid on property situated out of the United Kingdom, and if an executor were to be called upon to pay duty on all such property, why should he not be allowed before payment to deduct the debts due? How would this affect the trading classes? They knew many men who bought their goods abroad and sold them in this country. A man trading with Australia might buy there hides or other articles of commerce and bring them to England. He would owe for them in Australia, but his assets would be situated in England, and the absurd result in the case of his death would be that his executor would actually have to pay duty on property for which money was due to persons out of the United Kingdom. That would hamper foreign trade to a very serious degree. For instance, a man's estate in England might be worth £100,000. But if in respect of it £60,000 was due abroad surely the duty should be payable on the net and not on the gross sum. If it were not for the introduction of the graduated tax there might not be much reason for this Amendment, but the graduated principle having been applied it became incumbent on them to ascertain the net value of an estate before imposing the duty. He personally thought the graduation principle a very excellent one, but it would be extremely unfair in the case of a man whose whole trade was with foreign countries, and whose whole debts were due in foreign countries in respect of goods purchased there, not to take into consideration when charging the Estate Duty the liabilities abroad, which might be very heavy. He asked the House to accept this Amendment, which really could not injure the Exchequer.

Amendment proposed, in page 5, line 18, after the word "debts," to insert the words—

"(including debts due from the deceased, if domiciled in the United Kingdom to persons resident out of the United Kingdom)."—(Mr. Butcher.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. R. T. REID said, there was merit in the Amendment, but there was also the question of time and place. The situation was this: that Clause 6 set forth that in determining the value of an estate deductions should be made, and it indicated what deductions should not be made. Then Section 2 dealt with the case of debts due from the deceased person to persons resident out of the United Kingdom, and the subject was deemed of such importance that 10 or 12 lines of the Bill were devoted to it. But the hon. Member jumped from the end of the first section over all these provisions in order to raise the question on the next clause, thus prejudging the whole case. He was quite prepared to argue the matter if necessary at the proper point, but he did suggest that this was not a convenient time to raise the question.

MR. BUTCHER: On that understanding I ask leave to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. HEYWOOD JOHNSTONE (Sussex, Horsham) said, he had to move an Amendment to the clause providing that, in determining the value of an estate for the purpose of Estate Duty, allowance should be made, not only for funeral expenses and for debts and encumbrances, but also for "the reasonable expenses of any valuation required for the purposes of the Act." A somewhat similar matter, he said, was discussed in Committee, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer on that occasion, after a short Debate, promised to consider it, and to see whether the point could be dealt with on the Report stage. He saw that an Amendment had been put down further on which he presumed was the outcome of the promise made by the right hon. Gentleman; but that Amendment did not, in his opinion, meet the case, because it simply said that where the Commissioners required a valuation to be made by a person named by them the reasonable cost of such valuation should be defrayed by the Commissioners. But that was not at all the question he wished to raise, and therefore he had resolved to bring forward the question again and to take the sense of the House upon it. If it were a concession at all it was one for which they had little reason to be grateful. The Amendment raised a further point, and that was that, in ascertaining the value of the property for the purpose of the Estate Duty, deduction should be made for necessary expenses over which neither the executor nor the successor to the estate could have any control. Surely no hon. Member could object to expenses of necessary valuations being deducted from the amount liable to pay the duty. Unless it was the intention of the Government to screw out the uttermost farthing by imposing expenses which could not be avoided, they would accept the Amendment. When the matter was discussed in Committee he gave some figures, obtained from a trustworthy source—Whitaker's Almanack—as to the cost of these valuations, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer on that occasion seemed inclined to exercise his wit upon them. But he had since obtained the terms upon which a large firm of estate agents did business, and he had also obtained the terms of commission settled by the Institute of Estate and House Agents, and he found that the statistics he gave on the last occasion were perfectly sound. The valuation on personal property would amount to $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on the first £100, and $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on the remainder; and on real property it would be 1 per cent. on the first £1,000, and $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. on the rest. Therefore, in the case of very large estates a considerable sum was involved, and it was surely only reasonable and fair that the cost of the valuation should be paid by the Commissioners when it was made by their direction, and that in calculating the amount liable to duty all necessary expenses over which the executor and successor had no control should be deducted.

"and for the reasonable expenses of any valuation required for the purposes of this Act."—
(Mr. Heywood Johnstone.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. R. T. REID said, the hon. Member would not deny that the matter was fully considered and decided in Committee on the very plain issue that was raised. But of course the hon. Member was quite entitled to raise it again, and he would endeavour to state the reasons of the Government for not accepting the Amendment. In the first place, the proposal was absolutely novel, so far as the payment of Death Duties was concerned. No allowance for any of these expenses had ever been made during the whole time that the probate laws had been in operation in this country; and he failed to see why in this Bill the question should be raised as to deductions of a not very important character, which ought not in his opinion to be allowed. These expenses were, as a rule, a very small affair. Valuations of property were done very cheaply, and were, generally speaking, not a large item of expense to executors. If, however, they were in future to be paid for by the State, he could conceive that it might be a different matter. It was quite true that consideration was promised to be given by the Government to a similar, though really very different proposal—namely, that where the Commissioners asked for a valuation they should pay for it themselves. The Government could not accept the Amendment, and he thought that in a matter of this kind the House might well leave the clause where the law had remained for so many years.

MR. FREEMAN-MITFORD (Warwick, Stratford) said, that in his opinion this Bill altered the whole state of affairs, and the altered circumstances might, he thought, well induce the Government to make some change in the existing law in this respect, inasmuch as a hardship never before encountered might have to be faced by all classes of people. He hoped in the circumstances his hon. Friend would press the matter to a Division.

MR. BANBURY (Camberwell, Peckham) said, with regard to the Solicitor General's statement that these expenses had never been allowed before, valuations would now be constantly made of real property. No doubt the valuation of personal property was a small matter; but here it was proposed to call in estate agents to make quite a different class of valuation. Timber and other kinds of real property would now be the subjects of valuation.

SIR M. HICKS-BEACH (Bristol, W.) felt bound to say that he did not quite agree with his hon. Friend in this matter. He did not think in ordinary cases as between persons accountable for the duty and the Inland Revenue that there would be a necessity for expensive valuations of this kind. The valuation would be made by the agents in charge of the estate, and would go to the Inland Revenue Commissioners, who, if they required a further valuation to be made, would have to pay for it or allow it to the estate. The cases in which a valuation was really necessary were, he thought, provided for by the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite or by the Bill.

MR. BOUSFIELD (Hackney, N.) said, the point raised was not at all the trifling matter it had been represented. It had not been met either by the Solicitor General or by the right hon. Gentleman who had just spoken. It was by no means a trifling matter, but on the contrary, in view of the scheme of graduation, might become a point of importance, and might make all the difference to the beneficiary in the case of a small estate. Why should the Government try to take advantage of an expense of this kind in order to increase, and perhaps double, the amount of duty that might be payable in certain cases? The Government would, he hoped, see their way to make this small concession.

SIR R. WEBSTER pointed out, as it had been said that this question was decided in Committee, that it was then understood that the matter would receive further consideration at the Report stage.

Question put.

MR. GRANT LAWSON moved an Amendment for exemption in the case of marriage settlements. He said that his Amendment was intended to protect, not only from taxation, but from double taxation, a form of marriage settlement which was specially convenient to business men and to the poorer classes of society. When he moved a similar Amendment in Committee it was objected that it would lead to evasion; and therefore he had inserted the provision with respect to the payment of interest by the settlor to the trustees. The sum which the deceased had covenanted to pay by a settlement which he could not get out of should surely be regarded as a debt or incumbrance on the estate, and as such ought to be deducted from its value? If the money were paid off during the lifetime in the case of wealthy settlers the duty would be evaded; but poorer people and those who had the money invested in business might not be able to pay during life; and the consequence of the Government's proposals would be to drive them to the money-lenders. This would not be the cause of arrangements being made for evading duty. People did not settle more money than they could help, and even if they did settle money on marriage they only provided for future taxation. He had altered the form of the Amendment in every way he could to meet the right hon. Gentleman's susceptibilities, and failed to see how any difficulty could arise to prevent his accepting it.

Amendment proposed, in page 5, line 18, after the word "incumbrances," to insert the words—

"and for any sum which the deceased had covenanted to pay on or after his death to the trustees of any settlement made in consideration of marriage, and upon which he had paid interest to such trustees, at the rate of not less than three per centum per annum from the date of such settlement."—(Mr. Grant Lawson.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*SIR J. RIGBY said, this was one of those cases which affected the case of the administrator most directly. The arrangement contemplated by the Amendment would be taken into account by the deceased in the testamentary disposition of his property. It was practically a way of dividing his estate upon his death. It was extensively resorted to, and was, in effect, the same thing as a testamentary disposition. Looking upon that as the substance of the case, he did not see any reason for accepting the Amendment.

MR. GOSCHEN (St. George's, Hanover Square) said, this matter had been referred to several times, and had been promised consideration by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who had admitted there was force in the representations that had been made and the contentions by which they had supported them. He rose simultaneously with the Attorney General in order that the Government might not put its foot down until the case had been argued. He could not agree with the view taken by the Attorney General, because he had omitted to take into account that the effect of the Amendment of his hon. Friend did not only settle the property which was to be parted with at death, but settled the property upon which interest at the rate of 3 per cent. was to be paid. This was not a matter in which the rich had much interest, but it was a matter of vital importance to traders who did not wish at once to take money out of business. He wished the Chancellor of the Exchequer were in his place so that they might be able to make an impression upon him. This was one of the subjects that the right hon. Gentleman did not dismiss with a wave of his hand, but he acknowledged there was great force in the proposal. There was an irrecoverable debt established, and they met the point with regard to evasion by saying that there must be bonâ fide interest paid upon it. Here was a contract with a trustee which was practically equivalent to paying over money. Why then was it not to be treated the same as any other debt? The testator might borrow money and hand it over, and in that case the loan would be treated as a debt. The alternative was that the money must be paid over at once. Many a man of business would be grateful if the making of this form of settlement were facilitated. Did the Chancellor of the Exchequer, because he feared evasion, wish to drive a settlor to take the money out of his business instead of parting with it by instalments? The Chancellor of the Exchequer must remember that if a settlor could make higher interest by retaining his money in his business he would be accumulating more funds upon which he would have to pay Income Tax. The only argument that the Attorney General or any other Minister could bring forward was the argument of evasion; but if the contract was such that no evasion was possible, and interest were paid from the first day of the loan as fixed in the Bill, he did not see how that argument applied. He hoped the Government would not reject this Amendment without full consideration. Right hon. Gentlemen opposite must have seen that they on that side of the House had not been able to support all the Amendments which hon. Members behind them had proposed, and he thought they might fairly take the sense of the House upon this subject without putting any pressure upon them. As he had said, this Amendment was not put forward on behalf of the rich man, but on behalf of those who were not so rich that they could afford to take the money out of their businesses at a given moment. If the Government thought the Amendment of his hon. Friend was not strong enough they might try to strengthen it. He did not ask for any concession or anything that was to be regarded as an indulgence; only that there should be a recognition that this was as much a debt as any other kind of debt.

MR. R. T. REID said, he recollected perfectly well that when this matter was brought forward in Committee it was strongly urged upon the attention of the Government, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer said he would give consideration to the point. That meant that his right hon. Friend would do what lay in his power to overcome the difficulties which presented themselves, particularly the danger of evasion; and if those difficulties could be overcome he would do all he could to meet the desires of hon. Gentlemen opposite. But the authorities at the Exchequer, with whom they had consulted, were struck by the difficulties and the danger of evasion by means of those trusts. They were, in effect, creating the equivalent of a legacy, and the promise to pay was not the same as handing over the cash. The Government had, therefore, come to the conclusion that the adoption of the Amendment would open so wide a door to evasion that a large portion of money which ought not to escape duty would be withdrawn from the payment of duty, with consequent disastrous results to the Revenue.

MR. GRAHAM MURRAY (Bute-shire) said, the Attorney General had got up and rejected this Amendment in a speech in which not a word was said about evasion, and after the powerful appeal of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for St. George's the Solicitor General got up and said they were told by prominent officials of the Treasury that this proposal might, if adopted, lend itself to evasion. They had heard nothing of how this evasion was to take place. The hon. and learned Gentleman said that paying money down was a very different thing from a promise to pay, but there were many cases where a promise to pay, with interest, was equivalent to money. He did not know what Consols were but a promise to pay. It was illogical to say this was not a debt. He would, however, pass from this subject, only reminding the House again that it had not been shown how the suggested evasion was to take place. The Attorney General had told them that when a man promised to pay a certain sum, under a marriage contract, to his son or daughter, he took it into account when he made his testamentary disposition. Was not everybody familiar with the fact that if a son had an advance of £20,000 during his father's life, that was always taken into consideration? If an irrevocable contract was entered into to pay a certain sum on death, coupled with an undertaking to pay interest during lifetime, then the money really passed at the time of the promise and not at the time of death. Commercial men would most feel the hardship, and it was contrary to equity that the sum should not be deducted from the fortune.

MR. COURTNEY said, they had been told that this matter had been raised before. He was bound to say that there seemed to him to be good reason for raising it now, and, seeing what was the character of the arguments which had come from the Law Officers of the Crown, he should think it might be necessary to raise it yet again. It was small encouragement which was given to hon. Members to treat a question of this kind on its merits, not only in face of the attitude of the Government supporters, but having regard to the manner in which it had been dismissed by the Law Officers of the Crown. He contended that not only the sum made under a marriage settlement contemplated by the Amendment of the hon. Member, but the creation of an immediate present obligation, with the covenant attached to pay interest, should be deducted from the estate on which Death Duty had to be paid. A man, on the marriage of his daughter or son, might pay down a sum in cash to trustees, that sum to be taken in ordinary course as a part advance to the child in case of a final bequest by will. Whatever sums of money a father gave his children during his lifetime were, on the other hand, still to be treated as forming no part of his estate at the time of his death. Where was the distinction between the two forms of gift? He admitted that a covenant by a man to pay a certain sum to his children upon his death might in some instances be substituted for a will in order to escape the payment of Estate Duty. No such objection could be raised, however, against a gift under covenant by a man of a sum of money over which he gave up all control, and upon the unpaid portion of which he paid interest regularly. A debt in that case was surely created just as much as if he had paid the money over in cash. Take another example, and suppose, first, that a man covenanted to pay £5,000 to the trustees of his daughter's marriage settlement, and agreed to pay interest until the £5,000 had been handed to them. Then suppose that for some reason or other he preferred to borrow £5,000 from an insurance office and pay it over to the trustees. In the first case the £5,000 would be considered as forming part of his estate at the time of his death and would be liable for Estate Duty, while in the second case the £5,000 he owed the insurance office would be treated as a debt due from the estate and would therefore escape duty. Where was the real difference between the two cases?

MR. BYRNE said, the very principle of deduction was that debts should be deducted. Exceptions were made, and the grounds for the exceptions were that there might be evasion. As regarded a settlement of this description already made, it was an idle thing to say that evasion could have been intended before this Act was passed. He had not heard one single word suggested why the Government should not make an exception here. The truth was, that Sub-section A of Section 7 was framed upon an extraordinary basis. It introduced an entirely new notion about debts and incumbrances. There was substituted for "valuable consideration" "full consideration," and he supposed the unhappy man interested would have to find out whether full consideration was made. A debt of this kind could not be regarded as a testamentary disposition. Such a disposition could be revoked; but this was the creation of a legal obligation in respect to consideration received, and a man could not get rid of it. It was true there were some forms of settlement which might be made the means of evasion, but here there could really be no question of evasion involved.

MR. BARTLEY said, he thought he had some right to speak upon this matter, because on the Committee stage the Chancellor of the Exchequer promised to give some consideration to the point which he raised. The case of Mr. Joseph Whitworth had been mentioned, who left half a million of money to found Scholarships, and covenanted to pay down so many thousand pounds and interest on the remainder until the time of his death. If the clause were not amended in some such way as was now proposed, in the event of a similar case occurring the gift would, on the death of the donor, be treated as still forming part of his estate. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had promised to consider what would be the best form in which to introduce an Amendment into the Bill to provide against such an injustice, but, so far as he was aware, the right hon. Gentleman had done nothing in the matter at all. He hoped that some provision would be made to meet such a case.

COLONEL KENYON - SLANEY (Shropshire, Newport) asked whether the discussion was to be allowed to close without some reply to the able speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bodmin (Mr. Courtney)? [Cries of "Divide!"] The only comments made upon that speech by the supporters of the Government were vague and incoherent cries of "Divide." As far as efforts to try and remove the difficulties which surrounded this measure were concerned, the House had no reason to thank gentlemen of the class to which he alluded. One of the highest authorities in the House had made a perfectly clear, distinct, and unmistakable charge against the Law Officers of the Government. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Courtney) had stated in terms which it was impossible to misunderstand that the Law Officers had evaded their duty of making the point clear. It might possibly be that they had not appreciated the full weight of the arguments which had been used, but there could now be no pretence for saying that those arguments had not come before the House in a clear and unmistakable form.

SIR J. LUBBOCK (London University) said, he must state, in justice to the Attorney General (Sir J. Rigby) and the Solicitor General (Mr. R. T. Reid), that they had both spoken in the Debate, and therefore could not speak again. There had, however, been a most able, and he (Sir J. Lubbock) thought, a most convincing speech from his right hon. Friend (Mr. Courtney), and some reply ought to be given to it. Where was the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Sir W. Harcourt)? Why was he absent from his place throughout the discussion on this Amendment? Of course, the Attorney General and the Solicitor General would have a difficulty in giving way in the absence of the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill. No doubt the Chancellor of the Exchequer was not very far off, and he could surely be asked to return to the House and give an answer to his right hon. Friend (Mr. Courtney). Then there was the Secretary for India (Mr. Fowler). Why could not that right hon. Gentleman say a word? If no one on the Treasury Bench would speak, might not one of the supporters of the Government be asked to make some sort of reply?

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 131; Noes, 161.—(Division List, No. 175.)

SIR R. WEBSTER proposed, in Clause 7, page 5, line 22, after "created," to leave out to "take," in line 24, and insert "for valuable consideration or." He said he failed to understand why the consideration should be one for the deceased's own use and benefit, and he moved the Amendment in order to obtain a distinct understanding on the point.

Amendment proposed, in page 5, line 22, to leave out from the word "created," to the word "take," in line 24, and insert the words "for valuable consideration or."—(Sir R. Webster.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

MR. R. T. REID said, he could not reconcile the hon. and learned Gentlemen's Amendment with his remarks in support of it. The effect of the adoption of the Amendment would be to allow debts which had been created for marriage consideration or for insufficient consideration to be withdrawn from the estate. He did not think it would be considered disrespectful to the Committee if he refrained from repeating on this point arguments which he had already used.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

On the Motion of Mr. R. T. REID, the following Amendment was agreed to :—Page 5, line 22, leave out "otherwise than."

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, he wished to move the omission of the word "full."

MR. R. T. REID, rising to Order, pointed out that that word had already been passed.

MR. SPEAKER : That being so, the Amendment cannot be moved.

On the Motion of Mr. R. T. REID, the following Amendment was agreed to :—Page 5, line 32, before "property," insert "land or other subjects of."

MR. GIBSON BOWLES moved, in page 5, line 33, to leave out Sub-section (2), which provides that an allowance shall not be made in the first instance for debts due from the deceased to persons resident out of the United Kingdom, unless contracted to be paid in the United Kingdom, or charged on property within the United Kingdom, except out of the value of any personal property of the deceased situate out of the United Kingdom on which Estate Duty is paid. He thought that, as soon as property outside the United Kingdom was brought into the net of taxation, the debts due to people outside the United Kingdom must be deducted from the property. The object of the Government was to get at the property, but until the debts had been deducted they would not have got at the property. It was the residue which should be charged.

Amendment proposed, in page 5, line 33, to leave out Sub-section (2) of Clause 7.—(Mr. Gibson Bowles.)

Question proposed, "That the words of the sub-section down to the word 'on,' in line 8, stand part of the Bill."

SIR W. HARCOURT said, he thought an arrangement had been come to on this matter at the suggestion of the hon. Member for Leith and the hon. Member for Hull. The Solicitor General had an Amendment lower down on the Paper which he was about to move, and which would meet the objections to this part of the clause, and as the omission of the sub-section would prevent the moving of that Amendment, he could not accept the hon. Member's Motion.

MR. JACKSON said, he could not understand the distinction drawn between debts at home and debts abroad, and could not see why all debts should not be treated alike, whether home or foreign. He would be glad if the Solicitor General would explain why a distinction was made.

MR. R. T. REID said, the matter simply came to this—the Government did not want to allow a man who had foreign assets and liabilities and British assets and liabilities so to marshal his estate as to pay all the foreign debts out of the English assets and not bring in the foreign assets to assist in meeting the English debts.

MR. BUTCHER said, he did not see why the principle on which debts due at home were allowed to be deducted and debts due abroad were not.

COMMANDER BETHELL said, he would like to know what part of the clause empowered an executor who brought foreign assets into the estate to set off foreign debts against those assets.

MR. FORWOOD said, that under the clause great inconvenience would be caused to the mercantile community.

*SIR J. RIGBY said, the clause permitted an executor to deduct from the value of personal property situate out of the United Kingdom the whole amount of the debts incurred abroad. In the case of goods that had arrived in British ports, but which were not to be paid for here, there would be a repayment of the whole or part of the duty paid in respect of those goods when it was shown that the personal property outside the country was not sufficient in amount to defray their cost. The Government did not intend that money in this country should be devoted to the payment of foreign debts when there were foreign assets with which they could be met.

MR. BARTLEY considered that the effect of the clause would be to hamper trade seriously in many cases.

MR. R. T. REID said, they had been living under the terrible state of things feared by the hon. Member ever since the Probate Duty came into force.

MR. TOMLINSON also thought that the clause would be extremely embarrassing to trade.

Question put.

The House divided :—Ayes 138; Noes 103.—(Division List, No. 176.)

On the Motion of MR. R. T. REID, the following Amendments were agreed to :—

Commander Bethell

"(3) Where the Commissioners are satisfied that any additional expense in administering or realising property has been incurred by reason of the property being situate out of the United Kingdom, they may make an allowance from the value of the property on account of such expense not exceeding in any case five per centum on the value of the property."

Further Proceeding on Consideration, as amended, deferred till To-morrow.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

*Friday, 13th July 1894.*LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL — THE DUCHY OF LANCASTER AND BETTER-MENT.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

*THE EARL OF ONSLOW moved for copies of the correspondence which had passed between the Duchy of Lancaster and the London County Council with reference to the purchase from the Duchy of the reversion to the freehold of property required for widening Wellington Street and the Strand; and as to the conditions imposed by the Duchy against any claim by the London County Council to levy a "betterment" charge on property between Wellington Street, the Strand, Savoy Street, and Wellington Place. He was desirous that the Government should lay on the Table the correspondence, as a Committee of the House had been inquiring into the question of town improvements. Their Report had been presented, and it would probably be necessary for their Lordships' House to take some action in the matter. It was therefore desirable that they should know clearly what was and what was not the opinion of the Government upon the subject, because at present it seemed open to some doubt. The circumstances of the case were these, as far as he had been able to gather: The London County Council had made a proposal to purchase certain property belonging to the Duchy of Lancaster between Wellington Street and Savoy Street on the Waterloo Bridge side of the Strand. The Duchy offered to sell the reversion to the Council for £32,000. That sum the London County Council were prepared to pay, but they wished at the same time to insert a condition that the property of the Duchy should be subject to a charge for betterment should the London County Council Bill pass. To this the Duchy had strongly objected, and then followed a correspondence, with which he hoped the noble Lord would enlighten the House, resulting in an agreement that on payment of £38,000 odd for the property the question of betterment should not apply to the property of the Duchy. He was informed the property was extremely valuable, and was let for £3,400 a year, 20 years' purchase of which would amount to about £87,000, or more than double the amount which the Duchy was asking for it. It was no part of his duty or purpose to inquire whether that was a proper amount to be accepted; all he was concerned with was the question of the application of the betterment principle. Various utterances had been made on the subject by Members of the Government in that House, and the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack had expressed his belief that the principle of betterment was thoroughly sound. It had been dealt with in a Private Bill, and the Secretary of State for India (then President of the Local Government Board) had stated that he was prepared to be guided by some carefully-considered words which had been spoken on the subject, to the effect that where property was permanently increased in value by a public improvement an equitable rate should be levied on the property so improved; and the Leader of the House of Commons had said that what he had to consider was the method to be pursued in order to carry out the principle of betterment. That appeared to be somewhat at variance with the action of the Chancellor of the Duchy, because in a letter (the only one to which he had been able to obtain access) the London County Council wrote to the Duchy Office that they were prepared to purchase the premises on the understanding that the reduction in price was made in lieu of the contribution by the Duchy in respect of betterment; to which they had received a reply that the Duchy Office was no party to any such understanding, and that the Chancellor of the Duchy was not prepared to sanction the importation of the betterment principle into the agreement between the Duchy and the London County Council or to recognise the propriety of its introduction. It appeared to be very much the case mentioned by the noble Earl at the head of the Government some months ago when he said, "We in England had no objection to seeing experiments tried, provided they were not tried upon ourselves"; and it rather appeared as if the Government had no objection to seeing the principle of betterment tried, provided it was not tried upon its own property. Their Lordships would probably think, therefore, it was desirable, before they came to consider the Report of the Committee which had been recently sitting, that they should have a clear statement of the views of the Government upon the application of the betterment principle when it was applied to their own property. With that object he begged to move that a copy of the correspondence which he had mentioned might be laid on the Table of the House.

Moved, "That there be laid before the House correspondence which has passed between the Duchy of Lancaster and the London County Council with reference to the purchase from the Duchy of the reversion to the freehold of property required for widening Wellington Street and the Strand; and as to the conditions imposed by the Duchy against any claim by the London County Council to levy a "betterment" charge on property between Wellington Street, the Strand, Savoy Street, and Wellington Place."—(The Earl of Onslow.)

THE LORD PRIVY SEAL AND CHANCELLOR OF THE DUCHY OF LANCASTER (Lord Tweedmouth): My Lords, I think at any rate the noble Lord has not given a great length of notice of his intention to raise this question. It would have been more convenient if he had given me private notice that he intended to raise it rather than have left me to see it for the first time when I looked at the Papers this morning. However, I do not complain of that, because I am perfectly ready to deal with the question now. I do not think the noble Lord quite appreciates what the duties and functions of the Duchy are. He treats the property of the Duchy as Government property. It appears to me that the duty of the Chancellor of the Duchy is to administer certain Crown property for the benefit of the Crown, and that the opinion of the Government with regard to a particular question concerning it does not come into the matter of their administration of that property. I take it that the duty of the Chancellor of the Duchy is to see that a sufficient margin is made on all occasions for the Duchy, and that the largest sum possible is made available to pay into the Privy Purse at the usual fixed periods of the year. I have no objection to lay this correspondence upon the Table of the

The Earl of Onslow

House; but, at the same time, I must ask your Lordships to bear with me for a few moments while I give some further details with regard to the negotiations in this matter than appear on the paper, because it will be readily understood that negotiations of this kind are not simply carried on upon paper, but also partly by word of mouth between the agents of the two parties concerned. In the first place, I should like to correct an erroneous idea which seems to be entertained by the noble Lord that the stipulation with regard to the waiving of betterment came from the Duchy Office. On the contrary, it came from the London County Council itself. The negotiations have been proceeding for something like two years on this subject, and there has been a considerable amount of correspondence, and many interviews between the agents of the Duchy and the County Council respectively, which eventuated on November 23rd last year in Mr. Young, on behalf of the London County Council, offering to Mr. Boulden, the Chief Surveyor of the Duchy, £24,170 for this property on the distinct understanding that the Duchy should receive the rents during the various existing leases, and that the question of betterment should not thereafter be raised at all. This proposal came from Mr. Young himself, and the offer was declined by the Duchy Office for various reasons, one being that there were various conditions which it did not come within the powers of the Duchy to comply with. They also did not consider the price sufficient. Further negotiations took place between Mr. Boulden and Mr. Young, and Mr. Boulden at last came to the conclusion that about £30,000 would be given willingly by the County Council for this property. Eventually, after further negotiations, on the 24th of January this year, with the sanction of their Chairman, an offer was made to the County Council for this property of £32,000, with this waiving of Betterment Clause put into the proposal, that particular clause being suggested by Mr. Young himself, and not by the Duchy's agents. The Improvements Committee of the London County Council recommended this offer to the County Council itself for acceptance, but among that body a doubt arose with regard to the question of betterment. The proposal was declined, and the matter was referred back to the Improvements Committee to see if they could not come to some other arrangement. The Improvements Committee thereupon informed the Duchy that they were in a great difficulty in consequence of the General Acts of the Council; that they felt they had been extremely well treated in the matter by the Duchy, whose offer they acknowledged was very liberal, but they suggested that some addition should be made to the sum asked by the Duchy, and that the question of betterment should be left alone. The answer of the Duchy was: "We have made you an offer; any other offer should come from you, and you should make a proposal." I may state that the Chairman of the Improvements Committee said in the course of the Debate that they had made an allowance of £8,000 for betterment when they recommended that the offer of £30,000 should be accepted. Again, there were negotiations, and it turned out that Mr. Young's valuation of betterment came to £6,500, and that of Mr. Boulden to £7,000. Eventually it was proposed that £6,760 should be allowed in lieu of betterment on the recommendation of both parties. Accordingly, the matter then stood thus—either that £32,000 should be accepted with a waiver of betterment, or a sum of £38,760 without it. The matter again went before the Improvements Committee, who recommended again that the original offer of £32,000 be accepted. The London County Council then stated that they would have nothing to say to the whole thing, and that they could only consent to the £32,000 provided the waiver of betterment clause was struck out. The Local Board of the Strand, who were to pay one-fourth of the £32,000, refused to pay the one-fourth, and so the matter fell to the ground. As far as I am myself concerned, I can only say that my responsibility in the matter has been that when I came into Office I found this matter still suspended like Mahomet's coffin, and I sent a letter to the London County Council saying that I must have an answer by the 23rd June, because there were tenants of the Duchy to be considered, and proper notice would have to be given them if necessary. Negotiations have been carried on properly, but have been concluded, the result of which will be that, owing to the difficulty which has arisen, this public improvement will be postponed until these leases fall in some 20 years hence. I shall be happy to lay the Papers before the House, and I hope the short statement I have made to your Lordships will be read in with the letters.

*THE EARL OF ONSLOW asked whether the portion of the letter published by the London County Council in which Sir John Engelhardt stated that the Chancellor of the Duchy was not prepared to sanction the importation of the question of betterment into the agreement was adhered to or not? He understood the noble Lord now to state that £32,000 was the sum which the Duchy were prepared to accept if the question of betterment was left out, but £38,700 if it were left in.

LORD TWEEDMOUTH: I am afraid I have not made myself quite clear to the noble Lord. £32,000 was the price with the waiver of betterment; £38,670 with the waiver of betterment clause struck out. It is not our business to express an opinion as to the justice or injustice of betterment. We have to accept the law as it is, and are quite prepared to do so.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: I should be glad to know whether the noble Lord means that the price he insisted upon was a price which was to cover betterment if the question should arise?

LORD TWEEDMOUTH: Certainly, the £38,000 was; the £32,000 was not.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: Then that amounts to a refusal on the part of the Government to submit to be charged for betterment, because they added to the price as much as they expected to have to pay. Do I rightly understand the noble Lord in that sense?

LORD TWEEDMOUTH: No. We were perfectly ready to submit to the charge for betterment, but we were asked by the London County Council to quote the lowest price we could without the betterment charge. It is like any other matter of everyday arrangement between one proprietor and another.

QUESTIONS.

DISEASED SHEEP AT ARDRISHAIG.

SIR D. MACFARLANE (Argyll): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture if any action has been taken in the matter of a complaint forwarded to the Board on 17th April by the Lord Advocate with reference to a case of alleged straying of diseased sheep upon the banks of the canal at Ardrishaig in February last; and whether any prosecution has been instituted; and, if so, with what result?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. H. GARDNER, Essex, Saffron Walden): On receipt of the communication to which my hon. Friend refers I took steps to bring it under the notice of the Argyll County Council, with whom it rests to make regulations for prohibiting or regulating the movement of sheep affected with sheep-scab, and generally to enforce the requirements of the law for the purpose of preventing the spreading of that disease. The County Clerk informs me that no prosecution was instituted by the Executive Committee of the Council in the case in question, the animal not having strayed from the land of the person to whom it belonged.

SIR D. MACFARLANE: Would the right hon. Gentleman ascertain on what public ground the County Council permitted this trespass without prosecuting?

MR. H. GARDNER: I will make further inquiries.

NURSING OF FEVER PATIENTS IN INDIA.

VISCOUNT FOLKESTONE (Wilts, Wilton): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the 13 men of the 1st Battalion Bedfordshire Regiment, now at Noshera in India, who have died of typhoid fever, were nursed by their comrades, as no lady nurses were to be had; will he explain why these orderlies have been refused any extra pay; whether, of the 13, 10 had been recently drafted from England; and can he state what were their ages?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. H. H. FOWLER, Wolverhampton, E.): I have no information as to the case to which the noble Lord refers. It has always been the practice to employ, in addition to the regular attendants of the Army Hospital Corps, and the establishment of lady nurses, a few soldiers, taken from the corps to which the patients belong, to assist in attendance on special cases; and recently extra duty pay has been sanctioned for a limited number of these "orderly comrades."

BURIAL OF SEAMEN AT ANTWERP.

MR. CARVELL WILLIAMS (Notts, Mansfield): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he is aware that in two recent cases of burial of seamen at Antwerp the chaplain of the Mariners' Church was requested to conduct a burial service at the cemetery; but was prevented doing so by the Episcopalian clergyman claiming to officiate; whether Dr. Stanley, the British chaplain at Antwerp, has been requested by Her Majesty's Consul General to conduct the service at the burial of all British seamen buried at that port; whether the Consul General has so acted under the authority of the Foreign Office; and whether steps will be taken to secure for those who have charge of the burial of British seamen at Antwerp, or other foreign ports, the right of having such burial services as they may desire, and conducted by persons of their own choice?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir E. GREY, Northumberland, Berwick): We have no knowledge of the circumstances referred to. There is no British Chaplaincy under Government control at Antwerp. British Consular officers, in case of burials of British subjects in foreign ports, must be guided by the laws in force in those ports. If in the case referred to it is considered that the Consul General has unduly interfered, inquiry will be made if details are supplied to the Foreign Office.

THE EAST INDIAN RAILWAY.

SIR J. KITSON (York, W.R., Colne Valley): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether his attention has been called to the statement made by the Chairman of the East Indian Railway, who asserted, in his address to the shareholders at the last half-yearly meeting, that continued difficulties are met with in obtaining funds from the Government of India to meet the reasonable requirements of traders for increased or improved accommodation, and what is virtually an almost insuperable barrier has been set up against any extension of the undertaking; that the Board still finds the greatest difficulty in obtaining funds from the Government, while even the amount urgently required to provide carriages for the many thousands of passengers who, in the absence of proper vehicles, it has been necessary to carry in goods waggons and cattle trucks, has only been granted after repeated solicitation; and whether he will take measures to remove the difficulties complained of, and afford railway companies in India the means of obtaining readily the necessary additional funds for meeting the requirements arising in the development of traffic on their lines?

MR. H. H. FOWLER: My attention has been called to the statements made by the Chairman of the East Indian Railway Company, in respect to the provision of funds by the Government of India for the purposes of that Company. The East Indian Railway Company is at present under its constitution dependent, for outlay in the nature of capital expenditure, on the limited funds at the disposal of the Government of India for such purposes. It is, in my opinion, very desirable that means should, if possible, be provided by which the requirements of this system may be more largely met in the future, and the subject is now under my consideration in Council. This difficulty does not arise in connection with other Indian Railway Companies, who possess the power under their constitution to raise, with the sanction of the Government, funds for the purposes of their several undertakings.

LAND PURCHASE IN IRELAND.

MR. TULLY (Leitrim, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is prepared to state if the Land Commission are aware that Mr. Samuel Gordon, of Dreeminchin, Newtownmore, a tenant on the Godley Estate, situated in South Leitrim, agreed to purchase his farm under the Land Purchase Act for £250; that he paid his first instalment in the bank on these terms on 19th January, 1891; that the vendor's solicitor afterwards alleged that the purchase money was £304; that in 1892 Mr. Gordon was processed without getting any notice, and obliged on 17th February, 1892, to pay £12 3s. 2d., including 19s. costs; and that on a subsequent occasion he was obliged to pay £1 19s. 9d. costs, and has been lately put to serious expense and law costs owing to the action of the vendor's solicitor; and whether he is prepared to recommend that the Land Commission order a full inquiry into the manner in which the vendor's solicitor has treated the tenants who agreed to purchase their holdings on this estate?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. J. MORLEY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I am informed that the price mentioned in the agreement, which was dated the 22nd April, 1890, is £304, not £250 as stated in the question, and that Mr. Gordon agreed to pay interest on the said sum of £304 at the rate of 4 per cent. from the date of the agreement until the purchase-money was advanced. The advance was not sanctioned until June, 1892, when the price, by agreement, was reduced to £250. The proceedings referred to appear to have been taken by the landlord in the County Court for interest due under the original agreement previously to the sanction of the advance and the agreement to reduce the price. The Land Commissioners have no jurisdiction to interfere with the decrees of the County Court Judge. Owing to an unsettled dispute between the tenant purchasers with regard to turbary, the advance has not yet been made, and no instalment has been paid to the Land Commission as implied in the question.

THE COASTGUARD IN CORNWALL.

MR. LUTTRELL (Devon, Tavistock): I beg to ask the Civil Lord of the Admiralty whether, in view of the strong recommendation at the coroner's inquest on the bodies of the men drowned in the Norwegian ship William, on 29th December last, and of the notoriously dangerous character of the coast, he will consider the advisability of forming a detachment of the Coastguard, to which the rocket apparatus could be supplied, at Crackington Haven, Cornwall; and whether he will take steps to form a Coastguard connection by coast between Bude and Boscastle?

THE CIVIL LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (MR. E. ROBERTSON, Dundee): The objects for which the Coastguard exist are defined by Statute, and are the defence of the coasts of the realm, the more ready manning of the Royal Navy in case of war or sudden emergency, and the protection of the Revenue. The creation of a new Coastguard station between Bude and Boscastle has not been suggested for any of these objects. Where life-saving apparatus are supplied to existing Coastguard stations, they are worked by the men belonging to the station.

NATIVE OUTBREAK IN FIJI.

MR. HOGAN (Tipperary, Mid): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he has any official information that would throw light on the causes of the recent Native outbreak in Fiji, reported in a Reuter's cable message from Auckland dated 9th July; and whether he can confirm or contradict the statement that there is considerable disaffection amongst the Natives of that colony, consequent on their being compelled to pay heavy taxes on the produce that they raise and require for their own sustenance?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (MR. S. BUXTON, Tower Hamlets, Poplar): We have no information in regard to the first point. As regards the second, we have no reason to believe, as far as is officially known, that there is dissatisfaction among the natives of Fiji on account of the methods of taxation enforced.

THE CENTRAL TELEGRAPH OFFICE.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether his attention has been called to the fact that from 8 p.m. to 11 p.m. messages are sent from the Central Telegraph Office to Moorgate Street Buildings Telegraph Office, and are returned again to the former office for delivery in the morning; whether this duplication of work involves an increase of risk and additional expenditure of money, and requires a larger number of men on late duties than if the telegrams were dealt with in the office from which they are ultimately delivered; and whether he will make inquiry into the matter with the view to have this duplication of work avoided?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. A. MORLEY, Nottingham, E.): The arrangement to which the hon. Member refers was made for the convenience of the Service, and I am satisfied that it is economical.

THE CONCILIATION CLAUSE OF THE RAILWAY AND CANAL TRAFFIC ACT.

MR. DODD (Essex, Maldon): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to the Report of his Department, issued in 1894, on the proceedings under the Conciliation Clause of The Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888, and the failure of that clause in the case of the Irish Great Northern Railway Company (No. 11 in the Report) where a complaint of undue preference or unfair treatment was made, and where that Company refused even to attend a conference or pay any regard to the suggestion of the Board of Trade; if so, will he state what he proposed to do, and why he did not make use of the powers given to the Board by Section 6 of the Act of 1873 in that case and take the case up for the complainant, appointing someone to appear and support the complaint before the Railway Commissioners; what number of complaints had, during the 20 years the Board had possessed the power to take up cases of contravention of the Acts against undue or unfair preference, been taken up by the Board and brought before the Commissioners by the Board; and whether he would be willing, if asked for, to furnish a Return of such cases and the result of the action of the Board?

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Kent, Faversham): I should like to ask what steps the right hon. Gentleman is taking to get a decision in the three cases referred to in the Report?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. BRYCE, Aberdeen, S.): I think that is a question of which I had better have notice, as the answer might be too long to give now. As to the question on the Paper, my attention has been called to the Report referred to by my hon. Friend. While I regret very much that the Great Northern of Ireland Railway Company refused to attend the conference proposed by the Board of Trade, I am of opinion that it would not conduce to the successful administration of the clause if the Board of Trade were to apply to the Railway Commissioners under the provisions of Section 6 of the Regulation of Railways Act, 1873, in cases in which they failed to effect an amicable settlement of a complaint made under Section 31 of the Act of 1888. The complainants in this case are the Harbour Commissioners of the City of Londonderry, and it was open to them to take proceedings themselves before the Railway Commission. The Conciliation Clause would lose much, if not all, of its present value if the Board of Trade were to take the course indicated by my hon. Friend. No such complaints as referred to have been taken up by the Board of Trade and brought before the Commissioners.

MR. DODD: May I ask whether the President of the Board of Trade means to say that the Board have had these powers for 20 years, and have not yet put them into force?

MR. BRYCE: The particular power to which my hon. Friend refers has not been put in force, although others have.

THE UMARIA COLLIERIES, CENTRAL INDIA.

MR. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether he has had his attention drawn to the fact that, at the Umaria Collieries, situated in the Central Provinces of India, belonging to the Indian Government, and which cost that Government 10 lakhs of rupees, the price of coal has been reduced by the Government manager first in 1892 to Rs.5 8a. per ton, and secondly in 1893 to Rs.4 3a. per ton ; whether the Government accounts show that the working of the collieries produced a profit in 1891-2 of barely 2 per cent. on the capital employed, such result being arrived at by allowing less than 2 per cent. on the capital employed as a sinking fund, and without making any allowance for the interest paid by the Indian Government upon its loan capital, out of which the expenditure on the collieries has been provided ; whether he is aware that the depreciation sinking fund allowed in English collieries is from $7\frac{1}{2}$ to 10 per cent., and that, if such allowance for depreciation were made, the Umaria Collieries would appear by the accounts to be worked at a loss ; whether the chief consumer of the Umaria coal is the Great Indian Peninsula Railway Company, a Company earning much more than its guaranteed dividend, and whether the successive reduction in price by the Government has consequently gone to reduce the cost of working of that line, and consequently to increase the dividends of the shareholders of the railway at the expense of the Indian taxpayer ; and whether he will interfere to prevent this proceeding on the part of the Indian Government ?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. H. H. FOWLER, Wolverhampton, E.): The Umaria Colliery is worked by the Indian Government. The price of coal there has been reduced to Rs.4 3a. a ton. The Government accounts show the figures given in my hon. Friend's question with regard to profits and sinking fund. I am informed that it is not the practice in India to allow so large "a depreciation sinking fund" as in English collieries. The Great Indian Peninsula Railway is the second largest consumer of Umaria coal ; any reduction of the selling price of this coal must tend to reduce its working expenses, and so to increase the Government's share of revenue, to the advantage of the taxpayer. I see no reason to interfere to prevent the reduction of the price of coal ; but I am in communication with the Government of India on the question whether the working of this colliery may not with advantage be transferred to a private agency.

Mr. Schwann

ADMIRALTY CONTRACTS AND FAIR WAGES.

MR. A. GROVE (West Ham, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether the firms of Messrs. Mandelay and Field, Messrs. Humphrey and French, and Messrs. Penn and Company are paying the fair rates of wages current in the neighbourhood to workmen employed on Government contracts ; and, if not, whether the Admiralty will take steps to compel them to do so ?

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Sir U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH, Lancashire, Clitheroe): There is at present nothing to add to the reply which I gave to a somewhat similar question from my hon. Friend the Member for West Islington a fortnight ago. Counter-statements made by a Trades Society and by two of the firms named are now under the consideration of the Admiralty. As a condition of every Admiralty contract, employers have to undertake to pay the rate of wages current in the district for competent workmen.

MR. A. GROVE: May I ask when a definite decision may be expected to be arrived at by the Admiralty ?

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: I am afraid I cannot say that.

SOUTH LEITRIM MAILS.

MR. TULLY: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that several resolutions have been adopted by the different representative bodies in South Leitrim, praying that the mails should be conveyed by the Cavan and Leitrim Light Railway ; and whether, as this railway is a serious annual tax on the cesspayers of that constituency, the interest on the capital being jointly guaranteed by the baronies and the Treasury, he is prepared to state if the Post Office authorities have yet decided to accede to the request put forward by the representatives of the ratepayers on the Local Boards ?

MR. A. MORLEY: I have received resolutions of two Boards of Guardians in South Leitrim on this subject, and the Cavan, Leitrim, and Roscommon Railway Company has submitted a proposal for the conveyance of the night mails over their line. I find, however, that the service proposed would be much inferior to that which is now being afforded by road, and I regret that I cannot entertain the Company's scheme.

PROHIBITED MEETINGS IN CLARE.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): On behalf of the hon. Member for East Clare, I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland upon what authority the meeting at O'Callaghan's Mills, County Clare, was dispersed by the police on Sunday, 8th July; whether he is aware that notice was only served upon the promoters of the meeting late on Saturday night that no meeting would be allowed, while the speakers and people generally received no warning whatever of the intention of the police till they arrived upon the scene; that the County Inspector of Police refused to allow the meeting to take place even a mile from O'Callaghan's Mills; and, if the mile limit has been abandoned, what is the new rule in regard to proposed meetings; why were the promoters of the meeting at O'Callaghan's Mills allowed to speak at Bodyke and not at Broadford; whether, in view of the strong feeling aroused by the conduct of the police, the Government will give orders that Members of Parliament be not interfered with when they seek to address their own constituents; and whether he is aware that in the speeches made at Bodyke the people were told to avoid outrages and violence, and that similar advice would have been tendered had the police not interfered at O'Callaghan's Mills?

MR. J. MORLEY: The placard convening the meeting at O'Callaghan's Mills on Sunday last pointed out for attack in very strong, if not dangerous, language the occupant of a particular evicted farm in the locality. It was decided, therefore, by the Government to prohibit the holding of the meeting, and instructions were issued accordingly to the constabulary. The terms of the placard convening the meeting were brought under my notice on Saturday afternoon, and the local promoters of the meeting were informed the same night that it would not be allowed to be held. This warning was given by the District Inspector both at Tulla and O'Callaghan's Mills, and, if the people generally at these places were unaware of the intention to prohibit the meeting, I think, under the circumstances, the fault lies with the promoters. It is true that the County Inspector refused to allow a meeting to be held within a mile from O'Callaghan's Mills, and, furthermore, that he declined to permit a meeting at Broadford. I may here point out that Broadford is four miles from O'Callaghan's Mills, and that the person against whom the meeting was directed lives midway between these two villages. The County Inspector informs me that he personally stated to the hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. Redmond) that he would not allow him to address a meeting at Broadford unless he gave a guarantee that he would not in any way refer to the person indicated in the placard. But this the hon. Gentleman declined. I understand that Bodyke, at which the hon. Gentleman addressed a small meeting, is six miles from O'Callaghan's Mills, and that the tenant of the evicted farm lives two miles further away. For these reasons it was considered that the meeting at Bodyke should not be interfered with. I have already had occasion to observe that it is impossible to lay down an inflexible rule on the subject of the prevention of meetings. Whether a meeting shall be interfered with within or without a certain radius is a matter entirely of Executive discretion, and each case is dealt with as it arises and on its individual merits. In the present instance the Government had no alternative but to take the course that was adopted, having regard to the language of the placard which convened the meeting. I am aware that the hon. Gentleman condemned outrage at Bodyke. The prohibition of the meeting at O'Callaghan's Mills was, however, as I have pointed out, influenced by other considerations.

GUN LICENCES IN IRELAND.

COLONEL NOLAN: On behalf of the hon. Member for Waterford, I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Mr. J. K. Bracken, of Templemore, County Tipperary, has been refused a licence to carry arms by the local Resident Magistrate; and whether he can state the reasons upon which this refusal was based?

MR. J. MORLEY: I have called for a Report on this question; but not having up to the present moment received it, regret to have to ask the hon. Gentleman to defer the question until Monday.

RESIDENCE OF DISPENSARY MEDICAL OFFICER.

COLONEL NOLAN : On behalf of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Waterford, I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland why Dr. Madigan, medical officer of the Feenagh District, Newcastle Union, has been compelled by the Local Government Board to take up his residence in his district where there is no suitable dwelling house ; and will he explain why they have not compelled the other medical officers of the same Union to reside in their respective districts ; and will he explain why the Local Government Board have not compelled the Board of Guardians to put the provision of the Irish Dispensary Act into operation and build a suitable residence for the medical officer ?

MR. J. MORLEY : The Local Government Board inform me that Dr. Madigan does not reside within his district, but in a fairly central position on its borders. Conditional permission had been granted to him to live in Newcastle until the Board of Guardians provided a house for him in his district ; but although the Guardians agreed to do this, they took no effective action in the matter, and the Local Government Board, in accordance with their invariable rule, required the Dispensary Committee to call upon Dr. Madigan to take up his residence in the district. Of the other four medical officers of the Unions, three live in their districts, and the fourth has been permitted to live in Newcastle since 1879—it having been proved to the satisfaction of the Local Government Board that it is convenient for the sick poor he should reside at Newcastle. The Guardians undertook to build a residence under the Dispensary Houses Act for the Medical Officer of Feenagh District, but they have not yet done so, and the Local Government Board inform me they have no power to compel them to avail themselves of the provisions of the Act.

WATERFORD AND LIMERICK RAILWAY COMPANY'S LINES.

COLONEL NOLAN : On behalf of the hon. and learned Member for Waterford,

Mr. J. Morley

I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that dissatisfaction exists in the South Riding of Tipperary as to the management of the lines under the control of the Waterford and Limerick Railway Company ; is he aware that on the main line passing through Clonmel there is no train from the Limerick Junction to Waterford from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. ; that on the Southern line (which connects Clonmel and Thurles) there are but two passenger trains at most inconvenient hours daily ; and that it is not possible for a passenger to get from Dublin to Fethard, a distance of about 80 miles, from 6 a.m. to 6.45 p.m., and to get from Waterford to Fethard, a distance of about 26 miles, from 7 a.m. to 4.30 p.m. ; is he aware that the Southern Railway was partly made by contributions from the baronies of Middlethird and Slievardagh, which now contribute 5d. in the £1 to its maintenance ; and that the Grand Jury, and most of the Public Bodies, have remonstrated at the present state of things ; and whether he will take such steps as will put an end to the inconvenience complained of ?

MR. BRYCE : The attention of the Board of Trade has been drawn to the circumstances referred to by the hon. Member ; and, with a view to remedying the matters complained of, the Board directed Major General Hutchinson, one of their Inspectors, to visit the locality and use his endeavours to bring about a settlement. He has done so, and the Companies have before them the Inspecting Officer's suggestions, but have not, as yet, acted upon them. The Board have no power to use compulsion, but they will continue to urge the Companies in regard to the matter.

SHIPPING OF EXPLOSIVES AT PLYMOUTH.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether dynamite is shipped on board German steamers calling at Plymouth in the ordinary anchorage used by merchant vessels, thereby exposing all vessels in the port to unnecessary risk ; and, if so, whether he will take steps to have dynamite or other explosives shipped at Plymouth put on board the ships outside the breakwater under the same conditions as are in operation in the River Thames and at other ports in the United Kingdom?

MR. BRYCE: The function of the Board of Trade under the Explosives Act is to give or withhold their sanction to bye-laws made under the Act by Harbour Authorities. The authority for the Harbour of Plymouth is the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty who, 15 years ago, made bye-laws which received the sanction of the Board of Trade. No complaint from that time to the present has been received, and it would not be proper for me to take any action in the matter referred to by the hon. Member without full particulars of the circumstances and consultation with the Harbour Authority. I would suggest that the hon. Member should address himself to that Authority.

GOVERNMENT OFFICIALS AND CIVIC OFFICES.

MR. E. J. C. MORTON (Devonport): I beg to ask the Civil Lord of the Admiralty whether the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty will so alter the regulations applying to their employés as to allow any of them to serve, if elected, on School Boards, Town and City Councils, County District, and Parish Councils, and other Public Bodies, provided that in cases where these bodies hold their meetings during the working hours of these employés, these employés shall be bound to take the time they are absent from their work in attending the meetings of the Public Bodies of which they are members from their annual leave?

MR. E. ROBERTSON: In regard to these matters, the Admiralty, in common with other Public Departments, follow the Treasury ruling, embodied in Orders in Council—namely, that members of the Civil Service should not undertake outside work of any description which is incompatible with the devotion of their whole official time to the public, or which may conflict with the duties of their offices.

PROVINCIAL TELEGRAPH STAFF GRIEVANCES.

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Wicklow, W.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he can now reply to the Petitions addressed to him by the Provincial Telegraph Staff, praying for a higher salary after five years' service; and, if not, when will he be in a position to do so?

MR. A. MORLEY: The Memorials received from various offices are practically identical, praying for abolition of classification and improved scales of pay. I beg to refer the hon. Member to an answer which I gave to the hon. Member for Manchester on the 10th instant, to which I have nothing further to add. That answer, the hon. Member will see, refers to all the Memorials.

INDIAN CANTONMENT ACTS.

MR. STANSFELD (Halifax): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether it is true, as stated in a telegram from Reuter's correspondent at Simla, that on the introduction of the Bill to carry out the recommendations of the Departmental Committee of the India Office on the subject of the Indian Cantonment Acts, the Viceroy, replying to a question, said that he understood that the measure would not be passed before the winter; and whether, having in view the period of time since the Report of the Committee and the pledges of Her Majesty's Government, he will insist upon the necessary legislation being carried through without any further delay?

MR. H. H. FOWLER: I have no information as to the accuracy of the telegram to which my right hon. Friend refers. I understand that it is necessary that the Bill for the amendment of the Indian Cantonment Act should be published in the Gazettes in India, and referred to local Governments for opinion in the usual way before being passed into law, and it is therefore probable that it will not be finally disposed of till the meeting of the Legislative Council in Calcutta. I can assure my right hon. Friend that the pledge given by Her Majesty's Government will be fulfilled.

MR. STANSFELD: Can the right hon. Gentleman give a date for the fulfilment of the pledge?

MR. H. H. FOWLER: I think I may say when the Viceroy returns from Simla in November.

CATTLE POISONING IN COUNTY CLARE.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the reports of the poisoning of cattle at Bodyke, County Clare, and if he can state the number poisoned; whether the Government Analyst has reported upon the matter; and if claims for malicious injury have been lodged with the Grand Jury?

MR. J. MORLEY: I am, of course, aware that a number of cattle—14 in all—have recently died at Bodyke under circumstances which point to the suspicion that they had been poisoned. A few days ago I instructed an official connected with the veterinary department to make a post mortem examination of some of the carcasses and to send the viscera for analysis. The analysis will be made by one of the Government analysts, but the result of his examination cannot be known for some days. Claims for compensation have been lodged with the Grand Jury. The total amount claimed is £250, but this, I understand, covers four head of cattle that had been injured but had not died from the alleged poisoning.

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.): Bearing in mind the number of cases in which claims for malicious injury have been improperly made in this county will the right hon. Gentleman direct the police to give close attention to the evidence of malice?

MR. J. MORLEY: Yes.

SPECIAL POLICE PROTECTION IN IRELAND.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can state the number of persons who were under special police protection in Ireland on the 30th June last, distinguishing by provinces, and giving the number where the police reside on the premises, and the number protected by specials patrols?

MR. J. MORLEY: The number of persons receiving constant police protection on the 30th of June last was 128, made up as follows:—5 in Ulster, 10 in Leinster, 24 in Connaught, 98 in Munster. One hundred and nineteen of these persons were protected from protection posts or huts, and the remaining nine were afforded constant protection by means of patrols from ordinary police stations. The police usually reside on the premises where protection is afforded from posts; but there are exceptions when the police are quartered in huts, and it cannot be stated without local references which would cause some delay, in how many of these cases the police do not actually reside on the premises. The number of persons receiving constant protection on the 30th of June, 1892, was 180.

IRISH ADMINISTRATIVE REPORTS.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Reports of the Irish Local Government Board and of the Board of Works will be published before the Votes for these two Departments are taken?

MR. J. MORLEY: I am informed that the Annual Report of the Board of Works was laid on the Table on Tuesday last. The Report of the Local Government Board will be presented on Monday next.

AUSTRALIAN MAILS AND THE UNITED STATES RIOTS.

MR. HOGAN (Tipperary, Mid): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he can state to what extent the Australian and New Zealand Mails, via San Francisco, have been delayed or destroyed by the railway strike riots in the United States; and whether he can hold out any hope of the early substitution of the Canadian Pacific Railway for the carriage of these mails across the American continent, and the adoption of the "all through British postal route" between the Mother Country and the Australasian Colonies?

MR. A. MORLEY: Up till now no news has been received by the Post Office of the destruction of any of the mails in question; none have arrived late, and none are overdue; but what delay, if any, those now crossing America for this country will suffer cannot yet be stated. I am not at present in a position to say what likelihood there is of the Canadian Pacific route to and from the Australasian Colonies being substituted for the San Francisco route. But the matter is primarily one for the consideration of the colonies who are employing the steamers performing the service.

THE BRITISH EMPIRE TRADE CONFERENCE AT OTTAWA.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if, now that the British Empire Trade Conference, sitting at Ottawa has endorsed the view, repeatedly expressed by the Canadian Legislature, that any provisions of existing Treaties between Great Britain and Foreign Powers, which prevent the self-governing dependencies of the Empire from entering into agreement for commercial reciprocity with each other, or with Great Britain, should be removed, Her Majesty's Government will take prompt steps to that end, and avail itself of the opportunity now open, of the negotiations pending with Belgium and with Germany relative to mutual interest in Africa, to obtain release from the conditions of Article 15 of the Treaty with Belgium of 1862, and of Article 7 in the Treaty with the German Zollverein of 1865, preventing British goods from being admitted to British Colonies on better terms than foreign goods?

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): At the same time, may I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been drawn to the statement in the public Press that notice has been given at the Ottawa Colonial Conference of a Motion to request Her Majesty's Government to denounce and put an end to the Most Favoured Nation Clauses in the Belgian and German Treaties, which have been held to prohibit differential treatment as between the Mother Country and the Colonies; whether he can inform the House what the Treaties are that are thus referred to, and which Articles they are that have the effect described; and whether the clauses in question apply only to matters of commerce and navigation, or extend also to matters of taxation in general; and whether any Correspondence respecting the effect of the Treaties in question has at any time passed between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of Belgium or of Germany; and, if so, whether he has any objection to lay such Correspondence upon the Table of the House?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT, Derby): These two questions relate to matters of such great importance that they could not well be answered across the floor of the House, but no doubt they will be carefully considered. The Government, however, cannot come to a hasty conclusion on a telegraphic Despatch.

MR. JAMES LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet) asked whether, after the return of the Commissioner, the Report would be laid on the Table?

SIR W. HARCOURT: That I cannot say until I have seen the Report.

MR. J. LOWTHER: Will the House be afforded any opportunity of discussing the matter before any action is taken on the Report?

SIR W. HARCOURT: It is not to be supposed that in dealing with a matter of this importance the Government will act without full deliberation.

Colonel HOWARD VINCENT and Mr. GIBSON BOWLES also put questions on the same subject, but the replies were inaudible.

ELECTRIC LIGHTING IN PARLIAMENT.

SIR JULIAN GOLDSMID (St. Pancras, S.): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether he will consider the desirability of shading the electric light in the Library and other rooms provided for Members, so as to remove the painful glare which has caused so many complaints?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. H. GLADSTONE, Leeds, W.): Different systems of electric lighting are now being tried in two of the Library rooms, and I shall be very glad to receive hon. Members' opinions thereon.

DYCE'S FRESCOS.

SIR JULIAN GOLDSMID: I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether he is aware that Dyce's Frescoes in the Queen's Robing Room are in very bad condition, and that steps should be taken to prevent further decay; and whether he will appoint a small Committee of experts to advise him upon the subject?

MR. H. GLADSTONE: My attention has been called to the condition of these frescoes and of other paintings. I am now in communication with Sir Frederick Leighton on the subject.

THE WARINA COLLISION.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT (Sheffield, Ecclesall): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether any explanation or reparation has been offered by the French Government for the attack on British troops at Warina, in December last, in which three British officers were killed?

SIR E. GREY: Explanations have been interchanged; but the position of Warina, which has been ascertained to be close to the frontier, has not yet been fixed with any certainty.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

FINANCE BILL.—(No. 303.)

CONSIDERATION. [FIFTH NIGHT.]

Bill, as amended, further considered.

*SIR M. HICKS-BEACH (Bristol, W.) said, the Amendment he wished to move provided that where any property passing on the death of the deceased was situated in a foreign country, and the Commissioners were satisfied that by reason of such death any duty was payable in that foreign country in respect of that property, they should make an allowance of the amount of that duty from the value of the property. His object was to prevent what he thought would be admitted to be an injustice. The point did not arise in connection with property situated in the colonies, because, by a clause already inserted in the Bill by the Government, property there situated was more favourably treated, and a Death Duty paid in the colony was deducted from the Death Duty payable in this country. He understood the Leader of the House was willing to accept the Amendment, and would not, therefore, further detain hon. Members.

Amendment proposed, in page 5, line 42, at end, insert—

"Where any property passing on the death of the deceased is situate in a foreign country, and the Commissioners are satisfied that by reason of such death any duty is payable in that foreign country in respect of that property, they shall make an allowance of the amount of that duty from the value of the property."—
(Sir M. Hicks-Beach.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR W. HARCOURT said, that as he entirely agreed with the principle of the right hon. Baronet's Amendment he would accept it. Of course, it had never been the intention of the Revenue authorities to levy the Death Duties in respect of property situated abroad which was liable to duty in the country where it was situated. They intended to charge the Death Duties on the "net" value of the estate, and any taxation paid upon a part of it situated abroad would be deducted from the amount of duty to be paid here.

MR. BARTLEY said, it seemed to him the conclusion they must come to as regarded property both in the colonies and in foreign countries was that it would ultimately bring nothing into the Exchequer, for it was certain that in those cases a duty would be put on so as to get rid of the liability of payment in this country. All this friction and irritation in foreign places and in the colonies seemed most useless and undesirable. It was obvious the Exchequer would get nothing.

SIR W. HARCOURT was understood to say he supposed the hon. Member thought he understood the administration of the Inland Revenue better than those responsible for it. He was not of that opinion.

MR. BARTLEY: I really think that remark most uncalled for. I said nothing about the Inland Revenue. All I did was to point out how this Amendment would work.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. GRANT LAWSON (York, N.R., Thirsk) said that, in the absence of the hon. Member for the Horsham Division of Sussex, he had to move an Amendment, which they had drawn up in consultation, to provide that in the case of any agricultural property where no part of the principal value was due to the expectation of an increased income from such property the principal value should not exceed 25 times the annual value as assessed under Schedule A of the Income Tax Acts,

"in the event of the property ceasing to be used and occupied as agricultural property."

He thought that this alteration would merely carry out the intentions of the Government. Their desire in making this provision in the interests of agricultural land was to exclude from its operation land which had a value as building land. Unless the Amendment were introduced it appeared to him that agricultural property also would be excluded, for this reason: that there was no property in the Kingdom of which part of the principal value was not due to the expectation of increased income from it.

Amendment proposed, in page 6, line 7, after the word "property," to insert the words "ceasing to be used and occupied as agricultural property."—(Mr. Grant Lawson.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR W. HARCOURT said, the Government had carefully considered the form that the clause should take, and the Leader of the Opposition had agreed to it as it at present stood in the Bill. He hoped, therefore, that the hon. and learned Member would not attempt to disturb it by pressing his Amendment, which, under the circumstances, it was impossible for the Government to agree to.

COLONEL KENYON-SLANEY (Shropshire, Newport) said, that if his memory was correct, the Leader of the Opposition had stated that in agricultural property be included practically all kinds of real property other than land used for the purposes of building or had a prospective building value. He therefore thought the Amendment was a distinctly important one to those interested in agricultural property.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (Manchester, E.) said, he did not think there was, in reality, any difference of opinion between them. He was inclined to think that the wording of the clause as it stood, if equitably interpreted in its broad sense by the Inland Revenue and by Courts of Law, would not give rise to any of those technical difficulties which his hon. and learned Friend no doubt considered as likely to arise unless the clause were amended in the manner he proposed. Some difficulty, it was true, might arise as to the exact meaning of the words "agricultural property," but he understood that the term would be defined by a clause they would have to consider later on. The Government, in accepting the Amendment, had endeavoured to meet the natural and legitimate fears of the owners of agricultural property that they would be assessed on some fanciful multiplication of rent derived from property, and he hoped, therefore, that the Amendment would be withdrawn.

MR. GRANT LAWSON said, that as he was far from desirous of upsetting any agreement, he would ask leave to withdraw the Amendment, although he still held that his words would more clearly express the intentions of the Government.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) said, the object of the next Amendment which stood in the name of the hon. Member for Lynn Regis, and which he had been requested to propose, was to secure that certain deductions already allowed on the Income Tax assessments would be allowed in the future as well as those allowed under the Succession Duty.

Amendment proposed, in page 6, line 9, after the word "have," to insert the words "been allowed in that assessment, and also such other deductions as have."—(Mr. Hanbury.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (MR. R. T. REID, Dumfries, &c.) said, the clause as framed clearly indicated that those deductions would be allowed.

*SIR M. HICKS-BEACH said, he, too, thought it was perfectly clear that, first the Income Tax and then the Succession Duty deductions were to be allowed, and then 5 per cent.

MR. R. T. REID: That is so.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR R. TEMPLE said, the clause stated that the principal value should be as assessed, and that in calculating the principal value of any property the Commissioners were to allow such deductions as were allowed under the Income Tax Acts and under the Succession Duty Act of 1853, and in addition were to make a deduction for expenses of management not exceeding 5 per cent. of the annual value so assessed. He wished to move as an Amendment that 10 per cent. instead of 5 per cent. should be allowed for the expenses of management. He did not think that 5 per cent. was enough. He was aware that when the question was raised in the Committee stage, the Chancellor of the Exchequer or the Solicitor General gave them a historical and interesting explanation of the tenure of land in order to show what were the grounds upon which this percentage of 5 per cent. had been fixed. He (Sir R. Temple) did not deny that the Government might have good authority for inserting this percentage, but what he submitted was that however good that authority might be, it was not possible under existing circumstances to manage any estate for 5 per cent. He was speaking in the presence of many hon. Gentlemen who owned property, and he appealed to them whether it was possible that any estate could be managed at such a rate. If the owner lived on the place and did a good deal or all of the work for himself, he did not say that 5 per cent. would not cover it. In that event, no doubt a £1,000 estate could be managed for £50. But in the existing state of English society they did not expect to find the owners living on estates and managing for themselves, and the consequence was that there were law charges and incidental charges and payments to agents to be provided for, and he was certain that a man who had an estate yielding £1,000 a year net rental would be very lucky if he could get it managed at a less cost than £100 a year, and equally certain that no man with a net rental of £2,000 a year could have it managed for £100 a year. He ventured to put these matters as practical facts to the Chancellor of the Exchequer for his consideration. It was no use for the Government to give them sharp answers or rough answers. They tried to put their points in a moderate manner, and they were entitled to have them considered.

Amendment proposed, in page 6, line 12, to leave out the word "five," and insert the word "ten."—(Sir R. Temple.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'five' stand part of the Bill."

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he hoped his hon. Friend would not press the Amendment. He agreed that there might be cases in which 5 per cent. did not represent the outgoings for management.

Sir R. Temple

This 5 per cent., however, was a concession made by the Government. He thought he might point out, and that he was right in saying, that the 5 per cent. deduction was made in respect of the amount payable for Income Tax and not upon the net rent of the property.

SIR W. HARCOURT said, the real fact was, that this allowance had never been made before. In settling this clause with hon. Members opposite, the proposal of 5 per cent. was accepted, and it was considered, in the circumstances, to be adequate.

SIR M. HICKS-BEACH agreed that this was a new allowance so far as individuals were concerned, though it was allowed in the Act of 1885 in the case of Corporations.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

On Motion of Mr. R. T. REID, the following Amendments were agreed to:—

Clause 7, page 6, line 16, leave out "on," and insert "in respect of."

Line 18, leave out "on," and insert "in respect of."

Line 21, leave out from "date of the," to "and," in line 22, and insert "death of the deceased."

Line 21, leave out "on," and insert "in respect of."

Line 23, leave out "upon," and insert "in respect of."

Line 26, leave out "originally," and insert "previously."

Line 28, leave out "the interest of a deceased person in any property," and insert "an interest ceasing on the death of the deceased."

*SIR M. HICKS-BEACH moved, in Clause 7, page 6, lines 24 and 25, leave out "at that time," and insert "when it falls into possession." The right hon. Gentleman said he had placed the Amendment upon the Paper with a view of eliciting what the clause meant. Its wording seemed to him to be very doubtful.

Amendment proposed, in page 6, lines 24 and 25, to leave out the words "at that time," and insert the words "when it falls into possession."—(Sir M. Hicks-Beach.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

MR. R. T. REID said, the Government meant to convey the meaning "when it falls into possession," and would accept the Amendment.

Question put, and negatived.

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

Question put, and agreed to.

*SIR M. HICKS-BEACH moved, in Clause 7, page 6, leave out lines 34 to 36. He said, this was purely a drafting Amendment. The clause related to the mode in which the value of the property was to be calculated, and the subsection he proposed to omit had been put into the middle of a clause to which it had no reference.

Amendment proposed, to leave out lines 34 to 36.—(Sir M. Hicks-Beach.)

Question proposed, "That lines 34 to 36 stand part of the Bill."

MR. R. T. REID said, the right hon. Gentleman was perfectly right. He thought the words would appear more properly in Clause 15.

Question put, and negatived.

On the Motion of MR. R. T. REID, the following Amendment was agreed to:—Page 6, line 34, leave out "upon," and insert "in respect of."

Amendment proposed, in page 7, line 2, after the word "necessary," to insert the words—

"(8) Where the Commissioners require a valuation to be made by a person named by them, the reasonable costs of such valuation shall be defrayed by the Commissioners.

(9) "Property passing on any death shall not be aggregated more than once, nor shall Estate Duty in respect thereof be more than once levied on the same death."—(Mr. R. T. Reid.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. GRANT LAWSON moved, as an Amendment to the Solicitor General's proposed Amendment (Clause 7, page 7, line 2), leave out "reasonable." The hon. Gentleman asked who was going to pay the costs supposing that they were not reasonable, and who was going to fight the valuers on the question of what was and what was not reasonable. He thought it was obviously desirable to leave out the word "reasonable." The Commissioners would have it in their own power to fix a scale of valuation, and Somerset House would not pay more than the reasonable cost, and if they left out "reasonable," the cost would fall upon the valuer who made the unreasonable charge, and not upon the person accountable.

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment, in line 2, to leave out the word "reasonable."—(Mr. Grant Lawson.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'reasonable' stand part of the proposed Amendment."

SIR W. HARCOURT said, he thought it would be very unreasonable to leave out "reasonable." There existed in the public mind a disposition to fleece the Government if they could, and there might be a toleration of excessive sums which the Commissioners would have to pay.

MR. J. LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet) observed that the Inland Revenue authorities designated the person who was to be employed, and if they did not want to be charged unreasonably he should recommend that they should not employ an unreasonable person. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said it was difficult to find persons who were not unreasonable, and he was afraid that Government officers, even if they happened to be in Parliament, did not always escape the charge of being unreasonable in their demands on their fellow-subjects. It seemed to him that if the Inland Revenue authorities called the tune they ought to be prepared to pay the piper. This was a case where the unfortunate individual who was going to be saddled with unreasonable costs had no voice whatever in the selection of the valuer. Those who selected the valuer were aware, or ought to be aware, that the person selected was one who might make unreasonable charges, but they escaped their responsibility by turning round on the person on whom they forced the services of this unreasonable being, and said that he would have to pay the balance of cost which they saw fit to disallow. If a person of this kind did make an unreasonable charge, he would have to enforce his charge in a Court of Law, and did he understand the Government to contend that if the charge had been substantiated in a Court of Law they would wish to repudiate it? He took it if the cost were reasonable they would have to pay it. The proposal was open to the great objection, among others, that it had a tendency to drive these cases into a Court of Law. He thought if the Inland Revenue authorities were to be able to turn round and constitute themselves judges of whether a charge was reasonable or not it would be a very bad thing. These words in the Bill constituted an iniquity, and enabled the Government to force the services of a person on the unfortunate owner of property.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES submitted to the Chancellor of the Exchequer that there was no reason why it was reasonable to insist upon the word "reasonable," because, although the right hon. Gentleman suggested that there were valuers who might make unreasonable charges, it was entirely within the power of the Commissioners themselves in the case provided for by this sub-section to avoid employing any such valuer, or if they did employ him they could make a contract in advance that his charges should be reasonable or for a specified amount. It would be perfectly right and just if the other party interested were to name the valuer, or he were to be named by any indifferent process, as by arbitration, that this provision should be made that the charges should not be unreasonable or if they were they should not be paid by the Commissioners. But in this case the Commissioners were making their own bargain; and if they chose to make an unreasonable bargain, it was not right that the margin of unreasonableness over reasonableness should be paid by somebody else than themselves. The Commissioners had the power of protecting themselves against unreasonable charges, and if so, and if they did not exercise that power, the penalty should not be put by them upon some other person.

*SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.) said, that Sub-section 7 clearly enabled the Commissioners to employ a valuer, and if an unreasonable charge was made, in that case they would have to pay it or abide the consequences, or the valuer would have to forego it. He did not think, on the other hand, that the insertion of the word "reasonable" was material, because it was implied by law that no unreasonable payment could be sustained, and in the absence of a specific contract only a reasonable charge could be recovered.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (Manchester, E.) suggested, that the difficulty might be met if his hon. Friend's Amendment were accepted, and then the sub-section made to read thus:—

"Where the Commissioners require a valuation to be made by a person named by them, the cost of such valuation shall be arranged by the Commissioners, and shall be defrayed by them."

If these, or equivalent, words were accepted, the argument of the right hon. Gentleman against the Amendment would fall to the ground. He agreed that the Government should be protected, and the words he had suggested would give the Government the power to protect themselves—to make what arrangement they pleased. If they made the arrangement and selected the valuer it was only just they should pay the whole cost that the valuer charged.

MR. R. T. REID said, that the Commissioners could not insist upon a particular valuer. A valuation might be brought in to them which had been made by a well-known valuer, and they would accept it. It was the case that people did charge more to the Government than they did to other persons, and as a business matter it was advisable to have this provision as to the valuation.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. BARTLEY said, he quite agreed with Sub-section (9) which provided that

"property passing on any death shall not be aggregated more than once, nor shall Estate Duty in respect thereof be more than once levied on the same death."

He should like to draw the attention of the House to the position in which they were—that it was necessary to put such a provision in. They were considering the question of Death Duties, and the Bill was so framed that they were obliged to lay down the proposal in the clause that property should not be aggregated more than once, as if by any possible means or fairness it ought ever to be aggregated more than once—and that Estate Duty should be charged once.

Mr. J. Lowther

It was obvious that the Bill was so complicated and badly drawn that it was really necessary to put in this provision. Under no conceivable means could property passing on death be aggregated more than once, or Estate Duty be required more than once, and although he agreed that the clause was necessary on account of the complicated and imperfect manner in which the Bill had been drawn and carried out, he thought this clause alone should stamp the measure for what it was really worth in the mode in which it had been carried out.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES remarked that the clause had evidently been inspired by the person who originally conceived the Bill, but it was not quite in accordance with the results achieved by the Bill. He found there would be no fewer than 15 aggregations possible under the Bill, and segregations and segregations of segregations. What was provided here was that the same property should not be more than once in the same aggregation. But there would be no fewer than 15 aggregations in the Bill, whilst the original purpose was to make one aggregation of all the property of the person who died. He thought that was rather a remarkable result.

Amendment (Mr. R. T. Reid) agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in page 7, line 9, after the word "Majesty," to insert the words

"and for the purpose of payment of sums under one hundred pounds requiring representation."
—(Mr. R. T. Reid.)

MR. HANBURY said, this was practically the same Amendment as the one he had himself put down, and he thanked the Solicitor General for making this proposal. His (Mr. Hanbury's) Amendment had for its object merely the preserving of existing exemptions, but he thought the Government might have gone a little further. This Bill purposed to redress anomalies. However, with this exemption in the Bill, they should still be retaining a peculiar anomaly, and it was this: That this exemption would only apply to the case of civil servants in the office of the Admiralty. Civil servants in the same position in the War Office and in similar Departments would not come under this exemption. Up to the year 1889 there was an Act in force which exempted all civil servants from all arrears of pensions up to the amount of £100. For some reason or other the whole of that Bill was abrogated, he thought by the Superannuation Act of 1889, and the result was that these exemptions were maintained in the case of the civil servants in the Admiralty, whilst they were entirely swept away in the case of all other civil servants. He appealed to the Government now that they were maintaining these exemptions in the case of civil servants in the Admiralty, to deal practically with all civil servants who were really on the same footing. The principle was exactly the same. If it was fair that arrears of pay and pension up to £100 in the case of the civil servants in the Admiralty should be exempted from the Estate Duty, surely it was fair that exactly the same exemption should be extended to civil servants in other Departments.

SIR W. HARCOURT said, the Government proposed to preserve the existing exemptions, but the hon. Member for Preston suggested that they should revise the exemptions which were made so lately as 1889. He did not think that was reasonable. The object of the Amendment which the hon. Member put down, like that of the Government, was to maintain existing exemptions, and beyond this it was not reasonable to ask them to go.

Question put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in page 7, line 10, after the word "Act," to insert the words—

"Sections 12 to 14 of The Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict., c. 7), and Section 47 of the Local Registration of Title (Ireland) Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict., c. 66), shall apply as if Estate Duty were therein mentioned as well as Succession Duty, and as if an account were not settled within the meaning of any of the above sections until the duty payable on such account has been paid"—(Mr. R. T. Reid.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. BYRNE proposed as an Amendment to the Solicitor General's proposed Amendment, line 4, to leave out all after "duty." He said the words he proposed should be omitted were these—

He might be in error, but he could not help thinking that there must be some mistake here. Clause 14 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889, provided that—

"No person shall under a testamentary document admitted to probate or . . . administration be liable to the payment of any Legacy Duty or Succession Duty, or duty hereinbefore imposed by this part of the Act, after the expiration of six years from the date of the settlement of the account in respect of which the duty is payable, where such account was in all respects a full and true account, and contained all the facts material to be known by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue for the ascertaining the rate and amount of duty, and no trustee, executor, or administrator, shall, after the expiration of such six years, be liable to such duty if it is proved to the satisfaction of the Commissioners that the account rendered was correct to the best of his knowledge, information, and belief."

He was under the impression that the intention of the Solicitor General's Amendment was to make that provision apply also to the case of Estate Duty under this Act. It seemed to him to be a fair provision; but the Solicitor General proposed, after making this section, amongst others, apply, to add the words—

"And as if an account were not settled within the meaning of any of the above sections until the duty payable on such account has been paid."

If the duty had been paid he could not see what was the use of giving these six years or anything of the kind. The true meaning of it was that if a man did his duty and put in a full and proper account which was settled and agreed upon by the Commissioners, then, after six years, he had not to be liable. He begged, therefore, to move his Amendment to omit all the words after the word "duty."

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment, to leave out from the word "duty," in line 4, to the end thereof.—
(Mr. Byrne.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the proposed Amendment."

Mr. Byrne

MR. R. T. REID said, he would explain the reason for his Amendment. The 14th section to which the hon. and learned Gentleman had referred was operative to extinguish debts after the expiration of six years from the date of the settlement of the account in respect of which the duty was payable. That was to say, when the account was settled, then from that date the six years run, and if it was not paid in that six years it could not be required at all. The Government proposed to except the limitation of six years. They could not take a period of six years from the date of the settlement of the account. They had got to deal with cases in which the money was not payable until eight years after the account was settled, because it might be paid by instalments extending over eight years; and unless they inserted the words he had proposed, the Statute of Limitations extinguishing the debt would actually come into operation before the last two years' instalments were due.

MR. GOSCHEN asked if the expression, "and as if an account were not settled within the meaning of any of the above sections until the duty payable on such account has been paid," was meant solely to refer to the 8 per cent. to be paid by instalments? It was difficult to see how the language did mean that. Of course, he must accept the Solicitor's General's version, but the words seemed extremely obscure.

*SIR J. RIGBY suggested that the point which had been raised by the hon. Member for Essex might be met if they added at the end of the Solicitor General's Amendment the words "Until the time for payment of the duty on such account has arrived," in place of the concluding words.

MR. BYRNE said, that he would, on this understanding, withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment to the proposed Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment amended, by leaving out from the word "the," in line 5, to the end thereof, and adding the words "time for the payment of the duty on such account has arrived," instead thereof.

Words, as amended, inserted.

COLONEL KENYON - SLANEY (Shropshire, Newport) moved, in page 7, line 10, at end, insert—

"Provided that such exemption shall extend to the property of officers and non-commissioned officers which shall not exceed in amount £2,000."

The object of the Amendment, he explained, was to provide that the exemption which now attached to the property of what were called common seamen, marines, or soldiers, who were slain or died in the service of Her Majesty should be enlarged so as to include property of officers and non-commissioned officers not exceeding in amount £2,000. He would urge upon the Government that this was intended to include a class of officers who were particularly deserving of consideration. They had of late years rightly encouraged the habit of promoting from the ranks and giving commissions to men who had risen from the ranks. These men, as a rule, had served their time in the non-commissioned ranks, and these were the men who had taken advantage of the opportunities given for saving, and had accumulated a small property of their own. Suppose that a private soldier who had accumulated some such sum as he had suggested behaved with extreme gallantry, for which he was promoted and in the next action was killed, the very fact of having received promotion brought that property under the scope of the newly-imposed Estate Duty, and it was to meet such cases that he ventured to suggest this Amendment. He had placed the amount exceedingly low; and if the Government thought it should be further reduced, it was for them to suggest to what figure it should be so reduced. There were soldiers bearing the rank of officers who had not very much money to spare, and to whose successors the escaping of this duty would be a matter of considerable importance. Of course it would be impossible to draw a distinction between one class of officers and another class, and to say that the exemption should be granted only to officers who had been promoted from the ranks. His Amendment would, therefore, include ordinary commissioned officers; and he thought it was only fair and just that the successors of an officer killed in action, whose property was worth only £2,000, should have the exemption proposed in the Amendment. He appealed to the generous instincts of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to accept the Amendment, and he could assure the right hon. Gentleman that if he did so he would have made a concession which would be very acceptable throughout the country, and certainly in the Service.

MR. SPEAKER: I do not think this Amendment is in Order. The principle was decided in Committee when an Amendment proposing that the property of officers in the Army and Navy up to £5,000 should be exempt from the duty was rejected.

COLONEL KENYON-SLANEY: The other Amendment was complicated by the introduction of another class.

MR. SPEAKER: The other Amendment covered all officers in the Army and Navy. The hon. and gallant Gentleman proposes now to limit the exemption to officers in the Army; but the principle is the same.

On the Motion of MR. R. T. REID, the following Amendment was agreed to:—Page 7, line 15, leave out "on," and insert "in respect of."

Amendment proposed, in page 7, line 15, to leave out from the word "property," to the word "but," in line 17, and insert the words "passing to him as executor of the deceased."—(Mr. Byrne.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

MR. R. T. REID said, he did not think his hon. and learned Friend quite appreciated the result of the Amendment. Under the Amendment an executor would be accountable for Estate Duty on personal property passing to him as executor of the deceased, but for no more—that was to say, only for personal property within the United Kingdom, because foreign property did not pass to him at all. A good deal of the duty could be avoided under such an Amendment, and therefore the Government could not accept it.

MR. BYRNE said, that as the matter had been discussed before he would not press the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, in page 7, lines 17 and 18, to leave out the words "assets of which he has control," and insert the words "the assets to which he is entitled as executor."—(Mr. R. T. Reid.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill," put, and negatived.

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. MATTHEWS (Birmingham, E.) said, the words which the Solicitor General proposed to leave out were the only words which saved the executor from having to pay duty to an amount beyond the assets he had got in his hands. For instance, a man might have a power of appointment over £1,000,000, and have £10,000 besides; but as the executor only got the £10,000, he would, under the words which the hon. and learned Gentleman proposed to leave out, only have to pay duty to the extent of £10,000, whereas if the words "the assets to which he is entitled as executor" were inserted, the executor might have to pay duty on assets which he had not got in his hands and had no control over.

MR. R. T. REID said, the words he proposed to substitute would give the same protection to the executor as the words in the clause, but he was prepared to leave the clause as it stood.

MR. SPEAKER : The words have been moved out of the clause.

MR. R. T. REID : Then I am sorry the point was not raised before.

MR. MATTHEWS : You might insert the words "the assets actually received by him."

MR. R. T. REID : It must be obvious that those words will not do. For instance, an executor might refuse to receive things which he was bound to receive. An executor is always accountable in law not only in respect to what he has received in fact, but what he is entitled to receive and might have received if he choosed. I will move the insertion of these words "the assets which he has received as executor, or might, but for his own neglect or default, have received."

Question put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in page 7, line 20, to leave out the word "thereon," and insert the words "in respect of such property."—(Mr. R. T. Reid.)

Question, "That the word 'thereon' stand part of the Clause," put, and negatived.

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in page 7, line 22, to leave out from the word "property," to the word "every," in line 23, and insert the words "for the time being under his control."—(Sir R. Webster.)

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill," put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in page 7, line 24, to leave out from the word "person," to the word "and," in line 25, and insert the words "to whom any property passes on such death."—(Sir R. Webster.)

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill," put, and agreed to.

SIR R. WEBSTER (Isle of Wight) moved to omit from the clause the words—"and every person in whom the same is vested in possession by alienation or other derivative title."

If those words were allowed to stand a person who obtained property by purchase would be accountable for Estate Duty on the death of the former owner of the property.

Amendment proposed, in page 7, line 25, to leave out from the word "vested," to the word "shall," in line 27.—(Sir R. Webster.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

MR. R. T. REID admitted that no person who was a bonâ fide purchaser of the property for a valuable consideration should be held accountable for the Estate Duty, and therefore there was standing on the Paper in his name an Amendment to be added to the end of Clause 8, providing that ate stage of the Bill were passed, his (Sir A. Rollit's) own Amendment must inevitably be added to the former. The combined effect of Clause 8 of the Bill and the Solicitor General's Amendment would be to make accountable and liable to pay Estate Duty not only the executor, in respect of personalty (and the lot of an executor would be a hard one in the future), but also any person to whom the property passed beneficially in possession—any trustee, guardian, or committee, and even any assignee by way of purchase or otherwise. All these persons would not only be liable, under severe penalties, to account; but if there were any failure either to account or to pay, they would forfeit, at the election of the Commissioners, £100, or double the duties for which they were accountable under the Bill. Moreover, under the Solicitor General's Amendment, if enacted—and it was singular that, if it was necessary at all, such an important enacting clause should have been omitted by the draftsman from the original Bill—each and all of the above accountable persons would become a Crown debtor for the penalties or duties, including the double duties, and might be placed in the same unfortunate position as he had known Crown debtors to occupy under the Customs laws in respect of treble duties for breach of those laws, which might amount to many thousands or even many hundred thousands of pounds, such was the rigour of the old Revenue laws to which it was now proposed to assimilate the law as to Estate Duty. Thus, while by the Bill the Crown had the security of a first charge, as a Crown debt, with powers to appoint a receiver and to sell the estate, while it had the most ample remedy in rem against the estate itself, the Solicitor General's Amendment now proposed to give a direct remedy in personam, and the executor and all the others he had named would be liable both to account and to pay as Crown debtors, whether their estate was realizable or not, whether or not they had the means of payment, and even if they had made an innocent mistake in the valuation of the property for duty or by having distributed the estate without having, however inadvertently, made full provision for the payment of the duties. Now, he had no sympathy whatever with non-payment of Revenue, or with evasion, or even avoidance of payment, for payment was a duty to the State; but, after all, these duties were only debts, just like other debts—he saw no real distinction between a Crown and a civil debt—and if the non-payment amounted, under any circumstances, to a crime, the Crown had its remedy through the Criminal Law and by judicial trial and judgment. What he objected to was that what was a civil wrong should be treated, exceptionally as to the Crown, as a crime, and that the most summary and arbitrary powers should be given to the Crown which were properly denied to any subject; that, in short, the Crown should be able to take not only its pound of flesh but the whole body of its debtor, and to imprison him without any judicial investigation of his means or of the circumstances, and not merely for a specified but for an absolutely unlimited time. Such laws were relics of barbarism; they were not even deterrent owing to the uncertainty of their operation, and they were even more severe than the Criminal laws, which now nearly always proportioned the punishment to the offence, and even under the Statutes against personal injuries or against crimes against property a maximum term of imprisonment was always fixed by the law. A Crown debtor might thus be in a worse position than a felon or a misdemeanant, subject as he was to the possibility of lifelong imprisonment in default of payment, and there had been many cases of such hardships under the Revenue laws, which were by far the most severe of all Statutes. What, then, would be the practical effect of the Solicitor General's Amendment? Let them compare the cases of a civil and a Crown debtor. For the former the Debtors' Act, 1869, abolished perpetual imprisonment for debt, and even in the excepted cases of certain penalties under summary jurisdiction orders, as for rates, or fiduciary malfeasance by a trustee, limited imprisonment to one year. In all other cases the creditor must prove to a Judge that his debtor had, or had had since the judgment, the means of payment and even then imprisonment for such a contempt of Court was limited to six weeks, while payment could be ordered to be made by instalments, and the imprisonment was not to be a satisfaction of the debt. Surely this was sufficient in the case of a Crown debtor, as it was right unsatisfied charge on the property, would be protected; but a man who did not take in good faith, who paid nothing for it, and who knew that there was an unsatisfied charge on the property, ought surely to be made to pay the Estate Duty.

"Nothing in this section shall render liable to duty a bonâ fide purchaser for valuable consideration without notice."

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. BUTCHER (York) proposed to insert in page 7, at the end of line 30, after the word "property" the words—

"Provided that nothing in this section contained shall render a person accountable for duty who acts merely as the agent or bailiff for another person in the management of the property."

As the clause stood, every person in whom the management of the property was vested would be accountable for the Estate Duty. An agent was a person in whom the management of the property was vested; and unless the Amendment were accepted, the agent, whom it could not be the intention of the Government to hold liable, might be held liable for Estate Duty under the clause. He regretted he had been unable to put the Amendment on the Paper.

Amendment proposed, in page 7, at the end of line 30, after the word "property," to insert the words—

"Provided that nothing in this section contained shall render a person accountable for duty who acts merely as the agent or bailiff for another person in the management of the property."—(Mr. Butcher.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR R. WEBSTER said, the Amendment was really necessary in order to protect bankers and other persons, such as agents who managed properties without having any beneficiary interest in them, from being held liable for the Estate Duty.

SIR M. HICKS-REACH (Bristol, W.) called attention to the fact that in the preceding clause 5 per cent. of the annual value of the estate was allowed to be deducted for the expenses of management, and therefore the word "management" in the present clause might be interpreted in the way which the Amendment was intended to prevent.

MR. R. T. REID said, it was a pity the Amendment was not put on the Paper, because it was difficult to decide the point without having the opportunity of seeing the words. The words of the clause as they stood were taken from the Act of 1853, and it was clear they were not intended to make accountable people who were merely bailiffs or agents for other persons; but as he understood the Amendment, he had no objection to its being accepted.

Question put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in page 7, line 31, after the word "duty," to insert the words—

"shall be a debtor to the Crown for the amount of unpaid duty upon which he is accountable, and also every such person."—(Mr. R. T. Reid.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, this was a beautiful instance of the muddle to which the Bill had been brought. Could any human being understand what the clause meant if those words were inserted? The clause with the addition of the words would run—

"Every person accountable for Estate Duty, shall be a debtor to the Crown for the amount of unpaid duty for which he is accountable, and also every person whom the Commissioners believe," &c.

should deliver a statement to the Commissioners. He presumed that what was meant was that every person referred to in the clause should deliver the statement.

MR. R. T. REID: Yes.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, the phraseology of the clause was very ambiguous.

SIR A. ROLLIT moved, as an Amendment to the Solicitor General's Amendment, to insert, after the word "accountable" in the said Amendment, the words—

"But any proceedings against him to recover such unpaid duty shall be subject to the provisions and limitations of The Debtors' Act, 1869."

The proposition of the Solicitor General raised a serious question, and one to which, affecting as it did the liberty of the subject, he invited the consideration of hon. Members on all sides of the House, to which he submitted that if the Solicitor General's important Amendment, introduced for the first time at this the Amendment is a member of the Municipal Corporations Association. I am sure that if he represented the views of the Association on this question he would be one of the principal opponents of this change.

SIR H. JAMES (Bury, Lancashire) said, that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had opposed the Amendment on the ground that it would differentiate between this duty and other Inland Revenue or municipal taxes.

SIR W. HARCOURT : I hope the right hon. Gentleman will pardon me. I desired also to say that the power of the Crown is never enforced in the case of the non-payment of Crown debts unless the debtor is guilty of malversation or has the money to pay the debt and refuses to pay. Surely no one will suggest that the Amendment of the Solicitor General should not apply in those cases.

SIR H. JAMES admitted that the last observations of the Chancellor of the Exchequer put a different aspect on the whole question. Malversation was, of course, a different thing. But he was about to say that while the right hon. Gentleman objected to the differentiation of this tax from other Crown and municipal taxes, he should recollect that this tax was a very peculiar one, and was, in its nature and incidence, entirely different from every other tax. Debtors under this Bill would stand upon a totally different footing from other Crown debtors. In most other cases the individual who had to pay the tax was the real defaulter. He had contracted a personal liability himself. But in this case the person who had to pay the tax was the executor who had not, personally, incurred any debt at all, and who derived no benefit from the subject-matter out of which the tax was paid. An executor who did not pay the tax might be absolutely unable to raise the money upon the estate for the purpose of discharging the duty. It would be most cruel and most unjust to send such a man to prison because he was unable to pay the duty. The right hon. Gentleman had said that the Crown would not enforce imprisonment in such a case, but under the Government Amendment the Crown would have the right to enforce it, and the debtor would be at the mere mercy of the Crown. He did not think that it would redound to the benefit of the community if the obligations of executors were made more onerous than they were at present. He himself had occasionally had to act as the executor of some of his old friends, but if the Government Amendment was persisted in he should never become an executor again if he could help it. The result of the Government Amendment being accepted would be that only reckless persons who did not care what happened would accept the position of executors. He confessed that it was new to him to hear that the Municipal Bodies had the power to imprison their debtors in perpetuity. In the case of ordinary debtors they could not be imprisoned unless proof were given that they were able to pay, but in the case of Crown debtors under this Bill no proof of ability to pay was required as a preliminary to imprisonment. He hoped that the House would not place executors under this Bill in the arbitrary power of the Crown. If the Crown had the right to enforce payment of a Crown debt by imprisonment everyone must desire that so absolute a power should be removed from the Statute Book.

MR. GOSCHEN : It will depend on the answer to a question whether I will support the Government or the Amendment. But I say at once it would not be wise at this stage of a Bill of this kind to make a new departure with regard to the rights of the Crown in respect to this duty and all other taxes of the Crown, and on general grounds I should be inclined to support the Government if this clause places the Estate Duty on the same footing as the existing Death Duties. Would the executor be liable to these pains and penalties in respect to Probate Duty at present?

SIR W. HARCOURT : Yes.

MR. GOSCHEN : If so, I wish to know why it is necessary to introduce these words at all? It would seem from their introduction that some new principle is being applied to the Estate Duty that is not now applied to Probate Duty.

SIR W. HARCOURT : There is no difference; and therefore this duty is exactly on the same footing as the Probate Duty now.

MR. GOSCHEN : My hon. Friends who are learned in the law will be able to argue that point better than I can. But it seems to be that there is only one hypothesis on which the words can be and just in civil cases, and his own Amendment proposed to give all these powers as against the Crown debtor. Even fines and penalties recoverable under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts were by the Act of 1879 similarly limited in the sanctions by which they were enforceable, since means to pay must be proved to the satisfaction of the Magistrates, and imprisonment for default was limited to three months. Thus the whole tendency of modern, civil, and even criminal legislation was at variance with the Solicitor General's Amendment and with the perpetual imprisonment which might involve even for innocent Crown debtors, while under his (Sir A. Rollit's) Amendment ample provisions would exist to enforce payment of Crown, like civil, debts. And if the Solicitor General's Amendment were passed without the addition proposed by himself, what might be the unfortunate position of a Crown debtor for the duties, though their liability was limited to the assets which had been realised? It had been decided, and it needed a decision for the purpose, that as the Crown was not expressly named in the Debtors' Act, 1869, the Crown was not bound by the limitations of imprisonment specified in that Statute. So, then, by the Crown Debts Act, 1865, the Attorney General had only to go as representing the Crown into the Exchequer, and, by the most summary process, the Crown could in 14 days, and without, necessarily, any preliminary proceedings or pleadings, recover judgment for these largely-increased duties, or double duties, or other penalties. Then, unlike the case of any other civil debtor, without any proof of means or possibility of payment whatever, and without any further hearing or judicial process, the Crown could at once issue an old and obsolete writ, take the body of its debtor, and keep him without the possibility of release except on full payment, or by the mercy, or as he would rather term it, by the caprice of the Crown. All this, if, indeed, it were necessary at all, having regard to other parts of the Clause 8, was an anachronism utterly at variance with the tendency of the times and of the law against imprisonment for debt and against interminable imprisonment, and ought not to have given to it any additional sanction or countenance by Parliament. He, therefore, proposed his Amendment to limit imprisonments, and enforce the condition precedent of proof of means of payment, and so to mitigate the rigour of these Revenue laws. In exceptional cases of fiduciary fraud the case would be met by the exceptions in the Debtor's Act, which permitted longer, but still limited, imprisonment, and, in the absence of such aggravating circumstances, the Crown ought to have, like any subject, no more than the ample protection accorded by the ordinary law and the powers conferred by the Bill, which itself incorporated the existing Crown Debt Law upon the subject. He, therefore, moved his Amendment, and should persist in it so long as the Solicitor General's Amendment to his own Bill was before the House.

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment, after the word "accountable," to insert the words—

"But any proceedings against him to recover such unpaid duty shall be subject to the provisions and limitations of The Debtors' Act, 1869."—(Sir A. Rollit.)

Question proposed, "That those words be inserted in the proposed Amendment."

SIR W. HARCOURT: The proposal of the hon. Gentleman would place the collection of the tax under this Bill on a different footing from that of any other tax in the country. That is a very serious proposal, and I do not think it is one that will be supported by any responsible person. The power that the Crown now asks for is exercised by all Municipal and Local Authorities where default is made in payment of debts due to them. That the fears of the hon. Gentleman with regard to the possible cruel operation of the Amendment are unfounded is proved by the fact that our gaols are not at the present time overcrowded by those who are unable to pay the debts they owe to the various Municipal and Local Authorities or to the Inland Revenue Department. Of course, if it be desired to abolish the system that universally prevails with regard to public debts—whether debts to the Local Authorities, or debts to the State authorities—a proposal to effect that reform in the law might be brought forward on a fitting occasion, but I submit that this is not the proper time for discussing the question. The hon. Member who moved

W. Harcourt) thought that this point could be met if they substituted the word "liable" for "accountable," and then the liability would be just the same as that of any other Crown debtor. In answer to the right hon. Member for St. George's, he had to say that he had asked and had been told that these words, "debtor to Her Majesty," were used in the Succession Duty Acts, and other Acts of a similar character, and, therefore, in retaining these words they should be maintaining the general rule. He was sure that if the question went to a Division the right hon. Member for St. George's would not support a proposal to place this tax on a different footing to other taxes, and imperil the means of raising the Revenue of the country. He hoped the substitution of the word "liable" for "accountable" in the Amendment of the Government would be held to meet the case.

*SIR M. HICKS-BEACH: How would that read? Would it not read this way: "Every person accountable for Estate Duty shall be a debtor to the Crown for the amount of duty for which he is liable"?

SIR W. HARCOURT said, what was meant was this: The hon. and learned Member had pointed out that a person might be accountable for more than he was liable for under this clause. That was to say, he might have to account for moneys that ultimately would not come into his hands, and what the Government desired was that he should be debtor only for that which came into his hands, and for which he was declared to be liable. He thought the alteration he had suggested in the Amendment of the Government would meet the case.

MR. COURTNEY (Bodmin, Cornwall) was afraid the Amendment proposed by his right hon. Friend would not meet the real difficulties which underlay this clause. To say that they would avoid the difficulty by changing the word "accountable" into "liable" was to suppose the words had the same meaning and produced different results. A man who was accountable was liable in the first instance.

SIR W. HARCOURT: That is not so. He is declared to be accountable for the whole, but liable only for that which comes into his hands.

Sir W. Harcourt

MR. COURTNEY said, that no doubt under the Succession Duty Act it was expressly provided that Succession Duty should be a Crown debt from the successor—that was the person who got the property or benefit in respect of which the duty was charged. That was, of course, very much more limited than what was proposed here. He thought the Member for Islington was well justified in calling attention to the general principle, and he was astonished at the line of reasoning which was adopted by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the first instance, when he said that they were proposing to take away from the Crown the remedy which every Municipal Corporation had, and the hon. Member for Islington, who was President of the Association of Municipal Corporations, would, if he were successful in this instance, find himself in awkward relations with his friends in the Association out of doors, who would say, "You have given up the remedy which we possessed." He found in the Debtors' Act of 1869, which abolished imprisonment for debt, that there was excepted from the debts in respect of which that abolition was enacted "default in payment of any sum recoverable summarily before a Justice of the Peace or Justices of the Peace."

Therefore, they had not abolished imprisonment for debt in respect of rates. But there was added this proviso—

"Provided that no person shall be imprisoned in any case excepted from the operation of this section for a longer period than 12 months."

So that, in fact, the remedy that a Municipal Corporation or any other Public Body had was, at the outside, the imprisonment of a defaulter for 12 months; and inasmuch as it rested with the discretion of a Magistrate, that was never heard of and would never be exercised. It was impossible to sustain the argument that in endeavouring to limit the Crown remedy here they were doing something which would put the Municipal Corporations in the position of depriving them and other Local Bodies of powers they enjoyed now. There was nothing in that argument, and therefore they had to fall back upon the supposed necessity of giving the Crown, for the purpose of enforcing its rights, this power, which involved the possible consequences of perpetual imprisonment.

Was it right that this discretionary power should be allowed to be vested in the Executive Government for the time being? The Chancellor of the Exchequer said the power would never be exercised. That was the plea of all tyrants. Only give them the power and it would never be exercised. Constitutional reformers were not inclined to give them the power, and he hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Islington would insist on the Amendment.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES thought that on the merits of the question every Member of the House, unless he occupied a seat on the Treasury Bench, would agree that the Government had no case whatever. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said it would not be right to exceptionally deprive the Government in the case of these duties of the powers they possessed in regard to other duties. He was the last person when a tax had to be levied to deprive the Government of adequate means of levying it. But the very first words of this clause said that every power now possessed by the Crown for the recovery of any duty leviable by or with reference to death was given for the levying and recovery of these very duties; therefore, every power now desired to be possessed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer was already possessed by the first words of this clause. If it be absolutely necessary to press this Amendment of the Government it must be because the Chancellor of the Exchequer wished to have further exceptional powers. He thought he could understand why the right hon. Gentleman wanted exceptional powers, because he wished to get the Crown debt out of the person accountable but not liable for it. But the right hon. Gentleman had suggested that he was willing to replace "accountable" by the word "liable," and therefore that cut away the last vestige of foundation for this Amendment. He could not understand the necessity for the Amendment of the Solicitor General. He thought it referred to those who were accountable, but not liable. The first words of the clause they were upon said—

"The existing law and practice relating to any of the duties now leviable on or with reference to death shall, subject to the provisions of this Act and so far as the same are applicable, apply for the purposes of the collection, recovery, and repayment of Estate Duty."

That covered the whole case; that was all the Chancellor of the Exchequer professed to want, and the power was given under the existing law for the recovery of Death Duties. The right hon. Gentleman had the power he desired, and he would ask him to recognise that fact, and direct the Solicitor General to withdraw his Amendment.

SIR W. HARCOURT said, if the hon. Member was right in his contention that the power asked for was already given them this discussion was superfluous. But he thought the Amendment was necessary in order to make it clear that the power was given.

MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby) said, the Chancellor of the Exchequer knew that the first words of the clause did not carry out what the Amendment was designed to effect. The clause only referred to beneficiaries, and did not affect executors at all; therefore these words were required to affect executors who were accountable for duty. The right hon. Gentleman brought forward the case of ratepayers. In the case of ratepayers, as in that of beneficiaries under a will, they were going to get something, and ought, therefore, to be made to pay. But in this case it was the executor and other persons who were going to get no benefit who were to be brought under this penalty. As to rates, everybody knew that where rates were not paid the defaulters were proceeded against by summons, and made to pay by small instalments, or were sent to prison for a very short term. The Amendment of the Government entirely changed the law. Under the Succession Duty the Government had not got these powers, and therefore this Amendment was brought forward at the eleventh hour, when they had no opportunity of reconsidering it.

MR. R. T. REID was sorry that this storm had arisen over a modest Amendment of his which simply applied to the Estate Duty the law applicable to the Probate, Legacy, and Succession Duties. Succession Duty was made a debt to the Crown by the 16th and 17th Viet., chap. 51, sect. 45. Legacy Duty was made a debt to the Crown by the 36th of George III., chapter 52, section 6, whilst the section which applied this law to the Probate Duty stated—

"If any person who ought to have obtained probate or letters of administration, or delivered a further affidavit, or exhibited an inventory, or who is required to deliver such account as aforesaid, shall neglect to do so within the period prescribed by law for the purpose, he shall be liable to pay to Her Majesty . . . the amount chargeable, and the same shall be a debt due from him to the Crown, and be recoverable by any way or means now enforced for the recovery of the Probate Duty and the Legacy Duty."

The person who had to pay the Probate Duty was the executor. He did not think it would be urged that this duty should stand in an isolated position different from other duties and other debts due to the Crown. By the Amendment he was simply endeavouring to make it clear that the remedies which by inevitable custom were applicable for the Death Duties should be applicable to this duty.

SIR D. MACFARLANE could not understand why the Government might not be content with the words in Clause 44 of the Succession Act, because that clause said—

"The following persons besides the successor shall be personally accountable to Her Majesty for duty payable in respect to any succession, but to the extent only of the property or funds actually received."

The clause then proceeded to state who those persons were who would be accountable. It was not merely a trustee, but trustee, guardian, committee, tutor, and so on. That would have served the purpose of the Government, and would have saved the House this controversy. The clause he had quoted seemed to contain everything contained by the Amendment, and he would suggest that even now it was not too late to adopt it in place of the Amendment.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, those who had listened to the Debate must have felt themselves rather confused between the different issues raised. There were two issues—one was that raised in the clear and able speech of the hon. and learned Member for Essex, and the other raised by the Mover of the Amendment now under discussion. The hon. Member for Essex pointed out that under the preceding part of the clause a person might be accountable for duty for which he was not liable, and it might or might not be proper to imprison him for a duty for which he was liable, but it was not proper to imprison him for a duty for which he was not liable. The right hon. Gentleman had promised to substitute the word "liable" for "accountable." They should perhaps have understood this matter better if the Attorney General had not got up at an earlier part of the discussion and explained that "accountable" was exactly the same as "liable," and that in fact there was no distinction whatever to be drawn between the two. It was an unfortunate preface to an Amendment by his own chief to substitute the word "liable" for the word "accountable." But he passed by that, which, after all, was a subsidiary point, and he came to the main issue raised by his hon. Friend below the Gangway, and that was whether they should or should not continue in this new Act the antiquated system which had, nominally at all events, prevailed with regard to all their system of levying taxation. The Chancellor of the Exchequer made a slip when he told them that this method was still in operation with regard to the debts of Municipalities. That was not the case, because they had reformed that section of their law. The whole system of their law relating to local taxation had been reformed, and it was time they began to carry some reform with regard to Imperial taxation. It might be true, as the Member for Lynnh Regis had pointed out, that they had already unconsciously adopted the system in the earlier part of the clause. At all events, he should avail himself of the opportunity of being able to record his vote against any repetition in this Statute of a system, or any continuation of a system, which ought long ago to have been discarded. His right hon. Friend had pointed out a certain inconvenience in not having one system applicable to all existing modes of taxation. There were worse things, after all, than anomalies, and it was better they should now lay down the principle that in a future Act, involving taxation of the community, the more humane and equally efficient method, confined to the recovery of municipal and local debts, should be applied also to the collection and recovery of Imperial debts. He did not know why the Government assumed that these barbaric powers were necessary in order to enable recovery. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said they would never be put in force, but

Was it right that this discretionary power should be allowed to be vested in the Executive Government for the time being? The Chancellor of the Exchequer said the power would never be exercised. That was the plea of all tyrants. Only give them the power and it would never be exercised. Constitutional reformers were not inclined to give them the power, and he hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Islington would insist on the Amendment.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES thought that on the merits of the question every Member of the House, unless he occupied a seat on the Treasury Bench, would agree that the Government had no case whatever. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said it would not be right to exceptionally deprive the Government in the case of these duties of the powers they possessed in regard to other duties. He was the last person when a tax had to be levied to deprive the Government of adequate means of levying it. But the very first words of this clause said that every power now possessed by the Crown for the recovery of any duty leviable by or with reference to death was given for the levying and recovery of these very duties; therefore, every power now desired to be possessed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer was already possessed by the first words of this clause. Mr. R. T. Reid

MR. BYRNE moved to amend Sub-section 7 by the insertion of words providing that postponement of payment should be allowed where the Commissioners were satisfied that the duty on any property could not "without hardship" be raised at once. As the sub-section stood the Government had provided that where the Commissioners were satisfied that the Estate or Settlement Duty could not be raised at once they might allow it to remain for a certain period at interest as they thought fit. It was quite certain that in some cases the money could not be raised without hardship, and he desired in order to meet such cases that these words should be inserted.

Amendment proposed, in page 8, line 11, after the word "cannot," to insert the words "without hardship."—(Mr. Byrne.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'without hardship' be there inserted."

MR. R. T. REID said, he had no objection to reduce the apparent rigidity of the sub-section, but he thought the words "without excessive sacrifice" would be better than those proposed.

MR. BYRNE said, the hon. and learned Gentleman's suggestion seemed extremely reasonable, and he was willing to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. R. T. REID moved to insert in the sub-section the words "without excessive exercise."

Amendment agreed to.

SIR R. TEMPLE proposed to omit from the sub-section the words "providing for the payment of interest in cases where the Commissioners allowed the payment of duty to be postponed." He quite acknowledged that where the taxpayer was himself to blame, where the postponement of payment was owing to his own default, or to circumstances under his control, the charge should be enforced; but where it was not owing to his fault or to circumstances which he could have avoided, he ought not to be called upon to pay. Such a provision was in accordance neither with justice nor with common sense, and he wished to renew the protest he had already made against it. Although the words "without excessive sacrifice" had now been inserted, they would not materially alter the matter where there was an absolute impossibility to pay, and the Government were asking for that to which they had no sort of claim. He had had as much to do with taxation as perhaps any Members of that House; but he had never heard such a proposition until he came inside those walls, that where an unfortunate taxpayer was utterly unable to pay at once he should be charged interest. It would be most oppressive on Her Majesty's subjects, and he must appeal to both sides of the House, on their behalf, for mercy. He could not understand how any Liberal Members of the Legislature could support the Government in making such a demand.

Amendment proposed, in page 8, line 12, to leave out from the word "extent," to the end of Sub-section (7) of Clause 8.—(Sir R. Temple.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'and on payment of such interest,' stand part of the Bill."

SIR W. HARCOURT said, he did not think it was possible for the Government to accept the Amendment. When they gave an indulgence to a man they did not let him off the debt. If no interest were charged they would be letting him off the debt.

MR. HANBURY said, he thought the Amendment was aimed at the rate of interest charged.

Question put, and agreed to.

SIR R. WEBSTER moved—

In Clause 8, page 8, line 13, leave out from "exceeding" to "and," in line 14, and insert "three per cent."

He said the clause contemplated that there would be a difficulty in raising money, and that, therefore, there might be a question of delay or of some sacrifice. He could not understand why the Government should say that if there was this delay a higher rate of interest should be levied. He submitted that 3 per cent. was fair all round, and that it would be an unjust thing that where there was a particular piece of property bringing in 4 or 5 per cent. it should be made the excuse for extracting a higher rate of interest. The delay was only to be allowed in cases of hardship, and he submitted that it would be unjust to

MR. R. T. REID agreed, that as estates accountable for duty might consist of various kinds of property it would be desirable that the value of each class of property should be stated. He presumed that some guiding principle must be followed by the Commissioners in dealing with properties and making these valuations. It was not proposed to impose an obligation upon the Commissioners in every case, but that in certain cases they might do so. Did the right hon. Gentleman suggest any other form of words?

SIR R. WEBSTER hoped the language would be enlarged. He had looked in vain through The Debates to find it; but if his memory was correct, the Solicitor General had stated in Committee that he would provide for "classes of property." Where those words came from he could not pretend to say. The property might comprise agricultural land, leaseholds, and a variety of matters, which would have to be valued. If that was to be done only wherever it was convenient, why should not the words be made as wide instead of as narrow as possible?

MR. R. T. REID said, the hon. and learned Gentleman would see that the words were wide enough and practical enough if he would refer to them.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, although the Solicitor General had endeavoured to obviate the difficulties which had been put to him, he had not completely met the case, the serious part of which would arise in regard to real estate. The duty would be a first charge, and without some certificate titles would be incomplete, so that people would not be able to sell real estate to which they were entitled when properties had to be broken up. Difficulty must arise where they could not show that they had paid their rateable proportion. The Commissioners were only to certify the amount of the valuation of portions where they were of opinion that that could be done, and it was desirable to enlarge their discretion.

MR. BARTLEY said, the words might well be a little wider. They did not fully meet the case. This was not a contentious matter, and as a discretion was to be given to the Commissioners, there need be no question as to enlarging the language. His original Amendment was in that form. Many different classes of property would have to be dealt with, and building property would require quite another kind of valuation to agricultural land. Mines, shipping, and many other descriptions of property would constitute different classes, while land would not. It was advisable that the words should be as wide as possible for the convenience of both Commissioners and beneficiaries.

MR. GRANT LAWSON moved, as an Amendment, to insert, after "class," the words "or description of property." When this question was being discussed in Committee, the Solicitor General invited them to postpone it to the Report stage. He pointed out on that occasion that there would be difficulty if words of that kind were not inserted. If the Commissioners were not to be allowed to value in classes and portions what would be the effect? Two valuations would have to be made: one as between Somerset House and the persons accountable, and the other as between those persons and to the various beneficiaries to whom the estate passed. If the duty were paid by trustees, surely it would be an economy that the valuation made for Somerset House purposes should settle the distribution of the property and also how much of the duty was to be payable by each of the beneficiaries. The Solicitor General himself had recognised in Clause 14 that it was desirable a valuation of this sort should be made, because he proposed to insert a provision with regard to duty recoverable from any person entitled being settled as between that person and the Commissioners. But if the Commissioners could not set out the value of each portion passing to beneficiaries, how were they to be bound by the valuation?

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment, after the word "class," to insert the words "or description of property."—(Mr. Grant Lawson.)

Question proposed, "That those words be inserted in the proposed Amendment."

MR. R. T. REID thought that matter ought not to be made the subject of debate at present. Why were not these words sufficient for the purpose? It was surely unnecessary to discuss the matter further, as it was in the discretion of the Commissioners.

Question put, and agreed to.

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

In Clause 8, page 8, line 13, leave out from "exceeding" to "and," in line 14, and insert "three per cent."

exact the higher rate in return for the indulgence.

Amendment proposed, in page 8, line 13, to leave out from the word "exceeding," to the word "and," in line 14, and insert the words "three per cent."—(Sir R. Webster.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

SIR W. HARCOURT said, that 4 per cent. was the figure which had always been usual in such cases, and he saw no reason to alter it in the present instance. This was, in fact, a matter of administration which ought to be left to the department, which was not harsh and was not bound to ask 4 per cent. They might ask nothing at all, or they might ask something less than 4 per cent.

MR. GOSCHEN said, he thought it a rather dangerous practice to fix the rate of interest according to the profits of the property.

*MR. BUTCHER said, this clause contemplated cases of hardship, or where property could not be released without excessive sacrifice. The rate of interest was fixed according to the Statute of 1868, which named 4 per cent. as the proper rate of interest on Legacy Duty. But many things had happened since 1868. It was, for instance, a matter of common knowledge that, whereas trust investments formerly produced 4 per cent., it was nowadays extremely difficult to obtain 3 per cent. upon such investments. Was it not, he asked, fair that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should be satisfied with the rate of interest obtainable by trustees? No doubt 4 per cent. was a reasonable rate to exact in 1868; but the Government might well be content with 3 per cent. now.

Question put.

The House divided :—Ayes 163; Noes 114.—(Division List, No. 177.)

Amendment proposed, in page 8, line 15, after the word "fit," to insert the words—

"And where the Commissioners have allowed payment of Estate Duty in respect of property passing to the executor as such to be postponed, probate or letters of administration shall be granted if the certificate to be given by the proper officer of the court, under section thirty of The Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, shows that the Commissioners have allowed such payment to be postponed."—(Mr. Byrne.)

Sir R. Webster

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. R. T. REID said, he could not accept the Amendment. The hon. Gentleman provided that where time had been given probate should be granted. It was quite unnecessary to put that in. The object of the clause was that probate should be granted without money having to be paid out.

MR. J. G. LAWSON said, that all the Amendment proposed was that probate should be immediately granted, and it seemed to him to carry out what was the desire and intention of the Government themselves.

Question put, and negatived.

SIR R. TEMPLE (Surrey, Kingston) moved the omission of Sub-section 8 :—"Interest on arrears of duty shall be paid as if they were arrears of Legacy Duty." He took exception to the levying of interest at all, but otherwise had no particular ground for pressing the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 8, line 16, to leave out Sub-section (8) of Clause 8.—(Sir R. Temple.)

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill," put, and agreed to.

*MR. BUTCHER moved to insert after "duty," in line 17—

"but no person shall, in the absence of fraud on his part, be liable to pay interest on more than six years' arrears of Estate Duty."

He said, this Amendment touched a question which had already been discussed at some length—namely, the oppressive rights which had been possessed by the Crown since bygone ages. It dealt with that right which was embodied in one of those legal maxims which lawyers often heard, but had not as much respect for as they used to have, to the effect that the Crown's rights were affected by no Statute of Limitations whatever. He referred to the maxim, Nullum tempus occurrit regi. He thought that this was a right of the Crown which it would be well to put an end to. He was quite aware that the Commissioners exercised a discretion as to whether they should enforce arrears of duty or not. It often happened that from one cause or another, generally accidental, Probate Duty was not paid for a considerable number of years, and that then a claim was made for the duty and for arrears of interest. It was unpleasant enough for a man who thought he had paid all the duty which he would ever be called on to pay to learn, some 30 years after an estate had come into his possession, that he had to pay a considerable additional sum; but to have to pay, perhaps, 20 or 30 years' interest in addition to that sum was not only unpleasant, but was not in accordance with one's sense of justice. The number of years which he proposed in his Amendment was founded on the analogy of a Statute passed as long ago as the reign of James I.; but if the Government desired to alter the number to any reasonable extent he should not object.

Amendment proposed, in page 8, line 17, after the word "duty," to insert the words—

"but no person shall, in the absence of fraud on his part, be liable to pay interest on more than six years' arrears of Estate Duty."—(Mr. Butcher.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR W. HARCOURT: We must be careful for the protection of the Revenue not to carelessly break down the existing system. It must not be forgotten that this Estate Duty practically embraces the present Probate Duty and other duties, and we must therefore be careful, without being oppressive, not to limit the time too much. The hon. and learned Member is probably aware that in the practical working of the Probate Duty the operations extend over a long series of years, and he must observe that the fraud need not be on the part of the person liable for duty but might be on the part of the trustee. I am desirous, however, of meeting the hon. Member as far as I can, and I shall be willing to accept the Amendment standing in the name of the hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Byrne) lower down on the Paper with some modifications.

SIR R. WEBSTER said, the Amendment which the right hon. Gentleman proposed to accept and that now before the House did not seem to be quite on the same lines, and it would perhaps be convenient if the right hon. Gentleman indicated what modifications he intended to propose. The fact that a trustee was fraudulent ought not to be made a ground for forcing the person who was liable for the duty to pay interest for a long period. He himself thought that six years was quite sufficient, and unless there was a good reason for increasing the period he thought there was fair ground for agreeing to the six years.

SIR J. RIGBY pointed out that under the Bill the Estate Duty itself could not be recovered within six years of the settlement, and if the duty could not be recovered neither could the interest.

MR. GRANT LAWSON said, the question now before the House related to interest on duty in arrear with regard to which special provision was made in the Bill. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had spoken about not breaking down the present system, but the Bill made a great inroad upon the present system, because it introduced graduation and aggregation. He might inform the House that he himself had, 25 years after the death of his grandfather, received a little estate which belonged to his grandfather. Of course, this estate might have lifted the general estate of his grandfather into another scale, and then everybody who benefited by the estate would be in arrear, and interest would be payable under this Bill as it stood on the extra amount of duty that ought to have been paid.

MR. GOSCHEN: My hon. Friends are resting their support of this Amendment on two sets of arguments. One is the desire to place this debt on the same footing as debts from other people, and the other is the desire to meet any hardship that might arise out of the special character of the Estate Duty. I am bound to say that my conservative tendencies will not allow me entirely to change the whole method by which the debts of the Crown are obtained, and I shall therefore be unable to support this Amendment as far as it would place Crown debts on the same footing as other debts. As far as the question of interest is concerned, however, I think the proposal is well worth consideration. There have been cases in which the exaction of interest by the Crown has had a most cruel effect. In one case where Succession Duty became due 20 or 30 years after the death, and where the interest, I think at the rate of 5 per cent., was charged for that period, the claim was brought against people who were utterly ignorant of the fact that any Succession Duty was due at all. Only last year such a case cropped up, and I remember a case in which I represented the matter to the Inland Revenue Commissioners, and a remission was made in view of the extreme hardship that was involved. In that instance the interest, I believe, ran up to nearly hundreds of pounds. I should like to know from the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether it is possible that this matter of interest can be put on a more satisfactory footing generally than that on which it stands at present, and what he believes to be the real power of the Inland Revenue Department. I hoped that the Chancellor of the Exchequer might have been able himself to put down some Amendment with regard to the limitation of interest which would have satisfied my hon. Friends on this side of the House. I do not know whether it will be in his power either to insert some provision in this Bill, or to draw up Rules for the Inland Revenue Commissioners which would prevent hardships arising. I do not want to see persons, possibly owing to the negligence of their solicitors, exposed to the penalties which they now incur. I remember one case in which simple ruin stared a poor family in the face through the interest charged on the duty that had been payable some time before. I do not know that I can support the precise Amendment now before the House. Six years may be too short a period, though personally I think it is sufficient. It is perfectly natural that my hon. Friend should think that six years is a considerable time during which to exact interest where there has been no fraud or fault whatever on the part of the persons liable for the duty.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I am obliged to the right hon. Gentleman for what he has said. I am quite sure that he would not be likely to be responsible for anything that would seriously affect the Revenue. I think I can meet the right hon. Gentleman's wishes. He wishes, first of all, that there should be a clear indication given to the Commissioners to remit interest in cases where they should remit. We propose to give the Commissioners discretion in these cases. The form in which we should be willing to accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Byrne) is as follows:—

Mr. Goschen

"If after the expiration of 30 years from a death upon which Estate Duty became leviable any such duty remains unpaid, the Commissioners may, on the application of any persons accountable for such duty or interested in the property in respect of which duty is leviable, and on being satisfied that the non-payment did not arise from the wilful neglect or default of any person accountable for the duty, remit the payment of such duty or any part thereof or interest thereon."

*MR. BUTCHER said, in view of the right hon. Gentleman's statement, he would withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. BUTCHER said, he would be willing to move the Amendment very much in the form suggested by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He thought, however, it would be rather hard if a person should be held responsible for the arrears of interest in the event of the default having been made by some other person. He would, therefore, appeal to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to leave out the words—

"and on being satisfied that the non-payment did arise from the wilful neglect or default of any person accountable for the duty."

He formally moved the Amendment in the terms proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

MR. GOSCHEN said, he thought it would not be desirable to insert 30 years, as otherwise the Inland Revenue Commissioners might think that they ought not to act upon the Amendment except after 30 years.

SIR R. WEBSTER suggested that "20" years should be substituted for "30" years, and that the words "or liable" should be inserted after the first "accountable."

*SIR M. HICKS-BEACH asked whether the Government would not be able to make the concession they had made apply to the other Death Duties as well as to the Estate Duty?

SIR W. HARCOURT: I am of a very accommodating nature, and I will consider that suggestion, although it will be rather difficult if we have the various duties mixed up. I will, however, consider the point before Monday. I see no objection to the insertion of the words "or liable." The hon. and learned Member objects to the words "wilful neglect," &c. It does not seem to me to be very material whether they are there or not, because the discretion is left absolutely with the Commissioners, as I understand it. We shall have no objection to substituting "20" years for "30" years, or to putting in the words "if they think fit" after the "Commissioners may."

On the proposition of Mr. BYRNE, the Amendment was then agreed to in the following form:—

"If after the expiration of 20 years from a death upon which Estate Duty became leviable, any such duty remains unpaid, the Commissioners may, if they think fit, on the application of any person accountable or liable for such duty or interested in the property in respect of which the duty is leviable, remit the payment of duty or any part thereof or interest thereon."

Amendment proposed, in page 8, line 20, after the word "them," to insert the words "and in cases where the over-payment was due to over-valuation by the Commissioners."—(Mr. R. T. Reid.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR J. LUBBOCK (London University) said, the learned Solicitor General admitted that in this case it was only reasonable interest should be paid. He would like to call attention to the words in the second sub-section of Clause 7, which was passed last night. There, in estimating the amount of an estate, foreign debts were not to be allowed for, but they were to be brought in subsequently, and the amount of Estate Duty overpaid was to be returned. He submitted to the Chancellor of the Exchequer that this was a case in which interest should be paid; it was due to no fault whatever of the executor, and surely it was very hard that he should have the money returned without any interest. If he was correct in his interpretation of the Bill the Government must see it was a very hard case. He thought interest should be paid in this case just as much as in the other case. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would agree to the Amendment he had on the Paper to leave out the words "where the over-payment was due to over-valuation by the Commissioners." There might be other cases in which, from no fault of the executor, the Estate Duty was overpaid, and in all these cases it was only fair there should be interest given for the money so overpaid.

SIR W. HARCOURT said, he must confess that he did not think this was a fair or reasonable mode of dealing with the question of interest on a duty returned. He was bound to say they had received the support they had a right to receive from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for St. George's (Mr. Goschen), and he should have thought that they might have received some support from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the London University (Sir J. Lubbock). The demand of the right hon. Gentleman was entirely unreasonable as the over-payment might have been in consequence of the carelessness of the executor himself or some person interested in the property, but it afterwards striking them that the duty had been overpaid the matter was rectified and the duty returned. The demand was contrary to all precedent, and he did not think it was fair to the Government after the matter had been threshed out and the Amendment of the hon. Member for York accepted.

*SIR H. MEYSEY-THOMPSON (Stafford, Handsworth) said, that as he understood the matter the executors of any deceased person were bound to include all property and all debts due to the deceased abroad in the total aggregate of his property, and to pay duty on the whole amount, but they were not to be allowed to deduct debts owing abroad by the estate of the deceased in making up this total. They had to take their chance of getting back the overpaid amount afterwards by proving the existence of these debts, and to receive no interest on the overpaid amount. But these debts might only be proved to the satisfaction of the Department after the lapse of years. He himself went to St. Petersburg more than 10 years ago on the affairs of a company. Large sums were in question, and large claims were made on both sides, and the matter being a complicated one, he was sorry to say that it was not finally settled yet. Therefore, anyone who had to pay the whole amount of the Estate Duty without deducting the debts, and had to wait ten years before the sum overpaid was returned, and then obtained no interest, was, in his opinion, extremely unfairly treated.

SIR R. WEBSTER said, he did not intend to press the point as to the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London (Sir J. Lubbock), but he must say he could not conceive on what grounds the Chancellor of the Exchequer was justified in saying he had not been fairly met upon this and other points by his right hon. Friend. He thought the clause of the learned Solicitor General as it now stood ought to be accepted, though the injustice, in fact, did remain if too much money had been received by the Exchequer, and held, it might be for a long time, in their hands, and then returned without interest. He felt to a great extent they had been met fairly, and therefore he thought his right hon. Friend ought not to press the matter.

Question put, and agreed to.

On Motion of Mr. R. T. REID, the following Amendment was agreed to :—
Page 8, line 43, at end, insert—

“(14) The form of certificate required to be given by the proper officer of the court under Section 30 of The Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, may be varied by a rule of court in such manner as may appear necessary for carrying into effect this Act.”

Amendment proposed, in page 8, line 43, after the last Amendment, to insert the words—

“(15) Nothing in this section shall render liable to duty a bonâ fide purchaser for valuable consideration without notice.”—(Mr. R. T. Reid.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

*Mr. BUTCHER said, he begged to move the Amendment standing in the name of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Essex (Mr. Byrne). There were two classes of persons—persons accountable for duty and persons made liable for duty, and he took it that it was the intention of the Government that a person accountable should be treated in the same way as the person liable for the duty.

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment, after the words “liable to,” to insert the words “or accountable for.”—(Mr. Butcher.)

Question proposed, “That the words ‘or accountable for’ be there inserted.”

Mr R. T. REID said, the exemption was intended for bonâ fide purchasers for value, and the form of words was that—

“Nothing in this section shall render liable to duty a bonâ fide purchaser for valuable consideration.”

Sir R. Webster

How anyone, after that, could contend they were liable for duty, he did not know. If they said a man was not liable, surely the Queen's English was plain enough. The hon. and learned Gentleman would see he could not accept the Amendment, and he hoped he would not press it.

SIR R. WEBSTER said, the learned Solicitor General had not adduced any arguments why the Amendment, which certainly could do no harm, should not be accepted. He submitted that the Amendment was a right one, and that the words “or accountable for” should be inserted. As he could not speak again upon this question, there was one other matter he must mention. He would ask the Solicitor General whether either now or at some time or other, he intended to apply some definition of the words “bonâ fide purchaser for valuable consideration without notice?” This was an important matter, and perhaps the learned Solicitor General would tell them how he proposed to deal with the matter.

Mr. R. T. REID said, that by the indulgence of the House he might be permitted to say that he still thought the Amendment was not necessary. Upon the other question, if there was to be a definition of “bonâ fide purchaser” the proper place for it would be in the Definition Clause, but the hon. and learned Gentleman must not understand him as saying he thought any definition at all was required.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR said, he did not think the learned Gentleman had appreciated the point of his hon. and learned Friend. The learned Solicitor General had appealed to his own inner consciousness in favour of the view that a person not liable for duty could not be asked to pay duty. Of course he would not. He agreed with the learned Gentleman that not a sixpence could be extracted under this Bill from any person for that for which he was not liable, but the Bill drew a distinction between a person who was liable and a person who was accountable. The argument of the Chancellor of the Exchequer upon another Amendment was entirely based upon the fact that though persons were not liable they might be made accountable; that they might be called upon to do a great many disagreeable things, because, though not liable, they were accountable. In Subsection 4 of Clause 8 the Solicitor General would see that a person might be required to do certain things which it was not the intention of the Government and not consistent with equity that bonâ fide purchasers for value should be asked to do. To make it clear that they should not, and to guide the unfortunate courts of law, his hon. and learned Friend proposed to add the words "or accountable for." The words would have the effect of making it clear on the surface that a bonâ fide purchaser for value was neither liable nor accountable. He hoped, therefore, the learned Solicitor General would re-consider his decision.

MR. R. T. REID said, that if that was the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman, though he did not think that the words were necessary, he would not further oppose the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman.

Question put, and agreed to.

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

*MR. BUTCHER moved, in page 9, line 3, after "shall," insert "subject to all incumbrances existing at the death of the deceased." He said the Amendment had this effect: that whereas the Government Bill appeared to make the duty a first charge on property, the Amendment sought to make it a charge subject to existing charges and incumbrances. The question was, what was the property which passed at death? He said the property was the property free from incumbrances, because when they estimated the value they had to deduct the incumbrances. Did not that show that the property which passed at death was the property itself without the incumbrances? It was provided by Clause 7 that in order to ascertain the value of an estate they should deduct certain incumbrances. If the property passing on death was the land itself if they were to carry out the intention of the Government and make the duty only a charge after the existing incumbrances, they would have to put in express words. As the words stood in the Bill there might be considerable doubt on the subject. He asked that the words he suggested might be put in in order to save the judges of the High Court, who were constantly called upon to construe difficult Acts of Parliament—and this would not be the least difficult. If some such words were not inserted the judges would have considerable difficulty in knowing what the meaning of Parliament was. His words made the meaning clear; they could not do any harm or affect the liability to duty of any item of property or person throughout the Kingdom. The adoption of his Amendment would make quite clear that which was not clear; would facilitate the administration of estates and the collection of the duty, and would be of advantage alike to those who had to pay and the Commissioners who had to obtain the duty.

Amendment proposed, in page 9, line 3, after the word "shall," to insert the words "subject to all incumbrances existing at the death of the deceased." — (Mr. Butcher.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. BYRNE trusted he should be able to convince the Solicitor General that the insertion of these words would be entirely harmless, so far as the Revenue was concerned, whilst they were necessary to be put in for the purposes of those who had to pay the duty. The first part of Clause 9 provided that—

"A rateable part of the Estate Duty on an estate in proportion to the value of any property which does not pass to the executor as such, shall be a first charge on the property in respect of which duty is leviable."

The sole question was whether by being "a first charge on the property in respect of which duty is leviable" it was meant in the ordinary legal sense that it was to be a first charge in advance of all mortgages, legal or otherwise. All incumbrances must belong to one of two classes. They must either be legal incumbrances or equitable incumbrances. If they were dealing with legal incumbrances alone he agreed that these words would not be necessary, and that such incumbrances would take priority over the duty it was proposed should be paid. But there was a class of incumbrances, such as second and third mortgages, and many others, known as equitable mortgages. Taking the case of a purely equitable incumbrance, it did appear to him that unless they introduced words saying "subject to all incumbrances," the duty would be the first charge on the property in priority to all equitable incumbrances.

If they said "such and such an incumbrance shall be a first charge on the property subject to that incumbrance," that might mean upon the whole property or it might mean on the particular property subject to legal incumbrances. Apply that to the present case. A new duty was created, and that duty was to be a first charge upon the property liable to the duty. If there was a pre-existing legal mortgage, of course it was only the equitable redemption that passed; but if there were half-a-dozen or twenty incumbrances on the property, subsequent to the legal mortgage, the words of the sub-section would make the duty a first charge on the property after the legal mortgage. He contended that it was plain from the reading of the sub-section that the Estate Duty would be a first charge in priority of all equitable mortgages. He was sure that was not the intention of the Government. He was sure there was no difference between the two sides of the House as to the object to be carried out—namely, that only property subject to all incumbrances existing at the death of the deceased should be charged with the duty. That object was not carried out by the words of the sub-section, and, as the Amendment would absolutely make no difference from the point of view of the Revenue authorities, surely the reasonable course for the Government to take was to accept the Amendment.

SIR R. WEBSTER thought the House was entitled to some statement from the Government with regard to the Amendment. He did not think the Government were justified in sitting still and forcing Members of the Opposition to speak, and thereby exhaust their right to reply when the Government at last made their statement on the Amendment. But if the Attorney General chose to adopt that course, the Members of the Opposition would continue to press the situation on the attention of the Government. They were not speaking now of legal mortgages. No one suggested that if a mortgage was on the property anything passed but the equitable redemption. They were speaking of the disposition of deeds with bankers; of charges created which were only equitable charges, and of charges which were payable by custom for a long time. Surely it was not intended that the Estate Duty should come first. Indeed, it had been said in Committee by the Solicitor General and by the Secretary for India that it was not intended that the Estate Duty should have priority over bonâ fide incumbrances. Therefore, it was necessary that the matter should be put in the clause beyond all question and dispute; but it was not so as the clause stood, because all conveyancers were of opinion that the words "shall be a first charge on the property" would put it in the power of the Crown to say that the Estate Duty should come before incumbrances which were only equitable incumbrances. Under the circumstances, he thought they were entitled to some explanation from the Government.

SIR J. RIGBY: Very great care has been taken throughout this Bill to secure that the word "property," whenever we are dealing with property charged with this duty, does not mean the subject of the property itself, but the actual interest of the property that passes, and to introduce these words "subject to all incumbrances existing at the death of the deceased" would be to take these incumbrances twice over, which is not our intention.

SIR R. WEBSTER: Show us any words in the Bill to that effect.

SIR J. RIGBY: I think if those Amendments are brought forward, it is for you to show their necessity.

SIR R. WEBSTER: So we have.

SIR J. RIGBY: I think I can speak with some certainty that the Amendment is not necessary, because I know that over and over again in every part of the Bill—

SIR R. WEBSTER: Show where.

SIR J. RIGBY: The hon. and learned Gentleman is a great stickler for propriety when the Members of this Bench are concerned, but I do not know that he is as great a stickler for propriety when he himself is concerned. I observe that he has a particular objection to speak when there is someone who can reply to him.

SIR R. WEBSTER: I rise to Order, Sir. I beg to observe that I said nothing and intended nothing to justify such personal observations. I even offered to give way for a Member of the Government.

Mr. Byrne

SIR J. RIGBY : I am not talking of this occasion. You are charging us with not coming forward—

SIR R. WEBSTER : On this Amendment.

*SIR J. RIGBY : I will not deal with the matter further. I am only endeavouring to defend ourselves from mistaken ideas of a want of courtesy which are far from our minds. But to come to the point. What is the property on which the duty is chargeable? Property which at the time of his death the deceased was competent to dispose. So it is set out in the Bill. Can it be suggested that he was competent to dispose of equitable charges that did not belong to him? Again, we have "property in which the deceased had an interest." Can it be said that he had an interest in equitable charges? The word "property" is used throughout the Bill to mean the beneficial interest which passes and does not include any incumbrances existing on the estate at the death of the deceased. The introduction of those words would not be making the Bill clearer. It would be introducing into it an element of doubt, or rather I would say it would be introducing words absolutely wrong in this connection; and which, if they were taken literally, and not overruled as being inconsistent with other clauses of the Bill, would mean that the incumbrances on the property could be reckoned twice over.

Question put.

The House divided :—Ayes 45 ; Noes 107.—(Division List, No. 178.)

Amendment proposed, in page 9, line 4, after the word "leviable," to insert the words—

"Provided that the property shall not be chargeable as against a bond fide purchaser thereof for valuable consideration without notice."—(Mr. R. T. Reid.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR R. WEBSTER said, he did not object to the insertion of the words; but he would like to ask whether the Government intended to introduce into the Bill some definition of the term "without notice"? for he was sure it would be necessary, as they were now dealing with a new set of circumstances.

MR. R. T. REID : Certainly not. It is not our intention to propose any definition of a term very familiar in Courts of Law, and very familiar to lawyers.

Question put, and agreed to.

On Motion of Mr. R. T. REID, the following Amendments were agreed to :—

Page 9, line 10, leave out "on" and insert "in respect of."

Page 9, line 23, leave out "on," and insert "in respect of."

SIR R. WEBSTER moved, in page 9, line 23, after "property," insert "not passing to the executor as such." Subsection (4) of the clause which he desired to amend stood thus :—

"If the rateable part of the Estate Duty on any property is paid by the executor, it shall where occasion requires be repaid to him by the trustees or owners of the property, but if the duty is on real property it may be repaid by the same instalments and with the same interest as are in this Act mentioned."

He thought it would be seen that the words he moved to insert after "property" were necessary, for without them it might be contended, with respect to the other duty, that it could be recoverable by the executor from the individual.

Amendment proposed, in page 9, line 23, after the word "property," to insert the words "not passing to the executor as such."—(Sir R. Webster.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. R. T. REID said, the danger the hon. and learned Gentleman apprehended would not arise; and if the Amendment were adopted they would be inserting superfluous language in the Bill.

Question put, and negatived.

On Motion of Mr. R. T. REID, the following Amendments were agreed to :—

Page 9, line 26, leave out "on," and insert "in respect of."

Page 9, line 26, after "may," insert "unless otherwise agreed upon."

MR. BYRNE moved, for Mr. BRETHER, an Amendment to enable an executor acting in the administration of an estate, before probate or letters of administration had been granted to him, to raise the amount of Estate Duty for which he was accountable, and provided that any expenses properly paid or incurred by him in respect thereof, by sale or mortgage of the personal property (wheresoever situate) of which the deceased was competent to dispose at his death, should be allowed him. He pointed out that, although Sub-section 5 of Clause 9 authorised the executor to raise the amount of money necessary to pay the duty either by sale or mortgage, he could not deal with the property in any way until probate had been taken out by him, unless, as seemed very doubtful, the clause gave him a special power to do so. In many cases, therefore, a delay in the payment of the duty must ensue, and he wished to be assured whether the clause authorised the executor or not to raise the necessary money at once out of the funds that would, after probate had been granted him, pass into his hands as executor.

Amendment proposed, in page 9, line 28, before the words "a person," to insert the words—

"An executor acting in the administration of an estate may, before probate or letters of administration have been granted to him, raise the amount of Estate Duty for which he is accountable, and any expenses properly paid or incurred by him in respect thereof, by sale or mortgage of the personal property (wheresoever situate) of which the deceased was competent to dispose at his death, and"

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

Mr. R. T. REID said, he was afraid the Amendment was one which could not be accepted, and he would, for the satisfaction of the hon. and learned Gentleman, tell him why. At present the executor had ample powers, and, as well set forth in a well-known text-book, he might sell, give away, or otherwise dispose of the goods and chattels belonging to a testator. He ventured to suggest that too great a tendency was shown on the part of hon. Members to discuss and divide on legal technicalities. He had always understood that the responsibility in these matters rested upon the Law Officers of the Crown, and, with all due deference to hon. and learned Gentlemen opposite, he must say he scarcely thought that it was appropriate to discuss these difficult legal technicalities before a tribunal constituted as was the House of Commons.

*SIR R. WEBSTER said, he would be the last person to take offence at any of the observations of his hon. and learned Friend or of any Member of the Government, but he must deny that they had been dividing on legal technicalities. On the contrary, they had divided over and over again on the question of principle, with regard to which the House of Commons was not only competent but was bound to express an opinion. Responsibility as a Law Officer of the Crown rested upon him for many years, and he must be permitted to say that he had never heard before that the responsibility of the Law Officers exonerated the Members of the House, either lawyers or laymen, from expressing their conscientious opinion if they believed that a Bill in the form proposed would not carry out the proposed alteration of the law. They had no right to shield themselves under the responsibility of anybody in the House—whether a Member of the Government or not. Many among them felt the great responsibility of endeavouring to put that ill-drawn measure—for ill-drawn it was—into a proper shape, although the burden upon them might not be so great as it was upon the Attorney General and the Solicitor General. The Solicitor General had told them they were not to divide upon technical points, and he had quoted from a text-book as to goods and chattels, but any barrister could have told them there was no doubt the goods and chattels could be sold. But that was not the point. What was necessary to consider in the Amendment was the means whereby an executor could raise money for the purpose of paying to the Treasury the duty for which, under a heavy penalty, he was to be made personally liable. It was not a question of sale: it was one of mortgage. His hon. and learned friends the Members for Walthamstow and York had not put down these Amendments in order to harass the Government; their object was to improve the Bill, and all they asked the Government to do was to consider the proposals on their merits. Lawyers would not be permitted to quote the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown in Court, and the Solicitor General knew very well that he might be retained by the Government, without fee, he was sorry now to say, to argue against the construction of the Act which the hon. and learned Gentleman had put upon it. To suggest that hon. Members could exempt themselves from responsibility in this matter was an argument to which they could not listen for one moment. The Amendment was needed in order that the executor might be in a position to raise the money which the Legislature had asked him to pay, and he therefore hoped it would be fairly considered.

MR. BOUSFIELD (Hackney, N.) said, he thought it very astonishing that the Solicitor General should have met this Amendment with so perfunctory an argument. This was not a matter of mere drafting; it was one of great practical importance. Surely the hon. and learned Gentleman knew that in the past the very greatest difficulty had been experienced by executors in raising even the comparatively small amount necessary for the payment of Stamp Duty in getting probate, and undoubtedly that difficulty would be very greatly increased as the amount of duty payable became larger. He had received several appeals on the point. The Solicitor General told them that the executor was competent to sell the goods and chattels of the testator; but the question was, How was he to raise the large sums of money which would now have to be paid? He would not be entitled to touch one penny that might be invested in Consols, and yet he would have to raise money in order to get probate. The Government were not expediting the course of the Debate by their refusal to consider this proposal on its merits. He would suggest that this was a point on which they might fairly make a concession, and that some power might be given to charge Consols or other securities.

MR. BUCKNILL (Surrey, Epsom) said, he thought the Solicitor General had been a little hasty on that occasion. This was not a question of citing from a text-book, although the hon. and learned Gentleman had produced one. It was a purely business Amendment, which should be considered by hon. Members as men of business. A banker might be approached by an executor under the difficulties which surrounded him for money to pay the Estate Duty. The executor might be asked by the banker, who would naturally look at the matter from a business point of view, whether he had taken out probate; he might reply that he had not, but that he intended to do so. But that might not satisfy the banker. If, however, the Amendment were adopted the executor would in order to relieve the doubts of the banker be enabled to point to this provision which authorised him to carry out the duties which he claimed. Surely this was a business transaction and not a merely legal technicality.

SIR R. TEMPLE said, the remarks of the Solicitor General seemed to imply a very humble estimate of the lay capacity and the intelligence in dealing with these matters, but he would remind the hon. and learned Gentleman that many among them, although they might not be lawyers, had had a good deal to do with the wording of Bills passing through the Legislature and were competent to say what the law ought to be. He was bound to say that the arguments of his hon. and learned Friends the Members for the Isle of Wight, for Walthamstow, and for York had made a very great impression on the minds of laymen on that side of the House. They had put their contentions in language perfectly well understood, they had made their points clearly and fairly, whereas hon. and learned Gentlemen on the Government Benches had involved their replies in fog and mist. They preferred therefore to trust their own friends rather than the Government speakers.

MR. BANBURY (Camberwell, Peckham) asked the Solicitor General if he was aware that no single Railway Company in the United Kingdom would transfer stock belonging to deceased persons without proof of death and production of probate? Was not the same the case with Consols? It was absolutely impossible for any executor to raise money by the sale or transfer of stock.

MR. BRODRICK said, he had had practical experience as an executor, and knew he could not transfer stock until probate had been obtained. This Bill was placing the executor in a very ridiculous and anomalous position. The Solicitor General told them that the words in the clause bore the same construction as those of the Amendment, but they had high legal authority for saying that if bankers refused to advance money for the payment of the Estate Duty they would under the circumstances be justified if probate had not been obtained. He confessed that he could not understand the policy of the Government, a policy which was calculated to delay the progress of the Bill for an hour or two, because Ministers refused to put in clear words what they professed to intend. It was a peculiar fact that when both the Attorney General and the Solicitor General were present it was difficult to make progress, while if either of the Law Officers of the Crown was present by himself, there was a reasonable disposition to accept Amendments. Was it explainable by the fact that the mixture of equity and of common law was too difficult so far as the Bill was concerned. Surely the Government might agree to put in words which would give the executor a legal status. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, both as a layman and as a lawyer, must know the position of the executor under the Bill would not be an enviable one, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would intervene and give him that protection and support which he had a right to expect from the law.

*MR. BUTCHER said, he was sure that the hon. and learned Solicitor General would give him credit for not having put the Amendment down with merely a technical object. He had received many protests from solicitors and others throughout the country who realised the difficulties which would surround an executor under that Bill. What was the position? A man died leaving property which could not possibly be realised until security had been granted. Before probate could be granted an executor would want cash in order to pay the duty. How was he to obtain it? It so happened that advances were often made by solicitors. But if that resource were not open, was an executor to go cap in hand to a banker and to ask for money without security? The Amendment would enable an executor to borrow from a banker as a business transaction by offering a substantial security, made available by Act of Parliament. The fact was that the Government, while asking for its pound of flesh, would not even allow the unfortunate executor a knife with which to cut it off. This was not a technical matter; it was one which affected every layman throughout the country. All they asked the Government to do was to extricate the executor from an extremely difficult and awkward position. This was undoubtedly a weak spot in the Bill, and he appealed to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to accept the remedy which they had suggested.

*SIR J. RIGBY said, he hoped that nothing he had said had been wanting in respect for his hon. and learned Friends the Members for York and Walthamstow; but he must be permitted, so far as it was necessary, to judge them by the Amendments they put down and the way they presented them. Not a word had he heard from anyone who had addressed the House in explanation or justification of what constituted an important feature of the Amendment. It was true an executor could not get a transfer of Consols or railway stock without probate; but, although he could not mortgage real estate, he already had power to sell or mortgage personal property. He did not wish to go into technicalities, but it was difficult to meet the objections thrown out without doing so. An executor was an executor from the moment of death; probate was only proof; he had the powers of an executor, although he could not make strangers act as though he had the proof; and, while he could not say to a company, "Transfer this stock," yet if they did transfer it and he afterwards took out probate they would be perfectly safe. Any person who trusted an executor would purchase from him before probate; but all executors were not to be trusted, and how was an estate to be protected if a trustee endowed with plenary powers realised property and went off with the proceeds? The Amendment went far beyond anything that could be reasonably suggested. It referred to personal property wherever situated; but the legislation of this House would not be recognised abroad. The extension of the Estate Duty to property over which a testator had a general power of appointment which he had not exercised was a mere trifle compared with the change in the law that would be produced by this Amendment, for it would place in the executor's control and power, before he had received probate, that which he could not deal with directly now. The difficulty, such as it was, could not be denied, but the extent of it might be greatly exaggerated. The difficulties under this Amendment would be greater than they ever were. It would be impossible to carry out a scheme such as this in the case of men without credit, and a man with credit might go to his bankers and ask them to send a clerk to the Probate Office. He did not deny that there might be cases in which there might be great difficulty in raising the money—even, possibly, greater difficulty than in times gone by, inasmuch as the amount of duty would be greater in the future. In the larger cases, however, it was impossible to suppose that credit could not be obtained; and where this was impossible and the Commissioners were satisfied in the matter, then there was power to postpone the payment, and there were ample means of dealing with the really hard cases. If he spoke to the point he was accused of being technical; but if one spoke round about the point, like hon. and learned Gentlemen opposite, he supposed that one was elevated into a higher region. He, however, preferred to speak to the point, and he asserted with great regret that neither the Proposer of the Amendment nor the hon. and learned Member for York (Mr. Butler) had explained to the House, or justified in any degree, the extraordinarily wide and sweeping change in the law which the Government were asked to accept, although it was as far from their intention as anything well could be. Such an Amendment could not safely be accepted, and if it were he was assured that the law embodying it would have to be repealed as soon as it had been enacted.

MR. W. LONG said, he listened with great care to the speeches of both the Solicitor General and the Attorney General. As to the suggestion that this was purely a technical difficulty, he felt bound to assure the Solicitor General that in many quarters it had been pressed upon him, by solicitors and others interested in these matters, that the difficulty in the future would be greater than in the past; not in point of law, but because the process of aggregation (which the Government seemed everlastingly to lose sight of) would bring into the list of larger estates many that had hitherto been classed as small estates. In listening to the Solicitor General they gathered that the Amendment was not necessary; while the Attorney General led them to believe that the reason why the Government could not accept the Amendment was because of the vast change which it would work in the law, and because it might be made use of by dishonest executors. He wished to ask which view they were to accept as the reason why the Government would not accede to the Amendment.

SIR W. HARCOURT said, he would answer that question at once. There was, in his opinion, no conflict of opinion between the Attorney General and the Solicitor General. The view of the Government was that in point of fact this would be a very dangerous innovation to introduce.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 66; Noes 126.—(Division List No. 179.)

On Motion of Mr. R. T. REID the following Amendments were agreed to:—

Clause 9, page 9, line 28, leave out "on," and insert "in respect of."

Line 29, after "duty," insert "or raising the amount of the duty when already paid."

Line 32, after "mortgage of," insert "or a terminable charge on."

Line 34, leave out "or a terminable charge on."

Line 35, leave out the second "on," and insert "in respect of."

Line 36, leave out "on," and insert "in respect in."

Line 38, leave out "subject to," and insert "comprised in."

Lines 41 and 42, leave out "on property subject to," and insert "in respect of property comprised in."

SIR R. WEBSTER said, the next Amendment which stood in his name raised a very important question. In the course of the evening he had put preliminary questions to the Government with a view to ascertaining their view upon it, and the hon. and learned Solicitor General had indicated that he considered the clause as it stood quite sufficient. With all due deference he could not take the same view. They were dealing with a state of things in which there was to be both a personal and a property liability, and he hoped they would in the discussion on the Amendment hear nothing about legal technicalities. This was a purely business matter which business men would understand. He wished to have it made clear that a person who bought property or took a mortgage, or who became a transferee for a valuable consideration, should not be prejudicially affected. He hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would give his attention to this matter. It could not be suggested that the clause was not carefully or properly framed; but if any amendment of it could be recommended they would, of course, be glad to consider it. Was it not necessary that the Bill making the alteration in these Death Duties should be so plainly worded that a Court of Equity or of law could have no difficulty in construing its provisions? These provisions were necessary for the protection of bonâ fide holders for consideration, and he contended that it was desirable in the interests of business people that there should be no ambiguity on the points with which his Amendment dealt. The Amendment had not been put down with the object of unnecessarily troubling the Government. It was a bonâ fide attempt to improve the working of the measure, and he hoped it would be discussed in a fair spirit. The responsibility of passing the Bill in proper form rested with the House generally, and hon. Members could not discharge themselves of the liability by throwing it upon the Government.

Amendment proposed, in page 9, line 42, at the end, to insert the words—

(i) Nothing in this Act contained shall affect any person dealing for money or money's worth with any property liable to a charge created under this Act unless he had notice of such charge;

(ii.) A person shall not be deemed to have notice of a charge created under this Act unless—

(a) it is within his own knowledge, or would have come to his knowledge if such inquiries and inspections had been made as ought reasonably to have been made by him; or

Sir R. Webster

(b) in the same transaction with respect to which a question of notice to such purchaser or mortgagee, or person dealing for money or money's worth arises, it has come to the knowledge of his counsel as such, or of his solicitor or other agent as such, or would have come to the knowledge of his solicitor or other agent as such if such inquiries and inspections had been made as ought reasonably to have been made by such solicitor or agent;

(iii.) Upon the transfer of any stocks, funds, shares, debentures, or securities, the transfer of which is effected or perfected by entry in a book or register, nothing done or suffered under this Act shall prevent such entry being made, or prejudicially affect the person making the same.”—(Sir R. Webster.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

SIR J. RIGBY* said, the main part of the Amendment had been under consideration for a considerable period, for similar Amendments to that of the hon. and learned Gentleman had been proposed at an early stage in Committee. Why should there be such a clause in such an Act as this? It had not only been considered on other occasions in the House, but formed part of an Act of Parliament now in force—namely, the Conveyancing Act of 1882, which defined property as including “any debt, thing in action, or any right or interest in the nature of property, whether in possession or expectancy.”

That included every conceivable thing. It was already the law.

SIR R. WEBSTER: It is not law with reference to this Bill.

SIR J. RIGBY repeated that that was the existing law, and it applied to purchase, sale, or mortgage for valuable consideration. It was law with reference to this Bill. The Conveyancing Act applied to this Bill and to every Bill that was passed, and what they were now engaged in was a perfectly vain and fruitless effort to improve upon it. The Conveyancing Act contained a well-considered code with respect to notice. That code was not improved by, though it was mainly copied into, the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman. The House ought not to waste their time in trying to compare the hon. and learned Gentleman's Amendment with the well-considered provisions of the Act of 1882.

MR. GRANT LAWSON admitted that the speech of the right hon. and learned Gentleman might possibly nullify the latter part of the Amendment, as he said it was already contained in an existing Act. But there was no doubt that the first part of the Amendment was not comprised in any Act of Parliament. It was impossible to suppose that the Conveyancing Act of 1882 made provision for the Estate Duty Act of 1894 so far as it affected any person dealing for money or money's worth, with property in respect of which duty was levied. It was ridiculous to say that a man who bonâ fide bought a picture at a sale should be called upon to ascertain whether this first charge on the picture had been paid. All his hon. and learned Friend's Amendment did was to excuse property when it came into the hands of a bonâ fide purchaser. Therefore, without any reference to constructive notice at all, which did not appear to affect the question, this Amendment should commend itself to the House.

SIR W. HARCOURT urged the House not to waste time in endeavouring to amend what could not be amended. He appealed to the House to say whether it was possible for them at that moment to undertake to revise Lord Cairns's Conveyancing Act of 1882. The House could not act as a Conveyancing Committee.

SIR R. WEBSTER said, what he had pointed out was that that Act would not apply to all transactions under this Bill.

SIR W. HARCOURT said, it must be clear to hon. Members on both sides of the House, that the Government should not be called upon in this case to alter the law of conveyancing.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR quite agreed that this was a question of great complexity; but he could not follow the right hon. Gentleman in maintaining that it was not the business of the House to consider and deal with it. What did the House exist for? It would be an entirely new version of their Parliamentary duty to say with the right hon. Gentleman that they could not go into a matter of this kind without getting the assistance of a Committee of able lawyers. The Chancellor of the Exchequer seemed to think it was sufficient for him to say that he was advised that certain consequences would follow certain provisions. But the Opposition was advised to exactly the contrary effect. If these questions were simply to be voted on and not discussed an entirely new version of Parliamentary duties would be set up. According to the right hon. Gentleman, the House was to get a body of able lawyers to assist their deliberations; their opinions were to be taken on trust, and the House was to divide without listening to any arguments. No answer had been given to his hon. and learned Friend. The Attorney General had read out Section 3 of the Conveyancing Act of 1882. As it was twice as long as his hon. Friend's Amendment, no doubt it was twice as well drawn. The question to be answered was this—If a picture were sold at Christie's, if the purchaser bought it in perfect good faith, and it turned out that the Succession Duty under this Act had not been paid, would the purchaser be entirely absolved from any responsibility on account of that defect? On the face of it apparently he would not be absolved. Lord Cairns was a great draftsman, politician, and lawyer, but he never foresaw the Budget of 1894. He could not have contemplated this particular case. As this part of the Bill had to be interpreted by business men in ordinary business transactions, it was hard to compel them to turn up first this Act and then Lord Cairns's Act of 1882. The system of cross-references was excellent for getting a Bill through the House and to avoid discussion. But when the Opposition themselves proposed to improve the drafting of the Bill the Government ought to jump at the chance of accepting an Amendment which they ought to make themselves. The Government would greatly conduce to the clearness of their own measure if they would accept these words, which, as they admitted, carried out their own meaning and was in conformity with their own policy. When a suggestion was made which would have the effect of diminishing all this unhappy doubt and difficulty, surely they should adopt it.

MR. BANBURY said, he had no desire to interfere in a conveyancing discussion, but would point out that the language adopted by the Government would utterly destroy all facilities for borrowing if a lender of stock or a purchaser of stock might find himself saddled with charges of which he could have no knowledge.

Question put.

The House divided :—Ayes 90 ; Noes 146.—(Division List, No. 180.)

MR. DODD moved, in page 10, line 10, at end, insert—

“No appeal shall be allowed from any order, direction, determination, or decision of the High Court made under this section except with the leave of the High Court or Court of Appeal.”

He said, the object of the Amendment was to make it quite clear what the procedure was to be in regard to appeals from the High Courts. He thought the Bill did not make it clear whether there were to be appeals from the High Court or whether the matter was determined once and for all when it came before the High Court. The Attorney General had stated that he would consider the points raised, and he understood the Government would accept the Amendment standing in his name with some verbal alteration.

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

SIR R. WEBSTER said, he was sorry the Government had determined to accept this Amendment, because he thought it would have been better to let matters stand as they were.

MR. BYRNE said, it appeared to him to be of the highest importance that there should be a right of appeal in regard to taxation. Sometimes the amount involved would be very large, and very often the question of principle would be most important and the decision would govern a great number of cases. Upon questions of taxation of the subject it was most essential that the right of appeal should be allowed.

Question put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in page 10, line 27, to leave out the word “unjust,” and insert “hardship.”—(Mr. Byrne.)

SIR R. WEBSTER said, he had put down an alternative Amendment substituting the word “oppressive” for the word “unjust,” and he would ask that his Amendment be accepted. He could not move his Amendment, but it seemed to him the word he suggested would best describe what was meant.

MR. R. T. REID said he saw no objection.

The word “oppressive” substituted.

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

On Motion of MR. R. T. REID, the following Amendment was agreed to :—Page 11, lines 27 and 28, leave out “to pay the whole of the duty claimed.”

MR. R. T. REID moved, in page 10, line 28, after the first word “appeal,” to insert the words—

“to pay the whole or, as the case may be, any part of the duty claimed by the Commissioners or of such portion of it as is then payable by him.”

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment, in line 1, after the word “pay,” to insert the words “or give security for.”—(Mr. Byrne.)

Question proposed, “That those words be inserted in the proposed Amendment.”

MR. R. T. REID was understood to say that the hon. and learned Gentleman's Amendment would dispense with security altogether.

MR. BYRNE said, that as the clause stood something must be paid. His Amendment would provide that security should be given.

MR. R. T. REID read the words of the clause, whereupon

MR. BYRNE said, he thought the hon. and learned Solicitor General was right and that he was wrong, and he would therefore withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment to the proposed Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES asked whether the word “of” was not unnecessary? He moved to omit it.

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment, to leave out the word “of.”—(Mr. Gibson Bowles.)

Amendment agreed to.

On Motion of MR. R. T. REID, the following Amendment was agreed to :—Page 10, line 29, leave out from the first “of,” to “but,” in line 30, and insert—

"no duty, or of such part only of the duty as to the Court seems reasonable, and on security to the satisfaction of the Court being given for the duty, or so much of the duty as is not so paid."

MR. DODD moved, in page 10, line 40, at end, add—

"Provided that, for the purpose of any appeal from such county court, the matter of such appeal shall be deemed to be a county court matter, and shall be subject to the rules, restrictions, and conditions from time to time applicable to appeals from county courts."

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

SIR R. WEBSTER objected to the Amendment. They were willing to learn from anybody what the procedure ought to be, but he could not agree that the hon. and learned Member should make a condition of this sort.

SIR W. HARCOURT said, he was rather inclined to agree with the hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir R. Webster). They might, however, consider the matter later.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. BUTCHER moved, in page 11, line 1, leave out "the duty," and insert "such duty or duties." He said the object of his Amendment was to secure that a certificate of discharge should be given to persons paying the settlement Estate Duty as well as the ordinary Estate Duty.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

*SIR J. RIGBY said, the Amendment was unnecessary, as the Settlement Estate Duty, equally with the Estate Duty, was included in the words of the clause.

SIR R. WEBSTER said, it was difficult to recollect everything that appeared in the Bill, but he thought this Amendment was necessary, and that the Government had indicated that they would accept it on the occasion when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Bristol gave way to the appeal of the Attorney General. Without this Amendment the Act would not be clear.

MR. R. T. REID said, he agreed with the Attorney General that the words were unnecessary.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, there was a distinction between the two duties.

They were separate duties levied on separate and distinct principles. It was not reasonable to oppose this Amendment, which, after all, was only a drafting Amendment. Surely the Government did not propose to refuse a certificate in respect of the payment of every duty under the Act?

MR. BYRNE said, he did not think the insertion of these words would do any harm. Still, he believed that, upon the whole, the Court, although holding that the clause was very badly worded, would take the view of the Government.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR R. WEBSTER moved, in Clause 11, page 11, line 10, leave out "may," and insert "shall." He submitted that if after two years the ordinary conditions had not been fulfilled, it was to the advantage of the Exchequer that the Commissioners should determine the rate of the Estate Duty, and that there was no object under these circumstances of giving an option to the Commissioners.

Amendment proposed, in page 11, line 10, to leave out the word "may," and insert the word "shall."—(Sir R. Webster.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'may' stand part of the Bill."

MR. R. T. REID said, he was afraid the Government could not accept this Amendment. The purport of the clause was that after two years there should be power to the Commissioners to determine the rate of assessment. He thought it was necessary and desirable that the Commissioners should have some discretion. This matter was discussed in Committee, and he took the same view then as now.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, the clause had been essentially altered by the introduction of the word "verified." The account was to be delivered "to the best of his knowledge and belief," but now it had to be verified on oath, and this man had to give an account of property and of burdens thereon, and disclose every particular. Under these circumstances, it was reasonable to require that the real purpose of the section should be carried out, and that the duty should be settled and the discharge made. It could not be the purpose of the Government to keep open the accounts for an indefinite time. It was in the interest of the Inland Revenue that the certificate should be given with as little delay as possible. Accounts were left long enough open already; and every occasion that might fairly be taken for closing them should be availed of. Here was such an occasion. He should, therefore, support the Amendment.

*MR. MATTHEWS said, that as he understood the Bill an executor would not get probate until he produced the certificate, and consequently until the executor got the certificate he could not touch one penny of the estate. Was it seriously contended by the Government that the Executor was to wait two years before he could handle a single item of the property. Sub-section 5 of Section 9 of the Bill no doubt provided that for the purpose of paying the duty, the executor would have power to raise the amount of the duty by sale or mortgage of the property.

SIR R. WEBSTER: That has been struck out.

MR. MATTHEWS said, it had not been struck out. The House had passed it half an hour ago. He read that provision as a sort of help to the wretched executor to enable him to pay the full Estate Duty. But it was most unreasonable that, after the unfortunate executor had waited two years before he obtained his certificate which would alone enable him to deal with the property, the Commissioners should still have a discretionary power allowed them as to whether or no they should then grant the certificate.

MR. R. T. REID pointed out that the right hon. Gentleman was mistaken in supposing that an executor must pay the full amount of the duty before he could obtain probate and proceed to handle the estate.

MR. MATTHEWS: Where is it provided that he can get probate before paying the amount?

Mr. Gibson Bowles

MR. R. T. REID said, that Clause 6, Sub-section 3, provided that where an executor had not full knowledge of the amount of the value of the property, he might make an estimate of the value, and then he would get probate. There was such an immense multitude of clauses in the Bill that it was impossible to carry them all in one's mind; but the right hon. Gentleman would find that there were other clauses in the Bill which gave to the executor the power of getting probate, even before he paid the full amount of the duty.

Question put, and agreed to.

On Motion of Mr. R. T. REID, the following Amendment was agreed to:—Page 11, line 10, leave out "on," and insert "in respect of."

SIR R. WEBSTER moved, in page 11, line 17, to leave out "any person," and insert "the applicant." The sub-section which he sought to amend stood in the Bill as follows:—

"(3.) A certificate of the Commissioners under this section shall not discharge any person or property from Estate Duty in case of fraud or failure to disclose material facts, and shall not affect the rate of duty payable on any property afterwards shown to have passed on the death, and the duty thereon shall be at such rate as would be payable if the value thereof were added to the value of the property on which duty has been already paid."

His Amendment was the first of a series of four Amendments to Sub-section 3, the effect of which would be to make the first few lines of the sub-section read as follows:—

"A certificate of the Commissioners shall not discharge 'the applicant' or 'any' property 'comprised in the certificate' from Estate Duty in case of fraud or failure to disclose material facts 'on the part of the applicant,' and shall not affect the rate of duty payable on any property afterwards shown to have passed on the death"

His object in moving these Amendments was to clear up certain ambiguities which, he submitted, existed in the wording of the section as it stood. To say that no person or property shall be discharged from Estate Duty because at the time the application was made the applicant was guilty of this misconduct or fraud was to introduce into the law relating to fraud a principle which he believed to be without precedent. He should therefore like to hear from the Solicitor General why the sub-section had been framed with so wide a scope. It was difficult to understand why fraud should be allowed to impose consequences of further liability, or the continuance of liability on a property and on a person for a fault which they had not committed.

Amendment proposed, in page 11, line 17, to leave out the words "any person," and insert the words "the applicant."—(Sir R. Webster.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'any person' stand part of the Bill."

Mr. R. T. REID said, that no injustice was done by the sub-section as it stood. Of course it was necessary to guard against fraud or failure to disclose material facts, and accordingly it was provided that "a certificate of the Commissioners under this section shall not discharge any person or property from Estate Duty in case of fraud or failure to disclose material facts." It might be said that that would expose innocent persons to the consequences of fraud in which they were not accomplices. But there was a proviso at the end of the clause which ran—

"Provided nevertheless that a certificate purporting to be a discharge of the whole Estate Duty payable in respect of any property included in the certificate shall exonerate a bona fide purchaser for valuable consideration without notice from the duty notwithstanding any such fraud or failure."

That was to say, that once it was shown that a person had honestly received for value he should be entirely exonerated by the certificate; and therefore no harm would ensue under the sub-section. Some people might be perfectly guilty, and yet under the Amendment they would be discharged. He thought that the views of the Government were not far off those of Gentlemen opposite. The Government did not want any innocent person to be injured, but they thought it was necessary to insist upon the words of the clause.

Mr. BYRNE said, he regretted very much, particularly after the manner in which the learned Solicitor General had received the Amendment and his statement that he desired to treat everybody fairly, that he could not agree with the hon. and learned Gentleman's view of the clause. There might be a case in which an estate came into the hands of a trustee who was dishonest and kept back part of the property. The trust estate might afterwards fall into the hands of another trustee, who stated all he knew, had been guilty of no fraud whatever, and asked for a certificate. In that case no protection whatever would be afforded to the innocent person. The words suggested in the Amendment appeared to be exactly appropriate to meet the case, and he therefore cordially supported the Amendment.

Mr. R. T. REID: By the indulgence of the House may I say that in the case quoted by the hon. and learned Gentleman the trustee would not be responsible at all? The property would be liable, and the persons who would suffer from the liability of the property would be the beneficiaries. It is quite right that under such circumstances they should suffer.

*MR. MATTHEWS (Birmingham, E.): One purpose of this section is to enable the owner of part of the property passing on a death to pay his Estate Duty and get his discharge. I think that is clear from the first sub-section. Let me suppose an estate, part of which consists of real property and goes to A. The executor, B, is a fraudulent person, who keeps back a certain quantity of bonds to bearer, and does not disclose them to the Commissioners. The unhappy A knows nothing about this, and he goes to the Commissioners and asks them to fix the Estate Duty and to give him his certificate of release. That is done, but it afterwards turns out that B has been guilty of fraud, and the Government say that under such circumstances the certificate is not to protect either A or his property by reason of the fraud of somebody else. Surely the Government cannot mean that. I think that the illustration given by my hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Byrne) has not been answered by the Solicitor General, but illustrations without number may be given of cases where an innocent person may have obtained a certificate, but may suffer under this clause because of the fraud of another person.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes
Nocs 91.—(Division List, No. 181)

Some verbal Amendments,—(Mr. R. T. Reid,)—agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in page 12, line 11, after the word "interest," to insert the words—

"and shall give a certificate of discharge accordingly: Provided that the certificate shall not discharge any person from any duty in case of fraud or failure to disclose material facts."—(Mr. R. T. Reid.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. BYRNE said, he proposed, in the third line, to leave out "any person," and insert "the applicant."

MR. R. T. REID thought he could show that the words "any person" ought to be left in, because the certificate did not "discharge any person from any duty in case of fraud or failure to disclose material facts."

MR. BYRNE said, he must point out that this was a question for the discharge of the person, and fraud or failure on the part of others ought not to prevent the applicant from getting his personal discharge unless they were going to make, somehow or other, fraud to attach so that a person should not get a certificate at all. The point was that if a man had not been guilty of fraud he ought to get a certificate that would free him altogether. He begged to move the Amendment.

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment, in line 3, to leave out the words "any person," and insert the words "the applicant."—(Mr. Byrne.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'any person' stand part of the proposed Amendment."

MR. R. T. REID said, he was sorry he could not accept this Amendment. This was a clause which provided for a composition, to take so much down and have done with it, which was a proper and reasonable clause to adopt, but it was an element in all compromises, as this was, that there was an absence of fraud. It seemed to him the same objection applied to this Amendment as was applied to another Amendment that was moved before—namely, that they released the applicant who might be guilty, and did not discharge those who might be innocent.

MR. BYRNE said, that after what the hon. and learned Solicitor General had said he felt that it was no use to take another Division, and therefore he would ask leave to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment to the proposed Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Words inserted.

Verbal Amendments agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in page 12, line 27, to leave out the words "by the High Court."—(Mr. R. T. Reid.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

MR. DODD (Essex, Maldon) said, that by leaving out the words "by the High Court" they might have to consider what was intended to be inserted. The difficulty that arose on this part of the clause was this. The words were, "any dispute as to the proportion of Estate Duty to be borne by any property or person may be determined by the High Court," and the clause did not say whether that determination was to be a final one or subject to the ordinary rules of appeal to the Court of Appeal and then to the House of Lords. What he wished to ask was whether it was intended the High Court should determine it once for all, or whether there should be an appeal to the Court of Appeal and then to the House of Lords, because in that case it might be wise to show the appeal should be the same appeal as that given by Clause 10? For his part, he had no preference whether there was to be an appeal given or not, but he thought they should make it plain one way or the other. Lest it might be said the clause was already plain, he would remind the learned Solicitor General there was a case he would probably know where there was an appeal from a decision, under one of the Local Government Acts, of the County Council, and it was there held—Lord Herschell gave the judgment—there could be no appeal; therefore he thought they would do well to make this clear in one sense or the other.

MR. R. T. REID was sorry the hon. and learned Gentleman had not put down his Amendment on the Paper, so that he could have been better prepared to meet it, but he might say that his intention was clear that there should be an appeal according to the ordinary Rules of Court. He understood that his hon. and learned Friend was not particular about it, and that being the case, and not objecting otherwise to the Amendment, he thought it might be allowed to pass.

Question put, and negatived.

On Motion of Mr. R. T. REID, the following Amendment was agreed to :—
Page 12, line 29, after “court,” add—

“Either by the High Court, or, where the amount in dispute is less than fifty pounds, by a County Court for the county or place in which the person recovering the same resides, or the property in respect of which the duty is paid is situate.”

Amendment proposed, in page 12, line 29, after the word “court,” to insert, as a new Sub-section, the words—

“(3) Any person from whom a rateable part of Estate Duty can be recovered under this section shall be bound by the accounts and valuations as settled between the person entitled to recover the same and the Commissioners.”

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

Mr. GIBSON BOWLES really thought this could not be passed without a word of explanation. It appeared to him that when an executor paid duty he was not bound to pay at the request of the successor ; and then to come to the question of the accounts the successor was to be bound by those accounts, in the making of which he had had no part, for every and any purpose. That could hardly be intended ; it could only be intended he should be bound for the assessment of the duty and the recovery of that duty from him. He would, therefore, suggest that after “bound” they should insert the words “as regards any dues recoverable from him.”

Mr. R. T. REID said, he thought he could satisfy the hon. Gentleman from his own point of view they need not add these words. Under this section, where a person was required to account for a duty upon a settled estate, and had paid that duty, he would be entitled to recover from the owner of an annuity or the owner of the life rent, and would be bound by the accounts and valuations as settled between the person entitled to recover the same and the Commissioners. He was quite clear that the words of his Amendment were necessary.

Mr. GIBSON BOWLES rose to speak, when

*MR. SPEAKER remarked that he had already spoken.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES : Then I must press the Amendment.

MR. SPEAKER : The Amendment was not moved.

MR. BARTLEY : I beg to move the Amendment.

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment, after the word “bound,” to insert the words “as regards any duties recoverable by him.”—(Mr. Bartley.)

Question proposed, “That those words be inserted in the proposed Amendment.”

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, that having been put in Order by the amiable act of his hon. Friend behind him he wished to say his idea was identical with that of the Solicitor General, but he had had a natural and reasonable doubt whether it would not extend beyond what was intended by the Government. He accepted the legal opinion of the hon. and learned Gentleman and would not desire his hon. Friend to press the Amendment he had moved.

Amendment to the proposed Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Words inserted.

Further Proceeding on Consideration, as amended, deferred till Monday next.

CONCILIATION (TRADE DISPUTES) BILL. (No. 125.)

SECOND READING.

Adjourned Debate on Second Reading [23rd April].

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Bill be now read a second time.”

MR. BRYCE said, that since he last mentioned this Bill there was a strong expression of opinion that it should be read a second time and referred to the Standing Committee ; therefore he hoped that the House would consent to read this Bill a second time and then refer it, together with the Bill from the London Chamber of Commerce, to the Standing Committee.

MR. BROMLEY - DAVENPORT (Cheshire, Macclesfield) said, he did not wish to stop the Bill from passing, but he objected to its being brought on for discussion at this hour.

MR. BRYCE said, an ample opportunity to discuss it would be found in the Committee.

MR. BROMLEY-DAVENPORT : I object.

Adjourned Debate further adjourned till Monday next.
